Said commissioners shall submit to the Secretary of the Treasury in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and annually thereafter for his examination and approval, a statement showing in detail the work proposed to be undertaken by them during the fiscal year next ensuing, and the estimated cost thereof; also the cost of constructing, repairing, and maintaining all bridges authorized by law across the Potomac River, within the District of Columbia, and also all other streams in said District; the cost of maintaining all public institutions of charity, reformatories, and prisons belonging to or controlled wholly or in part by the District of Columbia, and which are now by law supported wholly or in part by the United States or the District of Columbia; and also the expenses of the Washington Aqueduct and its appurtenances; and also an itemized statement and estimate of the amount necessary to defray the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the next fiscal year. * * *

I have some stars here, indicating where I omit some things that are unimportant.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman will not omit that part of it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. If I do, I will ask the gentleman to call it to my attention.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I mean the part in reference to the 3.65 bonds.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I do not think I have omitted it.

* * * The Secretary of the Treasury shall carefully consider all estimates submitted to him as above provided, and shall approve, disapprove, or suggest such changes in the same, or any item thereof, as he may think the public interest demands; and after he shall have considered and passed upon such estimates submitted to him, he shall cause to be made a statement of the amount approved by him and the fund or purpose to which each item belongs, which statement shall be certified by him and delivered, together with the estimates as originally submitted, to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who shall transmit the same to Congress. To the extent of which Congress shall approve of said estimates, Congress shall appropriate the amount of 50 per cent thereof; and the remaining 50 per cent of such approved estimates shall be levied and assessed upon the taxable property and privileges in said District other than the property of the United States and of the District of Columbia. * * *

And in the next section we find the following:

Hereafter the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the interest on the 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia, issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, when the same shall become due and payable, and all amounts so paid shall be credited as a part of the appropriation for the year by the United States toward the expenses of the District of Columbia, as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is what I had reference to.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I think I have all the statutes.

In other words, as an illustration, if the Government's 50 per cent amounted to a million dollars and the District's share to a million dollars and the interest was $500,000, the Secretary of the Treasury would pay the interest, and there would only be available for the expenses of the District a million dollars secured by taxation and the half-million-dollar balance left after paying the interest. This legislation alone certainly would refute the claim of the gentleman from Kentucky that the Government was in no sense liable to pay the interest.

It should be noted that the act of 1878, which imposed the half-and-half division of expenditures for the support of the District government out of the local revenues and from the Treasury of the United States, originated in and was passed by a Democratic House of Representatives presided over by that notable Democrat and foremost of economists of his time, Samuel J. Randall.

It is interesting at this point to call attention to a few of the debates running through the general debate on the act of 1878, as indicating the understanding of the then Members of the House as to the responsibility of the Government under the language which I have heretofore quoted, set forth in the act of 1874, wherein the Government of the United States pledges its credit to the payment of the interest and principal of the bonds.

On March 18, 1878, Mr. Eden, in discussing whether House bill No. 2917, authorizing the Commissioners of the District to audit certain claims against the District, should be considered in the House or in the Committee of the Whole, entered into a discussion of the act of June 20, 1874, in which he says, on page 1841 of the RECORD:

Section 7 of the act of June 20, 1874, provides that the sinking-fund commissioners of said District are hereby continued and that it shall be the duty of said sinking-fund commissioners to cause the bonds of the District of Columbia to be prepared in sums of $50 and $500, bearing date 1st of August, 1874, and payable 50 years after date, and bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent per annum, payable semi-annually, etc., going on to describe the bonds——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield just there?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I can not yield just at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I can not yield at this time—and then it further provides that the faith of the United States is hereby pledged that the United States will, by proper proportional appropriations, as contemplated in this act, and by causing to be levied on property within the District such tax as will provide revenue to pay the interest on said bonds as the same may become due, and for payment of the principal thereof at maturity. It will be seen that the Government of the United States is pledged to pay a proportional part of the bonds which are provided for in the act of June, 1870, and that is the act which is referred to in this bill, under which the additional bonds are to be issued. If those bonds are issued, the law pledges the faith of the Government to make the necessary appropriations to pay them. Consequently, it comes directly within the rule.

The Speaker sustained this point and the bill was placed on the Union Calendar.

Later on, when the act of 1878 was up for discussion, there were those who disclaimed the Government's liability for the bonds and interest, and the debate on this subject ran to some length. In the running debate, Mr. Cox of Ohio, who opposed the payment of either the principal or the interest, made the following statement, on page 3223 of the RECORD of May 6, 1878, in referring to the language which I have heretofore quoted:

The language of that section demonstrates the fact that I was stating. It provides that the amount so paid by the Government of the United States on the interest of the debt of the District "shall be credited as part of the appropriation for the year by the United States toward the expenses of the District." It thereby recognizes the fact that this bill makes the interest on the debt of the District a part of the current expenses of the District, of which the Government of the United States is to pay 50 per cent. There is no way of getting from it. If gentlemen of the Committee for the District of Columbia did not intend that, then they should have used other language in the bill.

J. C. S. Blackburn, of Kentucky, was the second member of the District of Columbia Committee at the time the act of 1878 was discussed and passed, and became its chairman in December, 1878, on the death of the former chairman, Alpheus S. Williams, of Michigan.

Mr. Blackburn, during this colloquy, in which both Mr. Cox of Ohio and Mr. Cox of New York opposed this section, in reply to their arguments, said as follows:

Will the gentleman allow me to read a single sentence in the act approved June 20, 1874, in order to let the House see whether he and the gentleman from Ohio are right when they say that the Government is under no obligation whatever in this regard? I read from page 120 of the United States Statutes at Large, volume 18: "And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged that the United States will, by proper proportional appropriations, as contemplated in this act, and by causing to be levied upon the property within said District such taxes as will provide revenues necessary to pay the interest on said bonds as the same may become due and payable, and create a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof, at maturity."

Mr. COX of New York. That does not bear out the gentleman's position.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I simply desire to ask in the face of that proposition whether there was to be no proportionate assessment of expenses between the Government and the District?

Mr. COX of New York. If that were so understood, I would vote to repeal the statute. I do not believe such was the intention when it was passed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let the gentleman introduce his bill to that effect, but he should not deny the responsibility of the Government while the statute stands unrepealed.

It might be stated at this point that the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Blackburn, argued throughout the entire debate that by the act of 1874 the Government was absolutely bound to pay the interest, but did not concede that the principal was guaranteed by the Government or that the Government was bound at any time to pay it. In respect to the interest, he did not entertain the same views as does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]. No one reading the act could possibly differentiate between the principal and the interest, but Mr. Blackburn later on, in making the same arguments, lost his fight in the House at the time the act of 1879, upon which I will dwell later, became a law. Mr. Buckner, who was a Democrat from Missouri and chairman of the District of Columbia Committee of the House in the preceding Congress, further along in the debate offered an amendment in an effort to create a sinking fund to take care of the principal and interest. This amendment was not passed, but is interesting. It reads:

Provided, That one-half of 1 per cent of the 3.65 bonded debt shall be annually set apart from the taxes and appropriations provided for in the sixth section to create a sinking fund for the purchase of said 3.65 per cent debt of the District.

In speaking on his amendment, he says:

I will state to the gentleman what I desire this Congress to do. My amendment provides that the Government of the United States shall comply with the obligations which it incurred by the act of 1874. The Committee for the District of Columbia by this bill provides for complying with that obligation only in part. It provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the interest on this debt, amounting to one-half million dollars a year. That, however, is only a part compliance with the obligations which this Government entered into with these bond holders. That obligation was that by appropriations and by taxation the Government would provide a sinking fund whereby to liquidate this debt. Now, what is proposed by this bill in regard to this debt which will become due 45 years hence? This bill proposes to pay the interest on that debt, and so far it is a compliance with the obligations of the act of 1874. But what is to be done with the principal of the debt at the end of that time? Would you repudiate it? Is that the point? I have been charged with others with being willing to repudiate the obligations of the Government. But I am for maintaining its obligations, and for that purpose I have moved an amendment requiring a certain percentage to be set aside to make a sinking fund.

Further on he was interrupted by Mr. Eden, who said:

If my friend from Missouri [Mr. Buckner] will allow me, I will say that his amendment commits the Government of the United States to the payment of the principal of the 3.65 bonds, and if it prevails, it is in the nature of a contract with the holders of those bonds that Congress will pay the principal of the debt.

Mr. BUCKNER. I will say to my friend from Illinois [Mr. Eden] that the Government of the United States is already committed.

Mr. EDEN. It is committed only so far as to see that the proper tax is levied upon the District of Columbia to pay the interest on these bonds.

Mr. BUCKNER. More than that.

Mr. EDEN. Not as to the principal.

Mr. BUCKNER. The act of 1874 pledges the faith of the Government—— [Time expired.]

Thus the act of 1878 became a law without having fully settled the question of providing for a sinking fund to meet the principal of these bonds when due, although, as well stated by the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. Buckner, they had provided for the interest, and to that extent only had complied with the pledges of the act of 1874.

At the time this act became a law the government of the District of Columbia had a debt on the 1st day of July, 1878, of $22,106,650. They had issued $13,000,000 worth of 3.65 bonds, and the balance of the debt represented other forms of bonded indebtedness. The auditing board, provided for in the act of 1874, had been by legislation stopped in its further issuance of bonds. A glance at the debates indicates that Congress felt that it was settling claims and running up the bonded indebtedness entirely too fast, and for several years there was no additional bonds allowed to be issued.

This is not germane to the case, as the bonds are admittedly bona fide, and the transactions of the District prior to 1874 are not a subject of inquiry. Since that time there has been a reduction in the bonded indebtedness of $13,218,250. There are outstanding to-day $8,888,400 in 3.65 bonds. Half of this debt and interest has been paid by the Government.

Mr. Buckner, of Missouri, was entirely right when he tried to create a sinking fund by the act of 1878, and Congress recognized the justice of his contention the following year, and in doing so worked a great economy and saved millions of dollars in interest. To illustrate, the interest charge on the debt of the District July 1, 1878, was $1,015,758.12. The interest charge March 3, 1911, was only $324,426.60, a net reduction per annum of $691,332.52. Of the 3.65 bonds, there have been issued altogether $14,997,300, the law limiting the issue to fifteen million. Of these there have been retired $6,108,900. All the bonds outstanding are 3.65 bonds, and in the year just passed the sinking fund has retired $603,700 worth of these bonds and reduced the annual interest charge in the year in the sum of $22,035.05. So that, as I say, the Government has paid one-half of all this reduction, and there is no question that it has done so legally. All doubt must be removed by the passage of the act of March 3, 1879, which I desire to discuss briefly.

The act of June 11, 1878, providing a permanent form of government, in section 7 thereof, provided:

That the offices of the sinking-fund commissioners are hereby abolished, and all the duties and powers possessed by said commissioners are transferred to and shall be exercised by the Treasurer of the United States, who shall perform the same in accordance with the provision of existing laws.

The Treasurer of the United States assumed this duty on the 1st day of July, 1878. In all legislation authorizing loans, still outstanding at that time, either passed by Congress or the legislative assembly, some sort of a provision was made for a sinking fund for the gradual redemption and retirement of various bonds, taking up the entire debt at maturity. These laws had not worked satisfactorily, and the Treasurer in his first report recommended that in lieu of all existing provisions for various sinking funds Congress make a permanent annual appropriation of $1,155,583.55 to meet the interest on all outstanding funded debt and maintain a sinking fund. He estimated that this would be sufficient to extinguish the debt of the District in 1924.

Congress adopted this suggestion in the sundry civil bill passed March 3, 1879, United States Statutes at Large, Forty-fifth Congress, October 15, 1877, to March 3, 1879, page 410, in the following language:

For the interest and sinking fund on the funded debt, $1,155,583.55—

and appropriated this sum in the years 1879, 1880, and 1881. In 1879, in the sundry civil appropriation bill, which then carried the District appropriation, on the 3d day of March of that year, the Twentieth Statutes at Large, page 410, a sinking fund was created for the 3.65 loan, and the following is the language of the law authorizing the same:

And there is hereby appropriated, out of the proportional sum which the United States may contribute toward the expenses of the District of Columbia, in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 11, 1878, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and annually thereafter, such sums as will, with the interest thereon, at the rate of 3.65 per cent per annum, be sufficient to pay the principal of the 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia, issued under the act of Congress approved June 30, 1874, at maturity; which said sums the Secretary of the Treasury shall annually invest in said bonds at not exceeding the par value thereof; and all bonds so redeemed shall cease to bear interest and shall be canceled and destroyed in the same manner that the United States bonds are canceled and destroyed.

In the act of June 16, 1880 (21 Stat. L., 284), authority was given for the issuance of additional 3.65 bonds. At that time there was a reestimate of the amount required to pay interest and maintain the sinking fund to meet the funded indebtedness of the District, and in 1882 Congress appropriated for that purpose $1,213,947.97, and this amount was annually appropriated by Congress for the interest and sinking fund on the funded debt up to and including the appropriation act of 1903. In 1904 the total amount appropriated for interest and the sinking fund was $975,408, and this amount has continuously been appropriated up to and including the fiscal year 1912.

It is interesting to read the debates preceding the passage of the act of 1879, before quoted. Mr. Blackburn, of Kentucky, who had vigorously advocated the 50 per cent division of expenses between the Government and the District during the debates on the act of 1878, with equal vigor denounced this proposed legislation, claiming that it immediately made the Government responsible for the $22,000,000 of funded debt then in existence. Other gentlemen favored the bill, among them Abram S. Hewitt, of New York, the close friend and adviser of Samuel J. Tilden and at that time chairman of the Democratic national committee, insisting that the language of the act of 1874, pledging the faith of the United States to a proper proportional appropriation to provide the necessary revenue to pay the interest and create a sinking fund, bound the United States absolutely for the whole debt, and that it should not hesitate to have paid out as part of the expenses of the District money sufficient to retire the debt at its maturity. These debates will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 3, 1879, pages 2357 to 2361. And at their conclusion this legislation was agreed to, a yea-and-nay vote being taken, in which the yeas were 148 and the nays 107 and not voting 35. Several of the speakers urged the adoption of this legislation, not only on the ground that the Government was legally obligated but that unless the sinking fund was created the Government would be compelled to pay the whole debt at its maturity; that it was better and more economical to reduce the debt, and thus reduce the interest charge of more than a million dollars, than to merely provide for the interest, as was being done, and allow the principal on the 3.65 bonds to mature all at the same time; that some several million dollars in interest alone would be saved, because if the bonds were not retired there would be a constant payment of practically the amount of the interest charge of the debt of the District as it was July 1, 1878, to wit, $1,015,759.12, whereas by the operation of this sinking fund this charge has been reduced so that on March 3, 1911, it was only $324,426.60, a reduction of more than two-thirds in interest charge alone. Subsequently, to wit, on March 3, 1881, Twenty-first Statutes at Large, page 466, Congress enacted further legislation permitting the Treasurer, as sinking fund commissioner, to purchase the funded indebtedness of the District at any price he thought to be to the best advantage of the District. This in effect amends that portion of the act of March 3, 1879, which fixes the purchase price of bonds at not exceeding the par value thereof. Since that time the Treasurer has purchased the funded debt of the District at the best price he could get, they being quoted at above par. In 1904 it was found that it was very difficult to purchase the bonds of the District at a fair price, and in the District of Columbia appropriation bill for 1904 there was enacted the following:

Any excess of said sum or of sums hereafter appropriated for this purpose over and above the amount required for the payment of the interest on the funded debt of the District of Columbia shall be applied by the Treasurer of the United States to the purchase and redemption of the bonds of the District of Columbia: Provided, That should the Treasurer of the United States at any time be unable to secure bonds of the District of Columbia at a price which he may deem advantageous, he is hereby authorized to invest the amount available for the said sinking fund in the bonds of the United States, the bonds so purchased to be registered in the name of the Treasurer of the United States, trustee for the sinking fund of the District of Columbia, and it shall be the duty of the Treasurer of the United States to collect the interest when due on the bonds so held and to invest the same for account of said sinking fund: Provided further, That the Treasurer of the United States is hereby authorized, by exchange or by sale and reinvestment, to substitute bonds of the District of Columbia for the bonds of the United States so held when he shall deem it to be to the interest of the said sinking fund to do so.

This legislation was enacted for the purpose of compelling the holders of the bonds to part with them at a reasonable price, or, in event of their failure to do so, the money of the sinking fund to be kept active by the purchase of Government bonds which could be exchanged for District bonds whenever the price became proper and just.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Was not the Treasurer, in purchasing these bonds for retirement, limited by the different acts you have quoted to purchase them at par?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I have just read that act, and I have read a subsequent act, which has been construed to give him the right to buy at the most advantageous terms. That is the claim of the Treasurer.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But he has retired those bonds as high as 108.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. They are above par. I think I asked the clerk of the sinking fund, and he said 108.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. They are 106 right now.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I know they are above par.

I have gone to some length in connecting these various pieces of legislation. What I have said I mean as no reflection on the investigations being pursued by the District Committee, but, as a Member of the House, interested in the work of this body, when I began my personal investigation of the claims of the chairman, Mr. JOHNSON, that the Government of the United States was in no way obligated for either the interest or the principal of the 3.65 bonds, I felt it incumbent upon me to lay before the House the various acts of Congress, together with my views as to what was intended by Congress, as to what authority was vested in the Treasurer of the United States to expend the joint funds of the District and Government for the creation of a sinking fund for the purchase of District bonds. Those who give this matter consideration, study this legislation, can come to but one conclusion: First, that the 3.65 bonds were issued under authority of law as set forth in the act of 1874; second, that the faith and credit of the United States was by the same act pledged, by a proper proportional appropriation and by a just taxation of the residents of the District, to pay the interest and create a sinking fund to meet the principal when due; third, that the act of 1878 legalized for the first time a joint partnership between the Government and the District of Columbia on a 50 per cent basis as to all of the expenses of the District of Columbia, that the sinking fund and interest of the District of Columbia were as much part of the current expenses as were any of the expenses of the District; fourth, the act of 1879 specifically provided that out of the joint fund of the District and the United States Government there should be set aside a sum sufficient to meet the interest and to reduce the principal by the creation of a sinking fund on the 3.65 bonds, which are now the only bonds outstanding against the District.

I have taken up the time of this committee with no other intention than to let the different Members who are interested in District matters—the chairman of the committee who has greater interest than anyone else, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], and others—gain an idea of such facts as I have been able to glean by reading the statutes and forming my own conclusions as to their interpretation. I believe these bonds are absolutely valid obligations against the Government and the District, and they should be and are being properly met. Whether or not they should have been paid by the Government does not enter into my contention, but Congress in 1878 or 1879 determined they should be paid, and Congress determined that from 1879 on there should be a permanent annual appropriation and sinking fund for the retirement of bonds and payment of the interest. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman has just read from the act of 1874, which says in substance that the United States Government pledges its faith to pay, according to its proportion, half the expenses of the District of Columbia by such proportionate contributions as Congress may hereafter make. Now, if I understand the gentleman correctly, he means to say by that that Congress then and there agreed to contribute toward the payment of these 3.65 bonds by act of Congress thereafter to be passed?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I say that that pledge bound the United States Government; bound the Government, not Congress. A great many men more able than myself, and greater lawyers, said the same thing, among them being J. C. S. Blackburn, of the gentleman's own State.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman did refer to the act of 1874?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. That is the one I was talking about.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; by which these bonds were to be paid by the District and the Federal Government to such an extent as the Federal Government might thereafter make appropriations to do so.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. By whatever proportional appropriations the Government agreed to make, it not having at that time made any specific arrangement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. By a proper proportional contribution?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Now, then, that was only a contemplation; but when they came to form the permanent agreement between the District and the Federal Government, in 1878, they used this language:

Hereafter the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the interest on the 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia——

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I read that language——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky (continuing):

issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, when the same shall become due and payable; and all amounts so paid shall be credited as a part of the appropriation for the year by the United States toward the expenses of the District of Columbia, as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes; I read that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Showing most conclusively that when Congress came to make the appropriation——

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I yielded to the gentleman for a question, not for a speech. I am perfectly willing that he shall have time, but let him use his own time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then, does the gentleman mean to contend that by the act of 1878—the act which I read—Congress refused to pay its share of one-half on these bonds?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. They say the United States Treasurer shall pay it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But they say when it is paid by the United States Treasurer it shall be deducted from the appropriation.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Further on, in 1879, they changed the law and the entire scheme, and made a permanent annual appropriation for the sinking fund; and that undoubtedly does away with the act of 1878.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Does not that act almost repeat the same language and say that this interest and principal shall come out of the half which the United States Government appropriates?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Oh, no.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I beg your pardon. If you will turn to your own notes, you will find that statement there.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I read that statement repeatedly from the notes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is not here, I will yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I yield, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has not used up all his time yet.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman from Ohio if he is able to inform the House, in view of the difference of opinion as to the meaning of the language of the acts of 1878 and 1879, what was the construction of the acts by Congress at that time, so far as refers to the appropriation?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. It construed it to mean that every year, beginning with the year 1879, they were to appropriate a sum sufficient to pay the interest on the bonds and to create a sinking fund for the absorption of the principal; and they did so, and have done so every year since 1879, up to and including the present fiscal year, 1912.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman please read that section there about the refunding act of 1879? He will find himself contradicted.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. If I am, the gentleman will have plenty of time in which to point it out.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I will first yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. In the method of appropriation pursued at present as to the District, so much is appropriated with a provision that part of it is to be paid out of the Treasury and part of it out of the revenues of the District.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. MANN. How long that has been the practice I do not know.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. That is correct, since 1878.

Mr. MANN. Was that sort of a form, or something substantially similar to it, showing the construction or opinion of Congress that they would appropriate part of this interest out of the general fund in the Treasury and part out of the District revenues, carried in the appropriations at the time, or following the time of the passage of these acts?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Certainly. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BORLAND. I understand the gentleman has cited, in his very able speech, the law justifying the commissioners or the Secretary of the Treasury in paying principal and interest out of the joint revenues of the District and the General Government.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. The Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BORLAND. The Secretary of the Treasury; and the purpose of the gentleman's speech was principally to prove that warrant of law existed for such a method of payment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. That is my idea. I wanted to present the debate, the statutes, and the facts. If I am not correct, and I am sure I am, gentlemen can correct me.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman contend that the faith of the United States is pledged to the holders of the bonds for the payment?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I do not think there is any question about it. The law so provides, and I think it is written right into the bond.

Mr. BORLAND. That the United States is pledged to pay the holders of the bonds?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I think under the moral pledge of the act of 1874 the Government of the United States could be held for the whole amount of the bonds if the District was bankrupt, as it was rapidly becoming in 1874. Of course, that is all a matter of the past now.

Mr. BORLAND. That is, because at the time the bonds were issued in 1874 the United States had formed a provisional government and was practically in charge of the District as receiver.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Under the act of 1874 Congress created a temporary form of government and began readjusting the finances of the District.

Mr. BORLAND. Now, the United States, subsequent to that time, formed a permanent government for the District.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes; in 1878.

Mr. BORLAND. Subsequent to the issue of these bonds.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Four years afterwards.

Mr. BORLAND. And undertook then to form a permanent government and put certain burdens upon the property of the District.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes; and fixed the tax rate.

Mr. BORLAND. Is it the gentleman's contention that the United States is estopped in any way from compelling the District to pay its indebtedness?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. No; I think not. I think that the United States can do pretty nearly anything it wants to with reference to this District.

Mr. BORLAND. And no right on the part of the bondholders to look to the Government of the United States?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. No. As I am informed by people who were here in those days, and who know something about it, at the time this agitation was going on with reference to the liability of the Government, before the bonds became subject to a permanent annual appropriation and before the Government, as I claim, acknowledged its liability to pay half of the principal and interest, these bonds were away below par. I understand that after the sinking fund was created, for some little time, they were still below par, but subsequently, the minute the Government said, "We will pay half of the bond," or, in other words, complied with its pledge of 1874, they went up, and they have been above par most of the time since.

Mr. BORLAND. We are not able to say at this time how much of that debt was inflated.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. No; I imagine it would be very difficult.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman has served on the District Committee in the course of his career in the House?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. And also on the appropriations subcommittee for the District. Does the gentleman know anything about the course of dealing under the former commissioners of the District, by which the floating debt was allowed to increase——

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I do, indeed.

Mr. BORLAND. With the idea that it would be subsequently turned into bonds?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. And half of it saddled on the Government.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I do; and I was one of the Members who helped to put a stop to that by the passage of a law so they could not do it any more.

Mr. BORLAND. I think the gentleman was one of the men that tried to stop it and succeeded.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. And succeeded, and the debt is pretty nearly wiped out. Three years more will see the end of it, and it is being paid out of the District revenues entirely.

Mr. BORLAND. The District decided to increase the floating debt, and the District turned it into bonds.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. They did not say what they would do; they were getting on the books of the United States Government, and were getting mighty close to $3,000,000, when it was discovered that some time or other, if the District did not pay it back, it would have to issue bonds, and Congress stopped the commissioners doing this kind of business, but that was not this board of commissioners. No bonds were ever issued on this debt.

Mr. MANN. And no bonds were ever issued on that.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. No.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I observe that the gentleman read various provisions of law in which the faith and credit of the Government is pledged toward the payment of these bonds and a portion of the interest. Does it not occur to the gentleman's mind that possibly the Government, in the somewhat obscure language which admits of two or three constructions, has placed itself in about the position of an indorser on a promissory note?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. In the position of a guarantor at first, but subsequently acknowledging itself bound equally with the District to retire these bonds.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. In the position of a guarantor, and in case they were not obliged, which possibly and probably they are, in various laws to pay, if the principal defaults, does that still leave the Government in the position not to receive any reimbursement from the principal debtor?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I think not. If the District did not pay its half, the Government could make it pay, because by the Constitution and laws the Government, through its Congress, has exclusive jurisdiction over the District.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Merely pledging the faith of the Government for half-and-half payment of principal and interest, and making the appropriation therefor, does the gentleman consider that that obligates the Government to pay them and seek no compensation from the debtor?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I do not think the gentleman understands my position. The law I base my contention on is one in which the Government agrees to pay half. The payments have been made legally. I do not need to dwell on the justification of the Government in assuming the debt, yet I firmly believe that it ought to pay one-half the District expenses. If Congress wants to change the law, it can do so.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The law, as I have heard it read, simply pledges its faith that this will be paid.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. That is the act of 1874.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Does it say that we will pay it without recourse?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. The act of 1879 says that the Government will pay 50 per cent of the principal and interest.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The gentleman thinks that the language that the Government pledges its faith and credit for the payment of it means an absolute payment without recourse?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. That is the act of 1879.

Mr. SIMS. Was it not a mere gratuity, with no consideration given to the Government, the District of Columbia having suffered nothing but gained something? How can it complain?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. They are not complaining, but I deny that it was a mere gratuity. The Government should bear a just proportion of the expenses of the District government.

Mr. SIMS. Suppose the Government took it back, would not that affect them?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I do not think the Government could. The Government could not say we agree to do a thing and then 35 years later say it had changed its mind.

Mr. SIMS. I do not say that they would ever do it, but what law is there in the way of it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I had no idea whatever of saying anything on this occasion concerning the 3.65 per cent bonds until I saw in an afternoon paper the headline, "TAYLOR answers JOHNSON'S charge against the District." I left the Office Building and came over here to hear Mr. TAYLOR make his speech, which has already been published in the afternoon papers. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. That shows how eager the newspapers are to get a good speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I came over here in order to correct before this audience some wrong impression which the gentleman has attempted to make. Now, he read from the act of 1874 this language:

> And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged that the United States will, by proper proportional appropriations, as contemplated in this act, and by causing to be levied upon the property within said District such taxes as will provide the revenues necessary to pay the interest on said bonds as the same may become due and payable, and create a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof at maturity.

Now, that act of 1874 contemplated such future action as Congress might take in contributing toward the payment of the interest and principal of these 3.65 bonds; but when Congress came four years thereafter for the first time to treat of these 3.65 bonds, instead of making "the proper proportion," as contemplated in the act of 1874, Congress positively refused to do so, and passed this act of 1878:

> Hereafter the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the interest on the 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, when the same shall become due and payable, and all amounts so paid shall be credited as a part of the appropriation for the year by the United States toward the expenses of the District of Columbia as hereinbefore provided.

Now, that means, in my opinion, that the United States Government has not been given credit out of that 50 per cent appropriation each and every year; and, in consequence thereof, the District owes to the Federal Government several millions of dollars. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] has read another act, known as the refunding act of 1879, and there he says that by that act the United States Government did then agree to pay half of both principal and interest. I have in my hand one sheet from the speech which the gentleman from Ohio just read, and I wish to read from his own speech, quoting the act:

> And there is hereby appropriated, out of the proportional sum which the United States may contribute toward the expenses of the District of Columbia, in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 11, 1878, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and annually thereafter, such sums as will, with the interest thereon at the rate of 3.65 per cent per annum, be sufficient to pay the principal of the 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia issued under the act of Congress approved June 30, 1874, at maturity.

Does not that act just read by the gentleman from Ohio say that these advances made by the United States Government shall be appropriated "out of the proportional sum which the United States may contribute toward the expenses of the District of Columbia"? That is as plain as the English language can make it; but, Mr. Chairman, there is this: In 1874 Congress authorized the issue of these 3.65 bonds to pay the debts of the District of Columbia, then amounting to about $22,000,000, and in 1878, four years after, it was discovered that all kinds of debts were being paid by these 3.65 bonds. An old bond issue of 1828, to pay a lottery debt of the city of Washington, was paid by these bonds. Then, in 1876, on March 11, Congress passed an act saying that no more of these bonds should be issued, and no more of them were issued until years afterwards, when, by but little more than implication from another act, the sinking fund commissioners did issue more bonds; and under this sinking-fund act of 1879, to which the gentleman from Ohio has just alluded, it was specifically and emphatically set forth that in the retirement of these bonds they should be retired at par. Yet, in the face of the law, they have been continually retired at a premium. They have been retired as high as 128; and only during this week, in defiance of this law, some of these bonds have been retired at 105.

Under the act of 1895, I believe it is—and I am speaking only from memory—a million and a quarter of these bonds were issued in denominations of $5,000 and $1,000 each, when the act specifically said that they shall be issued in denominations of $50 and $500 each. Consequently, I say there is grave and serious doubt as to the validity of a $1,000 bond, as to the validity of a $5,000 bond, when the act says they shall be issued only in denominations of $50 and $500.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman kindly inform the committee whether these bonds that have been retired were retired before maturity?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. They were all retired before maturity, because none of them will be due until 1924.

Mr. KAHN. Then does not the gentleman think that the purpose of paying the premium was in reality to save interest?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No matter what the object was, I say that it was in open defiance of law. There is no law for their retirement at a premium. I can find no law for the issue of a $1,000 bond or of a $5,000 bond; yet, not by authority of Congress, but by the acts of executive officers the United States Government is to-day being compelled to pay one-half of the interest and one-half of the principal upon the bonded indebtedness of the District of Columbia created as far back as 1828, when she has positively and emphatically refused to do so by statute.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. SIMS. If it had been the purpose and object of Congress to absolutely assume one-half of the debt and interest, and there was to be no recourse on the District, does it not stand to reason the debt would have been divided and the Government issued its bonds for its half and the District had nothing to do with it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; and before these bonds were actually engraved the commissioners laid before the Attorney General of the United States the question as to whether or not they should engrave upon these bonds that they were guaranteed by the United States; and, in a written opinion, the Attorney General told those commissioners that they could not write that on these bonds; but, instead of that, they quoted the act of 1874, and that appears upon these bonds, making it plain that Congress never intended for the United States Government to pay a cent of either the principal or interest upon those bonds. The act authorizing their issue compelled the District of Columbia to even pay for the printing and engraving of them.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. When I was looking up this matter I myself was put to some trouble to try to find some authority for the purchase of these bonds at above par when the act of 1878 specifically stated that they should be retired at par. I found they were being purchased and destroyed at a price above par. After a good deal of trouble I called upon the comptroller, and I find that he had rendered an opinion based upon this statute, with which I think the gentleman is probably familiar.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I am perfectly familiar with it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Without going into it, a statute was passed in 1881 stating—

That hereafter the said Treasurer, as ex officio sinking-fund commissioner as aforesaid, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized and empowered to purchase any of the funded indebtedness of said District of Columbia for the sinking fund authorized to be created for the redemption and payment of the indebtedness of said District of Columbia as in his opinion may be for the best interests of said District of Columbia.

Now, Comptroller Tracewell, I find, rendered an opinion that allowed the Treasurer to buy the bonds known as the 3.65 bonds at prices above par if he saw fit——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; and if the gentleman would only have——

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I cite that as the authority——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman had only given close attention to that which he was reading, he would have found that that opinion says the sinking-fund commissioners and Treasurer may purchase at their option, leaving undisturbed the statute which says the price when purchased shall be at par. And, in addition to that, the opinion which the gentleman has just read from the Comptroller of the Treasury goes way back about 50 years, when the District had a municipal council, and undertakes to prove by an act of the municipal council of the city of Washington that they now have a right to purchase those bonds at a premium, when those bonds had not then been issued, and, in addition to that, when the act which the gentleman cites had been repealed for a quarter of a century.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Is the gentleman aware that under that decision of the comptroller and under the method that has been employed in the retirement of those bonds the annual interest has been reduced from $1,015,000 to $324,000 per annum, saving that much?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. By an illegal accounting of public funds by the executive authorities of this District, submitted to by the Treasury, in taking from the United States millions of dollars to which it was entitled, to do the very thing which you say. Now, as I said, Mr. Chairman, I had no sort of idea when I came upon the floor that I would have one word to say concerning this subject, hoping to address the House at some future day upon this subject, but when I heard the gentleman from Ohio undertake to argue from a standpoint untenable even if his own language be taken, then I felt I should say something before this audience, which perhaps will not be present when I come to address this House upon this subject, which I intend to do at some future day.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. COOPER. One of the most striking statements made by the gentleman embodies a quotation from the law. The gentleman said that the law specifically provided that the bonds should be in denominations of $50 and $500.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes, sir; that is the law, by act of June 20, 1874.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman says that they were issued in denominations of $1,000 and $5,000?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes, sir; some of them were.

Mr. COOPER. Now, that is a most extraordinary thing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Nevertheless that is true, and those $1,000 bonds and $5,000 bonds have been issued in the last 10 or 12 years, if I mistake not.

Mr. COOPER. Well, what explanation has ever been given for that nonobservance of the law?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not know that any has ever been given.

Mr. COOPER. How are these bonds disposed of? How were they issued and to whom, and under what terms?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. These bonds were issued by the District of Columbia and were used in paying the old indebtedness of the District of Columbia prior to 1874.

Mr. COOPER. Who were the first purchasers? Who got them?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have no record as to that, but they were paid to the contractors——

Mr. COOPER. They were purchased at par, were they?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. They were issued to the contractors at par for District scrip and certificates that were then selling for 50 cents on the dollar.

Mr. LOBECK. Even 40 cents.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Unless the gentlemen on that side of the House desire to consume more time——

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is obliged to be absent from the Chamber, and he has asked me to represent him. There is no other gentleman on this side of the House who desires to be heard at this time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD]. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERWOOD. In discussing proposed pension legislation I propose a nonpartisan debate. No pension legislation or any pension bill has ever been discussed in any Democratic caucus since the organization of the Sixty-second Congress, and as chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, or as an individual member, I shall ask for no caucus, but propose to submit a pension bill on its merits, based upon patriotic considerations and the necessity for adequate legislation for meritorious and needy veterans.

I am here to-day advocating the same measure, modified and somewhat liberalized, that I have been contending for on this floor and in the country ever since I introduced the dollar-a-day pension bill in the Sixtieth Congress in December, 1907. Ever since, amid all kinds of opposition and discouragements, I have advocated this measure of justice to the men who stood behind the guns strictly and always on nonpartisan lines. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It was stated on the floor of this House by Gen. Keifer, of Ohio, in an elaborate speech against the dollar-a-day pension bill, that I introduced the measure as a political asset, as a vote getter. In my campaign for Congress in 1908 this speech of Gen. Keifer's, which was really a protest against any more pension legislation at that time, was printed in the National Tribune, a weekly Republican organ printed in Washington,

D. C., devoted, first, to the interests of the Republican Party, and, second, to holding the soldier vote solid for that party. When I protested to Gen. Keifer, during the delivery of his speech, that I never mentioned any pension legislation during my campaign for Congress, he still refused to correct his statement, and the National Tribune, after printing Keifer's attack, refused to make any corrections, not because of any personal animosity toward me, as I was informed, but because they would not stand for a Democrat taking any lead in pension legislation. Hence, this villainous libel was published in the National Tribune in order to nullify and discredit my efforts in behalf of the veterans of the rank and file. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Lo, what a change has four years wrought in the purpose of that brood of mercenaries. In 1907 my pension bill for veterans who had served 18 months was treated with a profound sneer. And yet this bill did not propose to pension a single soldier whose service was less than 18 months. And now, I desire to explain why I first introduced the dollar-a-day pension bill. In February, 1907, the Fifty-ninth Congress passed the first age pension bill that ever passed Congress since the birth of the Republic. It is the first age pension bill that ever passed any parliamentary or deliberative body in any country around the world since civilization was evolved out of the womb of the dead centuries. This bill pensioned a soldier in proportion to his age, with no regard whatever to his service to his country or to his State. It pensioned a soldier who served 90 days in a home camp in thousands of cases more than the soldier who served in 40 battles and at the front through the whole four years' war. Right here and now I want to call the attention of every Member on this floor, and on both sides of the House, that the charge against me that I started or inaugurated the agitation among the rank and file is not true. It was the age pension bill of 1907 that first fomented this dissatisfaction with pension legislation. And this bill passed Congress three months after my election to Congress in 1906, and five or six months before I conceived the idea of a dollar a day for veterans, and over nine months before I took my seat in this House. I can explain to the satisfaction of every reasonable gentleman on this floor why I introduced the dollar-a-day bill in December, 1907.

In the autumn of 1907 I attended, as has been my custom for over 35 years, the reunions of many of the veteran regiments of Ohio. I mean by veteran regiments those that were mustered in for three years or during the war. I remember attending the Fourteenth, Sixty-seventh, Sixty-eighth, One hundredth, and One hundred and eleventh Ohio regimental reunions, all veteran regiments, and there was general dissatisfaction and discontent over the age-pension bill that in hundreds of noted cases pensioned the 90-day men from five to eight dollars per month more than the men who stood behind the guns in the serried battle lines for four terrible years. I was appealed to pathetically by these old veterans to try and remedy this outrageous inequality. I took the first opportunity to study the various pension laws of Congress since the Civil War, and I found there was not a line of legislation especially in the interest of the men who bore the brunt of battle. The dollar-a-day pension bill for veterans was the result. Because I happened to be a Democrat and happened to be the first Member of Congress to introduce a pension bill, based on service and sacrifice, the National Tribune has, for over four years, used its best endeavors to misrepresent and discredit all my efforts in behalf of the veterans.

I want to call attention to and emphasize the fact that no age-pension law, civil or military, in any country, civilized, pagan, or Mohammedan, was ever passed, either before or since this pension law of 1907, based solely on age. No such law can be successfully defended either on moral, economical, or patriotic grounds. In fact, I have failed up to date to hear or read one valid argument in support of such special class legislation.

Count Bismarck, the ablest practical statesman of the nineteenth century on either continent, inaugurated old-age pensions in the German Empire in 1889 as a humane movement among the workers to check the growth of socialism, but no laboring man or wageworker was available for the old-age pension who had not previously contributed to the pension fund for 20 years. England has recently enacted an age-pension law, based upon service, with the age limit fixed at a period when the beneficiary is no longer able to perform manual labor. Sweden has an old-age pension law on a similar basis. So has Australia and New Zealand—all on the merit or service basis. In New Zealand a wageworker who has served the State for 25 years is pensioned for life at the rate of $90 a year, provided he has no other income. The Chicago & Northwestern Railroad inaugurated an old-age pension in 1900, pensioning employees of 30 years' service who reach the age of 70 years. This pension is 1 per cent of the average monthly pay.

They, however, do not pension men who served the company 90 days. The Lake Shore, the Pennsylvania, and other trunk lines have adopted service pensions for faithful employees when their days of usefulness are past. All based on long service. Conductors or engineers who serve but 90 days are excluded. We have bills before Congress that are meritorious, pensioning the old and faithful clerks who have served the Government for a quarter of a century, but no Congressman has yet made himself ridiculous by proposing to pension a 90-day clerk the same as the veteran clerk with the record of a quarter of a century.

In this connection let me say that House bill No. 1, approved by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and the only bill that has any show to become a law, makes liberal and ample provisions for the short-term soldiers. It pensions a soldier who served 90 days, at $15 per month; six months, at $20; the nine months' soldier gets $25 and the soldier who served one year or over receives $30 a month. The dollar-a-day rate is the same as in my dollar-a-day bill of 1909, which required a service of one year or more to secure any increase over prevailing rates. I want to call particular attention to some vital features of House bill No. 1 that are wanting in the so-called Sulloway bill, recently smothered and killed in the Senate.

House bill No. 1 provides a maximum pension of $30 per month for all who were either wounded or disabled in the service, even if they did not serve 90 days. A brigade of Sherman's army on the Atlanta campaign, known as Gen. Hovey's brigade, came to that army fresh from the mustering officers. Their first charge was at Resaca, Ga., May 15, 1864, and they were in the charge on Kenesaw Mountain and all the battles up to Atlanta. Over one-fourth were wounded or disabled and mustered out before they had served 90 days. Not one of these "old boys" can get a dollar of pension under any of the age-pension bills, because they did not serve 90 days. The emergency men who in the terrible crisis that confronted the Union arms in the decisive battle of Gettysburg can not get a dollar of pension under the 90-day age-pension bills, and there are thousands of worthy and needy and deserving soldiers who did valuable emergency service and were disabled in that service, who will be paid pensions by House bill No. 1 at $30 per month, who are barred out by all the so-called age-pension bills.

The House Committee on Invalid Pensions carefully considered all the conditions in which the old soldiers of to-day are environed and have inserted a disability section in the dollar-a-day service bill. A majority of the committee believe that any pension bill like the Sulloway bill or the Anderson bill, which provides a pension of $36 per month for a soldier who served only 90 days and is 75 years old, and allows a three-year veteran, who served all through the war, to draw only $15 per month, because he went to the war when a mere boy, is neither charity, justice, nor patriotism. Here is another very valuable consideration: Last year the Government paid out over $701,000 for medical examiners. Under House bill No. 1 nearly all these boards can be abolished without detriment to the service, as under House bill No. 1 there will be no occasion for a medical examination, as every soldier will be paid on his service, with the exception of only one section of the bill.

We also paid out last year over $300,000 for special pension examiners, making in all considerably over $1,000,000, nearly all of which can be saved and the money paid direct to the soldiers, because there will be no necessity whatever for examining boards, as the exact status of every soldier is fixed by this law; it is fixed on his service and can not be either raised or reduced by the action of any medical board or special pension examiners. This is an important feature, as a million dollars now spent on useless boards can be paid direct to the old soldiers.

Many prosperous and well-to-do soldiers have written me seriously objecting to the section which bars a soldier with a net income of $1,000 a year or over from the benefits of this act. I will say that this amendment was suggested by one of my Republican friends, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], and after full debate in the committee was voted into the bill, with only two dissenting votes. So far as I am concerned, I favor giving the whole House the opportunity for a separate vote on this section.

I am in receipt of a large number of letters from representative soldiers on the outrageous inequality of pension laws based on age. Under date of June 19, 1911, Comrade W. S. Sellers, of Xenia, Ohio, writes as follows:

Your service bill will do away with medical boards and special examiners and pension attorneys. We have been fed on chaff and promises long enough. What we want is action. Just recently here several pensions have been granted at $24 per month to men who enlisted in the same company that I belonged to, men who did not serve at the front at all, and those of us who stood through thick and thin during the whole war are getting $12 a month, and another getting $24 who was never in line of battle. I can give you the names of at least 20 such.

The universal discontent among the veterans over the age pension law of February, 1907, was in active evidence from ocean to ocean as soon as the telegraph flashed the news that my dollar-a-day bill had been introduced in Congress in December, 1907. It was the most active, spontaneous, and universal movement among the veterans of the Civil War ever before witnessed in all of the 42 years since the war. When I addressed the House on this bill on February 26, 1908, I had the honor to present the greatest array of petitions from veteran soldiers ever seen on this floor. I quote from the RECORD just what I said on that occasion, and the claim has never been disputed:

I have here now seven great rolls of petitions, each 500 feet long, from soldiers who fought the battles of the war. I have strung these local petitions together, and I will ask my friends to assist me in unrolling only one of them. You can see they are all headed differently and all prepared at home. Many of them are on cheap paper, written by trembling hands, in pencil. Many of them are written on both sides. No two are alike. This, you see, is only one of seven of these great petitions. It has been unrolled and stretched up the aisle here to the back of the Hall, around the railing, and back down another aisle.

It took three stout men to carry these rolls of petitions from the House Office Building to the Capitol. Besides, I presented the indorsements of some 3,000 Grand Army posts and soldier organizations, representing, all told, some 150,000 soldiers, including 7,000 inmates of State and National Soldiers' Homes. But, notwithstanding this tremendous array of petitions, and nearly 7,000 appealing letters from veterans besides, I could not even get a vote on my bill in the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

And now I beg leave to inquire, seriously and earnestly, what has become of these seven rolls of soldier petitions in favor of my dollar-a-day bill that were referred to the Invalid Pensions Committee. These petitions should be still alive and strident, as the committee never would allow a vote on the bill—not one in all these four aggravating and anxious years. These petitions have disappeared. They can not be found. Is it possible that the timid statesmen of the committee who refused me a vote on my dollar-a-day pension bill because they thought it would bankrupt the Treasury are the same statesmen who are now clamoring for an impossible pension bill that is conceded will take over $25,000,000 more out of the Treasury than my dollar-a-day bill for veterans?

What was the editor of the National Tribune, the pretended organ for soldiers, doing and saying all these four years? He was doing all in his power to discredit my dollar-a-day bill. He did not even make a mild request of the Invalid Pensions Committee to give this beneficent and universally demanded measure a vote. And when the National Encampment of the Grand Army met in my home town—Toledo, Ohio—the same year, 1908, the program fixers of that encampment left me off the program at all the camp fires, and went out of their way to humiliate me by inviting Gen. Keifer to speak at two camp fires, because he had attacked me and my dollar-a-day pension bill on the floor of Congress.

What was the result? In the following November election I was elected to Congress by 2,327 majority, over a Republican who four years before carried the same district by 18,648 majority.

In the following year in the State encampment at Newark, Ohio, the State commander, Gen. Hall, aided by the organization, suppressed all resolutions of the Grand Army posts of Ohio indorsing my dollar-a-day bill, and under the rules adopted these resolutions passed by the men of the rank were not even allowed to be read. When I attempted to be heard I was rapped down by the chairman's gavel. As a result of this, Mark Armstrong Post, of Lima, Ohio, one of the big Grand Army of the Republic posts of Ohio—112 strong—called a meeting and by formal resolution indorsed my dollar-a-day bill and also denounced State Commander Hall, a citizen of Lima and a member of the post, who was present. The resolution denouncing State Commander Hall in his own post was adopted with only 2 dissenting votes, 1 of which was cast by Gen. Hall. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Gen. Hall did not win his stars as a brigadier general in the war, but by gallant conduct in the G. O. P. 40 years afterwards. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I give you this record to prove that what happens at a State or national encampment may be one thing, and what happens in a Grand Army post, where the men who stood behind the guns are in evidence, may be a far-away different proposition.

Before that great national encampment in Toledo adjourned, on the last day, when nearly all the rank and file had left for their homes, the "house of lords," high officials who are delegates for life (usually the dominating force), adopted a resolution declaring that the Grand Army of the Republic would ask for no more pension legislation for three years. This was done to effectually squelch the humble soldier Congressman, the author of the dollar-a-day bill. This was not done because of personal animosity toward me, as many of my best friends are members of the "house of lords" [laughter], but simply because they are Republicans and could not afford to give any recognition to a Democrat in pension legislation. [Laughter.] The editor of the National Tribune was there, active in that turndown of the author of the dollar-a-day bill—the same editor that is now howling week after week, like a yellow dog with the rabies, in favor of an impossible pension bill [laughter], a bill that he knows would not even be considered in the Senate; a bill carrying from five to seven million dollars more money than the Sulloway bill, that was smothered and killed in the Senate in the last Congress; a bill without a disability clause to take care of those wounded or disabled in battle or in line of duty; a bill pensioning a soldier who served 90 days $36 per month at 75 years of age, while the four-year veteran of 30 battles, who went into the Army as a patriotic boy of 16 or 17 years, would get $15, or less than one-half as much; a bill that proposes to pension a soldier's widow who "cohabits" with an old soldier (cohabits is the language of the bill) for three years previous to his death, for life, at $12 per month. For instance, a young girl of 18 marries an old soldier at 67, and he dies at 70; this young woman is pensioned for life, and is liable to be on the pension roll for 50 years unless she remarries.

I am in favor of liberal pensions for soldiers' widows, and of extending the marriage limit, but a bill of this character should be carefully considered in committee and reported separately. All the old soldiers I hear from say, "Take care of the worthy and needy old veterans first." I quote extracts from a letter from a representative soldier, one out of many of the same import. It is from a veteran now 82 years old, Comrade A. B. Cherry, of Alva, Okla., late of Battery D, Third New York Artillery. This letter is addressed to John McElroy, of the National Tribune, with request that it be published:

I think if I wanted to defeat all pension legislation I would solicit your support in favor of it. I am sure this Government (Congress) will not allow a few thousand spring pullets to be foisted on the pension rolls for 50 years.

[Laughter.]

I don't think you do either. Your equipment has helped the sale of Si Klegg and Brady pictures and your soldier colony scheme, but very many old soldiers begin to think it is more John McElroy than interest in the old comrades. In fact, Mr. McElroy, your extreme demand has certainly prejudiced some of the best friends of the Union soldiers against the whole pension system. Do you mean this taffy to deceive the poor, credulous, and ignorant, and thusly increase your opportunities to speculate off of them?

This reference to pensioning spring pullets for life refers to young girls marrying old soldiers on their last legs. [Laughter.] A real soldier's widow is graphically described by our Ohio poet, Thomas Buchanan Read:

The wife who girds her husband's sword,
Mid little ones who weep and wonder,
And bravely speaks the cheering word,
What though her heart be rent asunder,
Doomed nightly in her dreams to hear
The bolts of death around him rattle,
Has shed as sacred blood as e'er
Was poured upon the field of battle.

[Applause.]

A baby born 26 years after the war, and who marries an old soldier 46 years after the war, is hardly in this class so touchingly described by our Ohio poet. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

In a letter addressed to the chairman of the Invalid Pensions Committee, from W. D. McLaughlin, a veteran of the Third Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, dated at Oswego, Kans., May 15, 1911, a representative soldier of Kansas, was inclosed to me a copy of a communication sent to the editor of the National Tribune, which he evidently never printed. The National Tribune has been calling upon the chairman of the Invalid Pensions Committee to state what was said about pension legislation in the Democratic caucus, when he knows, of course, that pension legislation was not mentioned in that caucus, either by myself or by any other Democrat, and should not have been, as it is not a party measure. Here I quote extracts from Comrade McLaughlin's letter addressed to the National Tribune:

It seems to me that much of your present criticism of Gen. SHERWOOD is uncalled for. * * * In sharp contrast to your present demand for immediate action, I can but remember the degree of patience and moderation you displayed during the first regular session of the Sixty-first Congress. Just previous to its convening you had given some sledge-hammer strokes, urging the great injustice of further delay, but when it became apparent that Congress was hostile to any general pension legislation, urging then, as now, the impoverished condition of the Treasury, you abandoned your aggressive attitude. In proof of this statement I refer the reader to an article which appeared in the National Tribune February, 1910, entitled, "A plain talk with comrades." Also to a reply in the Tribune of February 24, 1910, by Comrade George E. Place, in which he says:

"Your editorial, 'A plain talk with comrades,' was read with amazement. It is not in line with your past serious work for the soldiers."

Which reminds me of another comrade who read your article, threw down the paper, and exclaimed, "McElroy has laid down." Reverting back to the work of the Sixty-first Congress—it was in session about seven months—Mr. SULLOWAY was chairman of the Invalid Pensions Committee, and though pension bills galore were introduced not one of them was reported out of the committee; and it was only after the dominant party was hopelessly beaten in the election last fall that the lower House of Congress, like Paul on his journey to Damascus, saw a great light and suddenly awoke from its Rip Van Winkle sleep to the terrible injustice of further delay in relieving the wants of our destitute comrades. The principle to which Gen. SHERWOOD has steadily adhered, of granting pensions according to length of service, is, I believe, correct. * * * In conclusion I would say I would be glad to see every honorably discharged soldier and sailor of the Civil War get a pension of $30 a month. But such a bill could not pass either House of Congress or receive the sanction of the President. So that it is not altogether a question of what ought to be done, but rather what can be done. I fully believe the House Invalid Pensions Committee is wise enough and patriotic enough to form and report a measure that will give all the relief that can possibly be obtained under present conditions, and a careful reading of Gen. SHERWOOD'S letters of April 27 and May 11 leads me to believe that this will be done in the near future. In the meantime let us not indulge in any unnecessary criticism.

W. D. MCLAUGHLIN,
Company B, Third Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry,
Oswego, Kans.

In a letter addressed to the chairman of the Invalid Pensions Committee, of the same date, Comrade McLaughlin writes:

Yours is the only bill that gives any preference to the men who really did the work. While it will not take so much money as the Sulloway or Anderson bills, it puts it where it is needed the worst and will do the greatest good. Many of the comrades here are disgusted with McElroy's everlasting criticism upon every point in your bill, and every move you make. It is done for political purposes, and that only. Where the Tribune a few years ago had a large list of subscribers here, they can now all be counted on the fingers of one hand.

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Comrade John D. Wood, of St. Paul, Minn., said to be a high-class citizen and record soldier, writes a very interesting letter on the pension question. It is in line with hundreds of other letters from veterans, and reflects the average view of all fair-minded and intelligent soldiers. I quote an extract from Comrade Wood's letter:

I congratulate the Invalid Pensions Committee on the indorsement of your bill as against the Sulloway or Anderson bills, so highly lauded by John McElroy and his discredited gang of stand-pat Republicans. Your bill deals more justly with the old soldiers, the taxpayers, and the Government than either of the others. The commendable feature of your bill is it recognizes service. Another consideration is that it conforms more nearly to the recommendation of the last national encampment of the Grand Army as to cost than the Sulloway bill, which the Senate turned down and killed, or the Anderson bill, which meets with so much favor at the hands of McElroy and his gang of coconspirators.

[Laughter.]

I think your bill should be reported out from the committee, and as soon as its provisions are generally known it would be so universally indorsed as to discourage any attempt to revive the Sulloway bill or any other bill of that character. At the same time it would very effectually dispose of the opposition of McElroy and his gang.

Capt. J. W. Gilges, of Leavenworth, Kans., a three and one-half year veteran, who served as private, lieutenant, and captain, a prominent representative citizen and soldier, now the commander of the Loyal Legion of the State of Kansas, writes as follows, under date of July 14, 1911:

I take the National Tribune, and have noticed its very unjust attack upon your pension bill. It seems to be a 90-day man's pension with him or none. For my part, I think your bill the most equitable and fair of all bills on pensions. I was a Union soldier for nearly four years—private, first lieutenant, and captain. Since the war I have been many times commander of the G. A. R. post here, and at the present time commander of the Kansas Commandery of the Loyal Legion.

If by expressing my opinion of your bill and sympathy for you while under this unjust attack can be of any benefit to you, which I hope it may, I will be amply paid for my trouble.

Yours, very respectfully, J. W. GILGES.

I am in receipt of hundreds of letters from representative soldiers of the Middle West of like tone and import. I quote an extract from Comrade John W. Lanley, of St. Louis, Mo., dated July 16, 1911:

I note the National Tribune is getting real ugly and very unfair in criticizing your pension bill. John McElroy is doing the old soldiers who served two, three, or more years a great injustice. The man who enlisted in 1861 and served three years and endured all the hardships of camp life gets less under the McElroy-Anderson bill than the man who stayed at home until the last year of the war and then went out under the 100-day call and served in a home camp 90 days, and drew a big State and county bounty. He gets double the pension under this age-pension system of McElroy's, because he was 30 or 35 years old when he enlisted. In other words, the boys who did the fighting at the front get $12 per month and the stay-at-home gets $20, and $25, and $36. I do not blame this Congress for not taking up pension legislation at this session. Those who read know better. John McElroy's teachings don't take. He had better keep quiet, as he is creating more trouble than is necessary.

[Laughter.]

Pass House bill No. 1, based on sacrifice, on service, and on merit, and no Cabinet officer would dare to go over to Philadelphia, or any other city, and say the pension roll is no longer a roll of honor. Why did Secretary of the Treasury MacVeagh say that in Philadelphia? Why did he depart from the text of his address in Philadelphia to make such a startling and terrible statement? It is because of such legislation as I have referred to. No such damaging charge was ever before made by a Cabinet officer since the close of the great war. Suppose a Democratic Cabinet officer, or Senator, or Congressman, had made such a statement; does anyone suppose the National Tribune would have been silent? The Sulloway bill was passed on the 10th of January, 1911. It was held up in the Senate Pensions Committee for 52 days before reported out. The National Tribune editorially apologized for this remarkable and unprecedented action, which, as we all know, killed the bill.

And the National Tribune resorted to a transparent falsehood in a statement that all pension legislation must originate in the House. Of course, the Tribune knows that the last general pension law which passed Congress, the McCumber bill, originated in the Senate. While the Invalid Pensions Committee of the House has repeatedly met and has framed a pension bill and approved it, and authorized the chairman to report it out for the earliest possible action, the Senate Pensions Committee has never met, has never been called together, and official notice has been given that there will be no pension bills even considered during this extra session. And the National Tribune editor has no harsh words of criticism for this nonaction, but is devoting all his recently engendered animosity, born of disappointed hopes, in making false statements and vilifying the chairman of the Invalid Pensions Committee. [Applause.]

This is because the chairman happens to be a Democrat who has been trying to do something reasonable and patriotic to alleviate his old comrades in distress and want during the past four years and is now about to succeed. [Applause.] The best informed soldiers in and out of the Grand Army do not believe the editor of the National Tribune wants any satisfactory legislation. He wants agitation, but not action. The dollar-a-day bill, if enacted, will practically settle all pension legislation for five years or more. This the editor of the National Tribune does not want. The circulation of his newspaper depends upon having pension legislation pending. He desires to further exploit himself as a parasite on the credulous old soldiers. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] The value of his newspaper plant depends upon his circulation. With the pension question settled, he could not command a big contribution from either any State or national Republican executive committee for the influence of his paper to fool the old soldiers into voting wrong with promises of liberal pension legislation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In the Ohio campaign when Gov. Pattison, a Democratic soldier with a splendid record, ran against Myron T. Herrick, a citizen Republican, the National Tribune supported Herrick.

As I was reliably informed at the time, over 75,000 copies of the National Tribune were circulated weekly in that campaign—mailed to the soldiers of Ohio. It is generally conceded that the fight made against that gallant soldier, Pattison, by the National Tribune aided greatly in his triumphant election. [Laughter and applause.] Again, in 1910, the National Tribune made a strong and vigorous contest to elect Gen. J. Kent Hamilton in my district, the ninth Ohio. Gen. Hamilton was a fine soldier during the war and is a high-class citizen, and was at that time, 1910, the vice commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic of all the States. Besides the National Tribune he had the strong backing of very wealthy friends. He is also wealthy. A campaign fund of $27,000 (as a prominent Republican tells me) was raised and a systematic effort was made to array the short-term soldiers against the long-service soldiers in my district, which is usually more than 10,000 Republican. The November election showed the biggest Democratic majority for Congressman ever before given in that district, by over 2,300. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Gen. Hamilton is a brilliant orator and campaigner, but the National Tribune handicap was too much for him.

Let me show you by official figures that can not be made to lie just what the soldiers and the voters think of the two pension systems. In the Springfield, Ohio, district the veteran soldier and Congressman, Gen. Keifer, ran against a civilian in the campaign of 1910. He stood on a platform which he wrote himself, denouncing my dollar-a-day pension bill for veterans as demagogery, and he defended the age pension law of 1907. He was beaten by over 3,000 in a strong Republican district, running, as I learn, 6,000 behind his ticket. In the Toledo district, which was formerly Republican by 10,000, and which was Republican on eight State officers last November on an average of over 3,000, notwithstanding the tremendous Republican slump my majority over one of the most popular Republican soldiers in the district was 2,317.

I commend a careful study and consideration of these statistics by all members of this House who are scanning the political heavens to discern the better way and avoid the pitfalls and mistakes which wrecked Gen. Keifer, Ohio's most distinguished Republican soldier.

I simply quote these facts to show the popularity of the two systems of pensions. [Laughter.] I commend a careful study and consideration of these statistics by all Members of this House who are scanning the political heavens to discern the better way and avoid the pitfalls and mistakes which wrecked Gen. Keifer, Ohio's most distinguished Republican soldier.

I had no campaign treasurer, no campaign secretary, and no campaign fund, and never wrote a letter to a soldier asking him to vote for me, neither did I ever in person ask any soldier for either his support or his vote. And no man, Democrat or Republican, ever gave me one dollar to aid in my campaign. Two of the leading Grand Army men of the United States, both of them long-service and conspicuous soldiers, both of them having held high positions in the Grand Army, told me quite recently that Mr. McElroy of the National Tribune did not want any permanent pension law passed, as it would hurt the circulation of his paper.

The Grand Army bill, adopted by the national encampment, which met at Atlantic City last year, is a very moderate bill, with practically the same disability section that is found in House bill No. 1. This was agreed to after a full debate. It is also stated to me on reliable authority that Mr. McElroy of the National Tribune agreed to support that bill, and did support it editorially some weeks after the close of the encampment. Then suddenly he dropped the Grand Army bill and commenced the advocacy of another bill of his own—a bill that he knew was impossible to pass. And when Congress met in extra session April 4, 1911, and for a month thereafter, the Grand Army bill was not even introduced. It is conceded now that if the Grand Army bill had been reported out for passage on January 10, 1911, instead of the Sulloway bill, it would have passed both Houses of Congress, and would now be a law.

Corporal Tanner, the legless soldier, possibly the most influential and popular soldier of the Grand Army now living, told me quite recently that there never was any chance for the Sulloway bill to pass the Senate. And this opinion is generally held by every intelligent soldier. And the charge is made, and is being made by high authority, that the action of the National Tribune in abandoning the Grand Army bill at a critical time and substituting an impossible bill is responsible for the fact that the Republican Party, in the last days of its authority in Congress, failed to pass any pension legislation whatever.

Why did the National Tribune repudiate the official bill of the Grand Army of the Republic and substitute another and entirely different bill on the lines of the Sulloway bill? It was because the editor knew that the Grand Army bill, being a moderate bill, and with a humane provision to take care of the wounded and disabled, was reasonably sure to pass Congress, and with the pension question settled his occupation as a disturber, as an agitator, and as an alms seeker before the Republican executive committees would be gone. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

The old veterans, thousands of whom are tottering to a nearby grave, all worthy, all needy, can charge the failure of pension legislation in the last Congress to this self-exploiting editor, who, for considerations entirely mercenary, aided in defeating the only possible hope of immediate relief by the passage of the Grand Army bill. In further and full verification of this statement I call attention to the fact that at a public hearing before the Committee on Invalid Pensions, on May 5, 1911, Gen. S. S. Burdett, chairman of the national committee on pensions of the Grand Army of the Republic, said. I quote from the official report of that hearing:

When asked why it was that the National Tribune, which was the official organ of the Grand Army of the Republic, had indorsed the encampment bill immediately after the encampment, and asked all comrades to work for it, that this organ very shortly got behind a bill prepared by the editor and dropped the encampment bill, Gen. Burdett said that the National Tribune was not the organ of the Grand Army of the Republic, and that the editor of the National Tribune had apparently not been faithful to his comrades in the Grand Army, because he had advocated and asked the comrades to advocate the Grand Army bill, and very shortly took up another bill, evidently with the intention of creating confusion among the old soldiers.

On being asked by Mr. RUSSELL, of the Invalid Pensions Committee, what he thought of House bill No. 1, he said it was certainly the sort of legislation he had stood for for the past 35 years. He said, "I am here as the mouthpiece of the Grand Army of the Republic; therefore, speaking officially, I can say nothing for any bill except the one I am sent here to represent. Speaking as an individual, I will say that I am in favor of the principle of the Sherwood bill or any bill based on service.

He further stated during the course of his remarks that it was well known to the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic that the Sulloway bill would never pass the Senate when it was introduced, and that the author of the bill was so advised and was well aware of the fact. He also said that previous to the introduction of the Sulloway bill he had received some 900 individual letters indorsing the Grand Army bill and petitions from 60 posts indorsing the bill, but that when the Sulloway bill was introduced and copies of it sent broadcast over the country, and it was boosted by the National Tribune, that the same men who had originally indorsed the Grand Army bill then indorsed the Sulloway bill because it was more liberal, and that if any member of the Invalid Pensions Committee or any Member of Congress were to introduce a bill carrying twice or three times the amount even of the Sulloway bill, it would receive greater indorsement than any other bill ever introduced.

Gen. Burdett's statement that Editor McElroy abandoned the Grand Army bill after promising to support it and substituted a bill of his own fully verifies all I have said—that the editor of the National Tribune is acting in bad faith; that he is seeking to create a division among the old soldiers in order to defeat all pension legislation in this Congress. [Applause.]

Gen. S. S. Burdett is an ex-Republican Member of Congress from Illinois, a high-class soldier with a record, formerly commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic and now a high-class citizen. At the same hearing Gen. Burdett said:

If you send over to the Senate a bill like the Sulloway bill or the Anderson bill it will mean that there will be no pension legislation, because no such bill can be passed. If you really want to do something to help the old soldiers, give them a reasonable bill.

Gen. Burdett, when he made this statement, looked straight at the supposed author of the Anderson bill. Why did not that gentleman, who claims to favor liberal pension legislation now, ask Gen. Burdett the reason for his official opinion? He knew that Gen. Burdett was the best-informed official on the pension situation, in the Senate and in the White House, in the United States. The gentleman from Ohio, who is known to be in league with the Republican editor of the National Tribune to embarrass the party that has honored him with two elections to Congress and to discredit the majority of the committee of which he is a member and to worry and insult the chairman of that committee, did not care to have Gen. Burdett tell him that he was engaged in a movement to divide and disrupt the Grand Army comrades in order to defeat all reasonable pension legislation. But I am not done with these discredited fomenters of trouble. I have other evidence of their despicable duplicity. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

I have in my hand a letter from Gen. John E. Gilman, the present commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic. He is one of the foremost Republicans of Massachusetts and one of the most conspicuous and revered soldiers in New England. He was wounded at Chancellorsville and lost his good right arm in the great Battle of Gettysburg. Before I decided to use this letter I consulted Corpl. Tanner, formerly commander in chief of the Grand Army and probably the best-known soldier in the United States. I showed him the letter and asked him if there would be any impropriety in using it for the benefit of all the comrades. He advised me to use it.

Here is the letter. You see it is written on the letter head of the national organization of the Grand Army and addressed to me as a Member of Congress and signed by J. E. Gilman, commander in chief. Let me read you what he says:

HEADQUARTERS GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC,
OFFICE OF COMMANDER IN CHIEF,
State House, Boston, Mass., April 20, 1911.

Hon. ISAAC R. SHERWOOD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

It is with more than usual interest that I read your views on the pension possibilities in Congress. They are in such accord with my own opinions that I read them with some surprise, for I thought you were pledged to a large but impracticable pension bill.

I agree with you, and Gen. Burdett will agree with you, that it is absurd to put through a pension bill in the House that will call for such a large appropriation that it will not pass the Senate. By doing that we are scattering our influence and are preventing the passage of a moderate bill which would have some show to become a law.

I have no control of the National Tribune. If I had, the views expressed in your letter would be spread in its columns rather than the present unreasonable demands for an impossible pension bill. I shall ask Gen. Burdett, chairman of the national pension committee, to consult with you, and I know you will receive him in the proper spirit.

With kind regards, I am,
Fraternally yours, in F., C., and L.,
J. E. GILMAN,
Commander in Chief.

[Applause.]

You can not fail to see that he agrees absolutely with Gen. Burdett, that it would be fatal to all legislation in this Congress for the House to pass a bill like the Anderson or Sulloway bill. I call your attention to another vital paragraph in this letter wherein Gen. Gilman states that if he had control of the National Tribune the views expressed in my letter to Gen. Gilman would be spread in its columns. What was the letter I wrote Gen. Gilman? It was a letter inclosing a copy of my bill, House bill No. 1, and saying I was going to try to pass that bill on one that had the best show to become a law. I also invited him to come before our committee and give his views on pension legislation as the authorized representative and commander in chief of the Grand Army of the Republic.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The control of the time is in the hands of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. SHERWOOD. I think I can conclude in about eight minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio 10 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Vermont?

Mr. SHERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I hope the gentleman, before he finishes, will give us some figures and estimates.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I have those estimates, and I will print them. I want to say that the estimates for the 1st of July, 1911, are not yet in. Three or four districts are yet wanting, and I want to get the figures as complete as possible before I print. I have given that matter a good deal of attention.

Mr. KENDALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERWOOD. I fear I shall not have time to finish my speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SHERWOOD. In the last Congress I voted and worked for the Sulloway bill. But before it was introduced I appealed to the chairman of the Invalid Pensions Committee to insert the disability section of the Grand Army bill, indorsed by the national encampment in 1910, giving $1 a day to the maimed, crippled, or disabled veterans. This appeal was refused. I still supported the bill because it would, if enacted, succor thousands of worthy and deserving veterans, even if the relief involved rank inequality. But now, knowing, as every Member on this floor knows, that no such bill as the Sulloway bill can pass either the Senate or the White House, I am for a bill based upon merit and service and patriotic considerations and one that has a reasonable chance of becoming a law. It is due the Members of this House, as well as the old soldiers, to know the history of House bill No. 1, now the bill of the Invalid Pensions Committee, and ready to be placed on the Calendar for the earliest possible vote. As the number indicates, this is the first general bill introduced in this Congress. The same week this bill was introduced I sent a signed communication to the National Tribune, asking for a general expression on proposed legislation from all soldiers of the Civil War. I said also in that article that any bill the majority of the committee approved I would support. At the first informal meeting of the committee, on April 28, I made an open statement to all the members of the committee present that every member, Democrat and Republican, would have an equal vote and voice in framing a general pension bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The next meeting of the committee was on the 5th of May, a regular called meeting, of which every member of the committee was notified by letter. In the meantime, that no charge of party bias could be made, I employed a well-known Republican, late secretary of a leading Republican Congressman, to sort and classify the hundreds of letters daily received by the committee from old soldiers.

This gentleman classified and placed these letters in separate files for the information and scrutiny of every member of the committee. Do not fail to remember that no appeals, no circulars, no letters were sent to one single soldier in the United States asking for support of the dollar-a-day bill, known as House bill No. 1. And do not fail to remember also that the only letter or communication sent to any newspaper in the United States was the one sent to the National Tribune, a newspaper that for four years has been hostile to the dollar-a-day bill. The result was, as every member of the committee must admit, that the letters indorsing House bill No. 1 outnumbered all the other indorsements of other bills more than three to one. After a general debate, in which every member of the committee was free to participate, a formal vote was taken, resulting in 2 votes for the Adair bill, 1 for the Sulloway bill, 1 for the Anderson bill, and 7 for the dollar-a-day bill, known as House bill No. 1. Thus the dollar-a-day bill became the duly approved bill of the Invalid Pensions Committee.

I appeal to every honorable gentleman on this floor whether there could have possibly been a fairer method. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANDERSON], who is a member of the committee and who is now seeking to discredit the chairman of the committee and to embarrass the Democratic majority of this House by tactics unfair and futile and discreditable, knows that not one single Republican voted or would vote for his bill in committee. He has formed an alliance with the editor of the National Tribune, and organized a publicity bureau to criticize and malign the chairman of the committee and embarrass and injure his own party, which has twice elected him to Congress. The editor of the National Tribune sought to dictate to the Ways and Means Committee of this House the chairman of the Invalid Pensions Committee, but failed, as his choice was the bottom man on the committee and not the soldier of any war. My over-ambitious colleague [Mr. ANDERSON] was born 16 years after Fort Sumter fell, and the Ways and Means Committee doubtless thought he would do better to tarry awhile in Jericho. [Laughter.] However, as was suggested in the National Monthly Magazine, he will be mature enough for chairman after the next war. [Renewed laughter.]

I confess that I favored very earnestly the passage of a general pension bill during this extra session. I desired to escape the responsibility for a pending bill and the worry of delay; but the statement of the chairman of the Pension Committee of the Senate that the Senate would not take up pension legislation during the extra session, and that no soldier would get a dollar of pension any sooner even if both the House and Senate should pass the bill, as there was no money to pay any increased pensions, and could not possibly be this year, I became reconciled to the delay. No money is available now to pay increased pensions, and none will be available until the pension appropriation bill of next year becomes law. And still another and more vital consideration appealed strongly to my better judgment, that the delay might prove of great value to the old soldiers. I was told by a high official of this administration, a gentleman close to the President, that the nearer we got to the election of 1912 the more liberal pension law could be passed through the White House. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. And through this House.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Members on this floor who propose to vote for a bill like the McElroy-Anderson bill or the Sulloway bill, which pensions a 90-days man at $36 per month because of his age and pensions a 3-years veteran of 30 battles at $15 per month because he entered the Army young, will subject themselves to just and severe criticism not only by the veterans but by all patriotic citizens of both parties who believe in fair play and even justice. I have several letters from prominent record soldiers on this point—one from a leading citizen of Chicago, a member of both the Loyal Legion and the Grand Army. This soldier writes as follows:

> The passage of the Sulloway bill in the House has already done more to injure and discredit the whole pension business with the people than any other public act for a quarter of a century. Not one single leading newspaper—Republican, Democratic, or independent—from the Atlantic to the Pacific approved the Sulloway bill; and not one magazine or any of the magazine writers or reformers had a kind word for it. The New York Tribune, the leading Republican journal in the United States, was among the first daily newspapers to attack the bill and attack it savagely; and Collier's Weekly, one of the ablest independent journals in the United States, attacked this bill unmercifully as not framed on patriotic lines.

By authority of the House caucus (only one dissenting vote) the pension bill, known as House bill No. 1, will be reported from the Invalid Pensions Committee and placed on the calendar before the end of this session. The so-called Anderson bill was repudiated almost unanimously in the committee, not one Republican nor a single Democrat voting for it, except the putative author. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I call the gentleman from Ohio to order.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will have to be interrupted. I call the gentleman to order for stating how the vote stood in the committee. The gentleman from Ohio has had a long enough service in this House to know that that is not proper.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I understand the rule, but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANDERSON] himself has been sending out information, and sending it out incorrectly, and for that reason I feel justified in making the correction.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has no right to state what the vote was in committee, and especially in the absence of his colleague.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Neither is this bill on the Discharge Calendar legally. Motion to discharge a committee from the further consideration of a bill can only be made after the bill has been referred to a committee 15 days prior thereto. Even then such motion does not discharge the committee. The committees of this House were not appointed until April 11. The motion to discharge the committee in this case, as the records show, was filed April 25, or only 14 days after the bill could possibly have been referred to the committee. Again, the spirit and purpose of this rule is to prevent committees from smothering bills in committee. The record shows that Congressman ANDERSON filed his motion on April 25, and that the first meeting of the committee was on April 28, or three days after the motion to discharge was filed. And I want to say here and now that I never knew of the Anderson bill until the committee met. Mr. ANDERSON never notified the chairman, even, that he had any bill for consideration. He never requested the chairman to call the committee together. Hence, his action was in bad faith to the committee of which he is a member. It was not in good faith, as every Member of this House must concede when the record is shown.

When a motion is made to discharge a committee from the consideration of a bill, the bill is read by title only, and the motion is not submitted to the House unless such motion is seconded by a majority vote by tellers. If the motion fails of second, it is struck from the calendar. If seconded by a majority vote by tellers, the motion is then pending before the House, and is subject to debate for 20 minutes—one half of said time to be used by those favoring the motion, the remaining half by those opposed. After the 20 minutes' debate is exhausted the House shall vote on motion to discharge the committee, and for it to prevail it must receive an affirmative vote of a majority of the whole House, or at least 196 votes. If the motion prevails, the bill thus taken from the consideration of the committee is not privileged to be considered by the House then, but is simply referred to the appropriate calendar of the House, just as it would be if the committee had reported it. It can then only be considered under the general rules, just like bills reported by the other committees, and has no priority over other bills, except it would have priority for consideration over bills reported by the discharged committee subsequent to such discharge.

Hence the conclusion is absolute that the Anderson bill is not legally on any calendar. It is equally conclusive that the Invalid Pensions Committee is not discharged from the consideration of the bill. It is equally certain that the bill will be stricken from the calendar whenever the other 68 bills on the Discharge Calendar are taken up for consideration. It is equally clear to every fair-minded Member of this House that this motion to discharge the committee was not made in good faith, but solely to enable the author to misrepresent and embarrass and discredit the Democratic majority in this House before the country. This is further evident from the fact that a publicity bureau was organized and prepared matter sent to all such newspapers as would handle fake and false news. Many newspapers printed this false and malignant stuff, thinking it was true. And the National Tribune was the chief instrument, in order to rally the old soldiers against the majority of this House, proclaiming weekly that the Anderson bill was regularly on the calendar and that, in order to avoid voting against it, the Democratic majority had forced adjournments of the House.

And four-fifths, probably, of the old soldiers have been stirred to animosity on account of these malignant falsehoods. The House is working under an order of business adopted at the beginning of the session, which does not include general legislation. There are 69 bills on the so-called Discharge Calendar, all of which, under the rules, will go over to the December session. The so-called Anderson bill is not legally on the calendar, as every Member of this House knows. House bill 1, or the dollar-a-day bill, will go on the regular calendar before the close of this session by an order already agreed upon as the only authorized general pension bill of this Congress.

This is a bill based upon merit, upon service, upon sacrifice. It is a bill which appeals to every representative soldier of the war as a bill based upon justice. It is a bill that can and will be defended by every patriotic citizen of all political parties who believes that a pension roll should be a roll of honor; by every citizen in whose heart the virile spirit of a valiant patriotism is alive and vibrant. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

APPENDIX.

Here is a letter from an old comrade on the Pacific Slope, a veteran of the Fifty-third Ohio Infantry, Company B, under date of July, 1911:

DEAR COMRADE SHERWOOD: We feel we have a true and able friend in you; that you are doing for the best and will be successful next session of Congress. Every comrade with common sense sees plainly Congress did not intend to and will not pass any pension bill at this session, and don't let old McElroy's lies bother you one bit. Any man can read between his lines and see his contemptible intentions. His paper is killing him fast. Press your bill next session and you will do the greatest good of any man in modern times.

W. A. CONE.

ROY, WASH.

CRAWFORDSVILLE, IND., July 4, 1911.

Gen. SHERWOOD, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I write to thank you for your prompt answer to my letter and for a copy of the Sherwood pension bill. I note that the third section is not as I thought it was, "annual net income" is the language. While that will probably not allow me benefit under this law, yet I believe that the principle in this bill is the correct one. Where the pension is not for disability length of service ought to cut a big figure in grading the amount. Wishing you success and hoping that this bill will pass, I remain, Yours, respectfully, M. W. BRUNER.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., June 19, 1911.

Gen. ISAAC R. SHERWOOD,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I thank you cordially for the circular explaining general pension bill No. 1, and I want to say to you that I regard it as the most commendable measure that has been submitted to Congress in behalf of the Civil War soldiers. Its conditions and provisions are as liberal and fair as any soldier justly disposed can expect, and it eliminates the evils of the pension system relative to the State and national homes. In fact, it eliminated all the fair and unfair objections to a service-pension bill. It leaves nothing for the pension pickers in Congress, or out of it, to use against the just claims of the Civil War veterans. I cordially wish and hope that your life and health may be preserved that you can fully represent and press the bill before the next session of Congress.

Very cordially, yours, JOHN H. MACCREARY, M. D.

BLOOMFIELD, IOWA, June 12, 1911.

Gen. ISAAC R. SHERWOOD.

MY DEAR COMRADE: House bill No. 1 approved by Pension Committee is O. K. Soldiers with net incomes of a thousand or more dollars are not needy and should not swell appropriations and thus discommode needy comrades.

There is no necessity of soldiers who draw $25 or $30 a month remaining in soldiers' homes.

"Latter-day" soldiers who remained home until the last months of the war, then received a big bounty and went for 90 days, should not expect the same recognition as long-time veterans, unless they were wounded or disabled in the service, but, of course, the Grand Army of the Republic committee and the National Tribune will "kick."

I regret to say it, but sometimes I think both the Grand Army and the National Tribune are proving themselves boomerangs to the men who did the hard service.

Yours, very truly, JAMES REAGIN,
Lieutenant, G Company, Second Iowa Veterans.

By unanimous vote of William Perrott Post, No. 22, Department of Michigan, Grand Army of the Republic, Comrade Graham offered a resolution asking your indorsement and earnest support of the pension bill presented by Gen. I. R. SHERWOOD, of the ninth Ohio district, that it may become a law, believing, as we do, this to be one of the fairest and most just bills yet offered for action in Congress.

Respectfully,

JOHN C. DICK, Commander.
O. F. RICHARD, Adjutant.

G. W. Wheeler, Boon, Mich., writes:

Your bill is more than just and reasonable. There is rank injustice in granting pensions. I know a man who enlisted in 1864; got a big bounty; stayed in the hospital until he was discharged; never fired a gun or did a day's duty at the front; came home, was examined, was pensioned at $12 per month for last stages of consumption, and is living yet. I, who served at the front, was with Sherman in all his marches and battles, including the famous march to the sea, never drew a dollar of pension.

Jonas B. Kauffman, Fifty-fourth Pennsylvania, Johnstown, Pa., writes:

The Sherwood bill is the only bill of true merit. It is the only bill looking after the interest of the veterans who fought and won the great battles of the war. The age pension may be all right for paupers, but has no business with soldiers.

C. Weatherwax, Lockport, N. Y., writes as follows:

After reading your pension bill, recently introduced in the Congress, as a veteran volunteer bill I will say that, in my estimation, it is the best bill ever introduced in the House of Representatives from the honor standpoint. Under former bills enacted into laws all the dead beats and tramp soldiers are equally well provided for with those who did the actual work, without any apparent distinction. Dear General, I wish to thank you for this mark of justice.

At a called meeting of veterans, held at Wauseon, Ohio, under a published call for a meeting of all soldiers and members of Losure Post, the Sherwood bill was discussed and a rising vote taken, every soldier rising to be counted. One hundred and twenty-five veterans were present, and all voted aye.

Hon. I. R. SHERWOOD.

OLD COMRADE: Allow me to congratulate you on being the only Representative to Congress in over 42 years that has ever seen the difference between a veteran soldier of the Civil War and a so-called veteran of to-day. I am 70 years old, served 4 years 7 months and 16 days, and receive $20 per month for injuries and rheumatism received in the service. My neighbor, who is 75 and served 100 days, receives $20, and he told me he never was sick a day in his life. God bless you for your efforts, but I do not believe you will be able to convince the rest of your colleagues in time for the resurrection.

J. C. ARMSTRONG,
Thirteenth Ohio Veteran Volunteer Infantry.

Chris C. Layman, Twentieth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, writes from Woodville, Ohio, as follows:

Yours is the only bill that provides for those that did the work. The law (McCumber law) that places do-nothing soldiers on an equality with workers is a disgrace to the Nation.

Mrs. Anna E. Wiltsie, of Toledo, Ohio, a prominent worker in soldiers' charity, writes:

Some time ago I visited the National Soldiers' Home at Marion, Ind., and I was surprised and shocked at the similarity in it to our asylums, penitentiaries, and prisons. What little difference there is between them! It is true they have more liberties than are allowed the criminals and insane, but otherwise the similarity exists. What home comforts do the old veterans have in these soldiers' homes? A space 8 feet square, a single iron bed, a small locker, and one hard-bottom wood chair. And do you not think, General, that if the money expended in these homes to keep them up was added to an amount sufficient to pay a pension of, say, $1 a day to the old veterans, would it not be a better way of caring for them? Every old soldier that stood about me that day said if the Government would give them $25 or $30 per month they would go home and never set a foot inside a soldiers' home again.

Martin Rienour, of Peru, Kans., writes:

I thank you for introducing your bill. It has the ring and spirit of Gen. John A. Logan to us old vets. We are tired of the conditions of the McCumber bill, which is a promise that if we live to be very old we will get enough for funeral expenses. It is up to Congress now to fulfill the promises made by dear old Uncle Abe on the Battlefield of Gettysburg.

Andrew Jackson Hill, New York Soldiers' Home:

Pass the Sherwood bill and you will have the everlasting gratitude of the men who did the work of putting down the rebellion. I was in the Army of the Potomac, and in every battle from Antietam until Lee surrendered, and never saw a 90-day man, and yet they have the bulk of legislation in their behalf.

Horace G. O'Dell, writing in the Soldiers' Home, Napa, Cal., says:

I would be only too glad to take the $1 per day and remain out of the home, for it is a prison to me, and I voice the sentiment of the old boys of this home and am writing this at their request. The boys that would be benefited by this bill are honest, sober men.

William Watson, of Pineglen, Pa., writes:

The Sherwood pension bill is the only one ever introduced that was not a pauper bill. Now, in many instances, the 90-day man gets more pension than the veteran who served from 1861 to 1865.

John Emerson, of Morrow, Ohio:

Your bill is based on merit and service, and is just what I have always advocated. All the soldiers in Morrow County are in favor of it. It will save the Government lots of money.

A. W. Carnahan, National Soldiers' Home, of Kansas:

Your bill is just the thing. It helps those who were too game, when sick, to go to the hospital, while those who flunked and got a hospital record have been blessed with big pensions.

John W. Gilson, of Anna, Ill., writes 11 pages of a closely written letter, of which the following is a brief extract:

As you are a real friend of the old soldier, I desire to write you fully. I served the whole four years in Goodspeed's battery, except a 30-day furlough, when we veteranized. I get $12 per month, and had a long fight to get that. Now I am a financial and physical wreck and have to live in a soldiers' home. I know another soldier who served three months and never saw an armed enemy who was recently raised to $24 per month.

Twenty-three soldiers of Clairmore, Okla.:

We desire to show how heartily we approve your bill. Every soldier here in this vicinity is for your bill, except one, and he was a deserter. We protest against the act of February 6, 1907, for the following reasons: Not that we disapprove of the giving pensions at the ages of 62, 70, and 75, but that it is an injustice that any soldier drawing a pension for wounds should be deprived of the age benefits also. All the old soldiers here thank you and feel grateful for the interest you are taking in them.

Robert Blackburn, a soldier, an attorney of Decatur, Ind., writes:

I have carefully watched and felt the pulse of the pensioners, and believe the bill introduced by you in a general way would come nearer meeting the indorsement of the soldiers, except a few three-months men, some of them never being out of the State they enlisted in.

ROBERT BLACKBURN,
Company H, Eighty-ninth Indiana Volunteer Infantry.

H. C. Bugbee, of Tullahoma, Tenn., under date of May 29, writes as follows:

Hon. Mr. SHERWOOD, Washington, D. C.:

The majority of the soldiers are old, and most of them very poor, too. A moderate increase of pension now will do them more good than millions after they inhabit the heavenly mansions. You are on the ground and know the situation better than we do. We can't help feeling that the great weakness of the Sulloway bill was the amount it called for. We all pray that you may be successful with your bill.

A. G. Jones, quartermaster Forest City Post, Cleveland Ohio, says:

I desire to press upon your attention the fact that the great and growing opposition to the pension system is based upon the fact that the rewards are in a large measure distributed without regard to the service rendered. Under the Sulloway and other similar bills a great many thousand 90-day and other short-term men get the highest pensions, because they happen to be older. It is a well-known fact that a great many thousand 90-day men never fired a hostile shot, yet the pension howlers fix the laws so they get more than the soldier who served four years at the front. I beg of you to change the system and relieve it from the charge of graft.

The following is an extract from a letter from Comrade J. M. Beach, of Danville, Ill., July 15, 1911:

The short-time men, enlisted with the distinct understanding that they were not to go to the front, and those men now constitute the Grand Army of the Republic, being younger and better able to attend meetings, and are pulling for what was never right. I was told in Cincinnati a short time ago that President Taft would no doubt sign a bill like yours.

Here is a specimen opinion from an Ohio veteran:

NORWALK, OHIO, May 30, 1911.

DEAR GENERAL: I want to thank you for your efforts in pushing your pension bill. As I read it, I think it by far the best of all the pension bills. The Anderson and Sulloway bills seem to me to be out of proportion. I have always up to the last two years been one of the straight Republican voters, but I have to go back on some things of late. Conditions remind me of conditions in 1856, when the G. O. P. was a bornin', and I think I am fully justified in at least insurging all I want to. A full enlistment served in the Army, lasting from the start in 1861 to the finish, should give me at least freedom of thought, and I propose to exercise it from this out. Your bill meets fully the views of all the soldiers with whom I have talked, and that is a lot of them. Thanking you again and wishing you full success,

Fraternally, yours,

L. B. DENNIS.

Comrade Felix Deflin writes as follows from Elkhorn, Wyo.:

I take the liberty to write you to tell you your pension bill is the only just bill that was ever before Congress.

Here is a letter from Comrade J. T. Ingram, of Salem, Iowa, dated July 22, 1911:

MY DEAR COMRADE: While there is being so much said about pension legislation I thought that I would like to say a word. I served four years in the Army in the Civil War in the Second Iowa Battery. The State of Iowa sent one regiment under an enlistment of 100 days. Those fellows would receive as much benefit from the Sulloway bill as I would. They went in the Army in the summer time, did guard duty, but were not in any battles. I sacrificed the four years in the Army when I should have been in school, while the men who served three or four months in the summer did not sacrifice anything.

Comrade James C. Connell, of Mount Sterling, Ky., writes:

MY DEAR COMRADE: I deem it my duty to commend you for your efforts in behalf of patriotism by supporting a measure that will bring about economy in the Pension Department and deal justly with the soldiers who saved the Nation from the perils of a divided country.

Here is an interesting letter from a veteran captain:

ROCKFORD, ILL., June 26, 1911.

DEAR SIR AND COMRADE: Both the "Tribune bill" and the "Anderson bill" savor more of charity than of justice, as these both make the age limit of 62 years before they are entitled to be pensioned under their bills.

Your bill is far ahead of these because service and not age is considered in your bill. This is right and just. There are thousands of veterans who served faithfully through the entire four years of the war who are not entitled to the pension in the Anderson and Tribune bills, simply because they are under 70 years of age, when those who served but a few months or one year, but are 70 years old, will get the pensions.

We do not want charity, but justice, and your bill meets this. I hope your bill will become law.

Respectfully, yours,

J. AUGUST SMITH,
Late Captain Company F,
Fifty-fifth Illinois Volunteer Infantry.

Texas holds more Union soldiers than any State south of the Ohio River:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF TEXAS,
GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

Resolved by this encampment, Department of Texas, Grand Army of the Republic, this 21st day of April, 1909, assembled at Denison, Tex., That we petition our commander in chief to do all in his power to give aid and assistance to Comrade SHERWOOD in his noble and patriotic effort to do justice to our comrades while living, and that they take such action as will assist in the passage of this bill as amended and advocated by Gen. SHERWOOD.

Resolved, That the sincerest and most heartfelt thanks of this department, by a unanimous and rising vote, be extended our grand comrade, Hon. ISAAC R. SHERWOOD, for his noble, fraternal, charitable, and loyal advocacy of the welfare of his comrades.

Capt. F. W. Wild, secretary of the Maryland State Association of Veterans, writes from Baltimore as follows:

I read your pension bill Saturday last and was favorably impressed with it as being more just and equitable than the Sulloway bill, in that it bars men whose income is such that they would not need a pension, and makes a distinction as to time of service, and yet looks out for the man who was crippled or wounded, no matter how short his service, and hope that you may be successful in having it put through.

Comrade Earl W. Sopher, a long-service veteran, writes from Dunkirk, Ind., June 8, 1911, as follows:

I have talked with several old soldiers about your bill and they all expressed a wish to have it passed immediately, that it was the best that had been offered in Congress yet for the soldiers who had fought the battles of the war, but it seems to us as though the Congress always tries to see how little they could give the soldiers who fought the battles of the war, and how much they could give the men who never saw the armies in the front, or short-timers who were scraped up at the latter end of the war who had refused to respond to the calls of the President in 1863 for volunteers. I hope you will push it through immediately. Please do this if you can.

Respectfully,

EARL W. SOPHER,
Late Companies M and H, Eighth New York Cavalry, Second Brigade, Third Division, Cavalry Corps.

The following is an extract from an editorial in the Wapakoneta (Ohio) Daily News:

In order to satiate his thirst for notoriety and fame, Congressman CARL ANDERSON violated an agreement entered into by the Democratic congressional caucus, whereby he seeks to place his fellow Democratic Members in a bad light with the old soldiers of the country. It is small business, and ANDERSON will arouse to the fact one of these days that he has made a mistake. It is not his love for the old soldier that actuated him into taking the stand he has, but his love for floating around in the limelight for applause and for selfish reasons. He made a sneaking attempt to forestall the action that was agreed upon by the Democratic caucus to hold off in pension legislation until the convening of the regular session of the new Congress, at which time the Democratic majority will give support to a measure that will be the product of that old veteran soldier and patriotic citizen, Congressman and Gen. ISAAC R. SHERWOOD, of Toledo. Gen. SHERWOOD not only has the interests of all the old soldiers and their widows at heart, but he has had the confidence of a large majority of the people of his district.

The following letter is from a four-year veteran:

PARSONS, CAL., July 17, 1911.

Hon. Mr. UNDERWOOD,
Leader House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am an ex-soldier of nearly four years' very strenuous service and a Republican who voted for Abraham Lincoln, and have kept up the habit ever since, but I want to say to you, after having read in the telegraphic news from Washington that the pension bill your party will bring in next winter will not include "soldiers who were never within 500 miles of a battle field," you have the right idea.

If your committee will take the trouble to take volume 8 of the adjutant general of Illinois report and look over the Sixth, Seventh, and Ninth Illinois Cavalry, which were brigaded together, they will see that in the three regiments, all of whom enlisted in 1861 for three years, 944 reenlisted in the spring of 1864 as veterans for three years or more. They will also see that in the spring of 1865, after the Nashville campaign was over—which was their last campaign—there came to these three regiments a total of 2,529 recruits, every one of whom enlisted in January, February, and March, 1865, after our campaigns were over, and under the impetus of large local as well as Government bounties, and no one of these men ever saw an enemy with a gun or endured any hardship.

Very truly,

F. W. LIPPINCOTT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CULLOP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12812) to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton, and had instructed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Thereupon, on motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until 12 o'clock noon, Monday, July 31, 1911.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting copy of report of the board of engineers appointed to raise the wreck of the battleship Maine in Habana Harbor, and calling attention to the necessity for additional funds to complete the work (S. Doc. No. 80), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. COVINGTON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4682) authorizing the construction of a railroad, tramroad, conveyor, wagon or foot bridge, and approaches thereto, across the Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River at or near Glenhayes Station, in Wayne County, W. Va., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 73), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. KNOWLAND, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7690) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Snake River at the town of Nyssa, Oreg., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 74), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. GOULD, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 11852) to authorize the Providence, Warren & Bristol Railroad Co. and its lessee, the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., or either of them, to construct a bridge across the Palmers or Warren River, in the State of Rhode Island, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 75), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6747) to authorize the Wisconsin Central Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the St. Croix River between Wisconsin and Minnesota, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 76), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. GOEKE, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 2954) to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across and over the Arkansas River, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 77), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 11021) to authorize the Levitte Land & Lumber Co. to construct a bridge across Bayou Bartholomew, in Drew County, Ark., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 78), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6738) to authorize the St. Louis-Kansas City Electric Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the town of St. Charles, Mo., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 81), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. SIMS, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7263) to authorize the counties of Bradley and McMinn, Tenn., by authority of their county courts, to construct a bridge across the Hiwassee River at Charleston and Calhoun, in said counties, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 82), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 2925) to extend the privileges of the act approved June 10, 1880, to the port of Brownsville, Tex., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 90), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. SABATH, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6098) to authorize the Campbell Lumber Co. to construct a bridge across the St. Francis River from a point in Dunklin County, Mo., to a point in Clay County, Ark., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 89), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 11321) to authorize the Twin City & Lake Superior Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the St. Croix River between Wisconsin and Minnesota, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 87), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 11660) to authorize the St. Louis-Kansas City Electric Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the town of Weldon Springs Landing, Mo., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 84), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. ESCH, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 11723) permitting the building of a railroad bridge across the St. Croix River between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 88), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7693) to authorize the town of Logan, Aitkin County, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in Aitkin County, Minn., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 83), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 5138) permitting the Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie Railway Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge across the St. Croix River between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 86), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 11022) to authorize the bridge directors of the Jefferson County bridge district to construct a bridge across the Arkansas River at Pine Bluff, Ark., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 80), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. CALDER, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 11477) authorizing the construction of a railroad, tramroad, conveyor, wagon, or foot bridge, and approaches thereto, across the Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River at or near Matewan Station, in Mingo County, W. Va., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 79), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8146) to construct a bridge across Rock River at or near Colona Ferry, in the State of Illinois, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 85), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11303) for the relief of Eliza Choteau Roscamp, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 91), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Also, resolution of the Sick and Death Benefit Fund of the United States of America, condemning the methods pursued in the arrest of the McNamaras and indorsing the Berger resolution for an investigation of the same; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LAFEAN: Resolutions of Pennsylvania Pharmaceutical Association, protesting against Sherley bill, providing for a tax on patent medicine; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. O'SHAUNESSY: Resolution by the National Team Owners' Association of America, indorsing the efforts of the President of the United States to bring about a reciprocity arrangement between this country and Canada; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. J. M. C. SMITH: Papers accompanying bill granting an increase of pension to Jerome B. Hartwell; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

WRECK OF UNITED STATES BATTLESHIP "MAINE."

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, by direction of the President, a letter from the Acting Chief of Engineers, together with a report from Col. W. M. Black, Corps of Engineers, relative to the progress of the work of the raising or removal of the wreck of the battleship Maine in Habana Harbor, and the necessity for additional funds to complete the work, which, with the accompanying papers and illustrations, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed. (H. Doc. 96.)

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of the citizens of Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against any further action by the Senate in the investigation of WILLIAM LORIMER, as a Senator from the State of Illinois, which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of Typographical Union No. 63, of Toledo, Ohio, praying for the adoption of the proposed constitution of the Territory of Arizona, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BRISTOW presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Kingman, Kans., remonstrating against the establishment of a parcels-post system, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SHIVELY presented a memorial of John A. Logan Post, No. 3, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Indiana, of Lafayette, Ind., remonstrating against the removal of Dr. Harvey W. Wiley as Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, Department of Agriculture, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

TERRITORIAL INDEBTEDNESS.

Mr. BRISTOW, from the Committee on Territories, to which was referred the bill (S. 2541) to amend an act entitled "An act to prohibit the passage of local or special laws in the Territories of the United States, to limit Territorial indebtedness, and for other purposes," reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 114) thereon.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. For the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], and myself, from the Committee on the Census, I submit the views of the minority on the bill (H. R. 2983) for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Thirteenth Census. I ask that the report be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the views submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin will be printed. (Rept. No. 94, pt. 2.)

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. DIXON:

A bill (S. 3123) granting a pension to Vee Aiken (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WORKS:

A bill (S. 3124) to provide for the leasing of coal and coal lands in the Territory of Alaska; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. BORAH:

A bill (S. 3125) granting an increase of pension to James M. Hopper (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 3126) granting an increase of pension to John Barker (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3127) granting an increase of pension to Hiram F. Reel (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CRAWFORD:

A bill (S. 3128) granting an extension of time of payment to homestead entrymen of lands within the Rosebud and other Indian reservations in South Dakota and North Dakota, and specifying the conditions upon which the extension may be granted; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. WARREN:

A bill (S. 3129) extending the provisions of section 20 of the act of Congress of March 3, 1899, to include expenditures in connection with the raising of the wreck of the battleship Maine; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 3130) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to permit the Conrad-Stanford Co. to use certain lands (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. BURNHAM:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 45) authorizing the selection of a site and the erection of a statue of Gen. Robert Anderson; to the Committee on the Library.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. BURTON submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 2983) for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Thirteenth Census, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

THE FREE LIST.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. GORE submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. GORE to the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles, viz: On page —, line —, insert the following:

SEC. —. That whenever it shall be duly certified to the President of the United States that the Government or Governments of any or of all nations of the American hemisphere have declared a desire to establish commercial union with the United States, having a uniform revenue system, like internal taxes to be collected, and like import duties to be imposed on articles brought into either country from other nations, with no duties or with uniform duties upon trade between the United States and such nations, he shall appoint three commissioners to meet those who may be likewise designated to represent such Government or Governments, to prepare a plan for the assimilation of the import duties and internal-revenue taxes of such countries, and an equitable division of receipts, in a commercial union; and said commissioners shall report to the President, who shall lay the report before Congress.

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. GORE to the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles, viz: Insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That all the articles enumerated in this section, the growth, product, or manufacture of the Dominion of Canada, when imported therefrom into the United States or any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila) shall be exempt from duty whenever the President shall have satisfactory evidence and shall make proclamation that all the said articles enumerated in this section, the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States or any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila) are admitted into the Dominion of Canada free of duty, namely:

"Fresh meats—beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and all other fresh or refrigerated meats, excepting game.

"Bacon and hams, not in tins or jars.

"Meats of all kinds, dried, smoked, salted, in brine, or prepared or preserved in any manner.

"Canned meats and canned poultry.

"Extract of meat, fluid or not.

"Lard and compounds thereof, cottolene and cotton stearin, and animal stearin.

"Tallow.

"Wheat flour and semolina, and rye flour.

"Oatmeal and rolled oats.

"Corn meal.

"Plows, tooth and disk harrows, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horserakes, cultivators, threshing machines, including wind stackers, baggers, weighers, and self-feeders therefor, and finished parts thereof imported for repair of the foregoing.

"Portable engines with boilers, in combination, horsepower and traction engines for farm purposes, hay loaders, potato diggers, fodder or feed cutters, grain crushers, fanning mills, hay tedders, farm or field rollers, manure spreaders, weeders, and windmills, and finished parts thereof imported for repair of the foregoing, except shafting."

Mr. SHIVELY. I submit an amendment which I intend to propose to the free-list bill. I ask that it lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. President, as there will be no opportunity for explanation to-morrow under the special order, permit me to say that this amendment simply adds the words "and binders," after the word "harvesters," in line 6. It is very doubtful whether the word "harvesters" would cover the machine known as the self-binder. The better opinion is that it would not. In legal documents, where the proper description of this particular machine is important, the words I supply are those commonly used.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. SHIVELY to the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles, viz:

On page 1, before the comma at the end of line 6, insert the words "and binders."

THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 124), which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that hereafter the proceedings of the Senate and of the House of Representatives shall be printed beginning on the first page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and continuing to the end of such proceedings, and that all speeches withheld for revision shall be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD immediately following the printing of such daily proceedings.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. BRISTOW. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to state that the Democratic Members of the Senate are in caucus, and they are absent for that reason. I do not see why the Senator from Kansas wants to have the roll called. He knows that they are in caucus.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the roll call.

The roll call was resumed and concluded, the following Senators having answered to their names:

Bacon	Cullom	McCumber	Pomerene
Bankhead	Cummins	McLean	Reed
Bourne	Curtis	Martin, Va.	Shively
Bradley	Davis	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Dillingham	Myers	Smoot
Bristow	Dixon	Nelson	Stephenson
Brown	Foster	Nixon	Stone
Bryan	Gamble	O'Gorman	Taylor
Burnham	Gronna	Oliver	Townsend
Burton	Guggenheim	Overman	Warren
Chamberlain	Heyburn	Owen	Watson
Chilton	Johnson, Me.	Page	Wetmore
Clapp	Kern	Paynter	Works
Clark, Wyo.	La Follette	Penrose
Clarke, Ark.	Lippitt	Perkins
Crane	Lodge	Poindexter

Mr. BRYAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] is absent on business of the Senate. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. JONES] is engaged in the Lorimer investigation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. The calendar is in order under Rule VIII.

Mr. SMOOT. I observe that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] gave notice that he would desire to speak immediately after the conclusion of the routine business this morning. Does the Senator from Oklahoma desire to go on now before taking up the calendar under Rule VIII?

Mr. OWEN. I would be glad to do so unless there is some special matter that some Senator wishes to bring up. In that case I shall be very glad to defer my remarks.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator had better go on now. There is nothing special to take up on the calendar. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, House bill 4413.

The motion was agreed to.

ELECTION AND RECALL OF FEDERAL JUDGES.

Mr. OWEN. Pursuant to the notice heretofore given by me, I wish to call up Senate bill 3112, providing for the election and recall of Federal judges, for the purpose of addressing the Senate thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays the bill before the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, in delivering a formal argument in favor of the election and recall of Federal judges as well as of State judges, I shall ask the courtesy of the Senate that I be not interrupted with questions which will break the continuity of the observations I wish to present to the RECORD, but that Senators desiring to ask any question of me will withhold the question until I shall have concluded the body of this argument. I will then take great pleasure in answering any or all questions that I am able to answer to the best of my limited ability.

Mr. President, I have submitted to the Senate of the United States the following bill, providing for the election and recall of Federal judges, in order that it may be considered by the Senate and by the public opinion of the country:

A bill providing for the election and recall of Federal judges.

Be it enacted, etc., That any justice of the Supreme Court of the United States and any judge of a United States circuit or district court, or of any other court of the United States, is subject to recall by a resolution of the Congress of the United States; that upon the passage of a resolution requesting the President of the United States to nominate a successor to such justice or judge the tenure of office of any such justice or judge shall immediately terminate.

SEC. 2. All district judges and circuit judges of the United States shall hereafter be elected by the qualified electors of the district or circuit over which such judge may have lawful jurisdiction, their names to appear on the same ballot as the presidential electors, the vote to be declared by the same authorities; and such judges shall be elected every four years, on the same day as the presidential electors, thereafter holding their offices for the period of four years and until their successors are duly qualified.

I am moved to offer this bill, and to discuss it, in connection with the Arizona constitution.

The people of that State propose the right to elect and recall all officials, including judges, by a vote of the electorate.

ABSTRACT OF ARGUMENT.

I shall endeavor to show the justification of the right of election and recall of judges—

First. By precedents, showing that many States do elect their judges and that all of the 46 States do have the explicit right to recall their judges, or automatically recall by a short or fixed tenure of office.

Second. That the election and recall of judges is justified by sound reason and common sense.

Third. That the recall of judges is justified in a peculiar sense in this Republic at this time, for the reasons—first, the Federal courts have unlawfully assumed the right to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional; second, have undertaken to invade the legislative function of Congress by judicial legislation; third, have overridden the rights of State laws in a similar manner, either on the charge that such State laws were unconstitutional or that such State laws were invalid on grounds of policy; fourth, such courts have become tyrannical by denying jury trial in contempt cases, inconsiderate in injunction cases, and so forth, and that the reason of this bad behavior is due to the fact that the judiciary is not responsible to the people either by election or recall.

The election and recall of Federal judges would abate the present jealousy felt by the States against the Federal Government and bring into harmonious relation the States and Nation.

I shall examine the argument of judicial infallibility and answer it.

I shall endeavor to show that the Constitution of the United States abundantly justifies Congress to follow the example of the States and provide both the election and the recall of Federal judges.

I shall endeavor to show that the time has come when the liberties of the American people require the exercise of this constitutional power, or if it be deemed unconstitutional by Congress, then that Congress should submit an amendment to the Constitution to provide for this and other relief by establishing an easy means of amending the Constitution.

THE ARGUMENT.

Mr. President, in what I have to say I desire it to go upon the record that I have a reverence for the judicial branch of the Government and a very great respect for many of the individuals who serve the Republic as judges, and what I have to say is said in a truly impersonal sense, without any desire and without any intention to reflect upon individuals, or to deal with individuals, at all, except as they illustrate a bad system.

Mr. President, the bill which I now submit proposes to put the recall of Federal judges in the hands of the Congress of the United States, while the Arizona constitution proposes to put the recall of judges in the hands of the electorate of that State. They are the sovereign power, they are the governing power, and if the court has a bias against the interest of the people and the people wish to recall for that purpose, that bias need not be named as a ground for such action. It need not be mentioned. No reason is necessary to be assigned why the sovereign power of the people of this country should be exercised in recalling any public servant. It has a right to be exercised without assigning reasons.

To assign reasons is to discredit the incumbent, while removal without assignment of reasons is the mildest method of dealing with a public servant whose service is no longer desired. And self-governing people govern themselves without apology or need to assign reasons in the exercise of the right of self-government. The mere fact that the people do not like a judge and do not desire him to serve them justifies recall. He has no function, no public office, or public dignity except as it is bestowed upon him by the people themselves, yet the Tory argument is constantly advanced—that judges ought not to be recalled, that they ought to be independent of the people, that they ought to have office for life whether their service is acceptable to the people or not. There is no sound sense and no good reason in this contention, and it impairs the right of self-government and liberties of a free people. Such a policy can only result in a judicial oligarchy.

THE PEOPLE ARE CONSERVATIVE.

It will be contended by some that the recall of judges might safely be left to the National Legislature or to the State legislatures, but should not be left to the electorate, because the electorate would not be so conservative in the exercise of the power to recall a judge as their representatives in the legislature.

The answer to this is that the electorate of an American State and of any of the American States is abundantly conservative and moves very slowly, more slowly than their progressive representatives would move.

A political party is controlled by caucus and in convention, and is easily moved by passion or impulse. The people in their peaceful homes or in the quiet seclusion of a voting booth are not so easily moved.

It is harder to persuade a majority of the electorate of a State than to move a legislature. The people have been trained to give the benefit of the doubt to anyone who is assailed, either in public or before a jury, and when in doubt they will always vote no.

They have had the right of recall in Oregon for 10 years and have never used it against a judge, although there is one case pending there now, which, undoubtedly, will be decided wisely by the people, or at least they recently tried to get a case against a judge, but they failed to get a sufficient number of people to sign the petition to initiate the case, as I am informed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

Mr. President, in England the conservatives recently appealed to the people against the progressive leaders because the people were recognized as more conservative than their leaders. Where the people have had full power—in Australia and New Zealand and in Switzerland—they have not abused their power. They have been just, conservative, and slow to act.

It is true, of course, that among the people there are some extremists who are very radical and very excitable, but they are offset by a like number who are very phlegmatic and who can not be moved at all. The judgment of the people represents the judgment of the mass, and not the judgment of the fractional part that may be extreme either in one direction or another direction.

The reactionary argument that the people are turbulent, unduly excitable, that they are wild and visionary, that they are unduly passionate, that they comprise an irresponsible mob unworthy to be trusted with power, comes with poor grace from those who hold their honors, their dignities, and their salaries from these same people.

The long-suffering patience of the people is best evidenced by the forbearance with which the people permit men in public service to give currency and approval to these unfounded and absurd criticisms of the great American electorate.

IF PEOPLE ARE INTELLIGENT ENOUGH TO ELECT AND RECALL SENATORS, WHY ARE THEY NOT INTELLIGENT ENOUGH TO ELECT AND RECALL JUDGES?

It is the common judgment of the people of the United States, evidenced by the act of 37 States and by the expression of opinion of a majority of the inhabitants of the remaining 9 States, that Senators should be elected by direct vote of the people. That is the view of the Senate of the United States itself, as expressed by the recent vote. Even those who voted against this proposal in many cases believed in the right of the people to nominate and elect their own Senators, so that the Senate of the United States by more than three-fourths really believes in the election of Senators by direct vote of the people.

Every Member of Congress is elected by direct vote of the people. Have the people intelligence enough to elect Senators and Members of the House, and yet do they lack intelligence to elect or to recall a judge? Would they recall a Senator or a Member of the House who performed his duty faithfully and truly represented his constituency?

The experience of Switzerland shows that members of the legislature whose proposals were turned down by the people of Switzerland were nevertheless returned to the legislature with honor, because the people had no doubt of the integrity of such representatives, although they did not agree with their opinions in some particulars. I say that under modern conditions the people of the United States, who are the best informed electorate perhaps in the world, would be more conservative and stable in the recall of a judge than their representatives would be, and that the constitution of Arizona is a more conservative proposition than that which I now submit for the recall of Federal judges by Congress, although the argument otherwise is substantially the same.

Congress may easily be controlled by party caucus to recall a judge, but not so the people of the country. The people are much harder to move than Congress, and when in doubt they will vote "no," as they have universally done where the initiative, the referendum, and the recall is in force.

THE CHIEF VALUE OF THE RECALL WILL BE FOUND IN MAKING ITS USE UNNECESSARY.

Mr. President, the chief value of the recall will not be the exercise of this power in actually recalling judges, but the contrary. If the power of recall exists, the conduct of judges will be so exemplary, so satisfactory to the people of the United States, that no recall of any Federal judge would ever be necessary. The moment the recall went into effect the courts would promptly discontinue their unauthorized, unconstitutional, and grossly improper conduct of declaring an act of Congress unconstitutional. The Federal courts would no longer, because of their views of public policy, amend acts of Congress by inserting words in important statutes which Congress had refused to insert, as the Supreme Court, in substance, did in its opinion in the Standard Oil case and in the Tobacco Trust case. The courts would no longer deal with undue severity in contempt cases, and government by injunction would cease. The right of recall and the power of recall would make the recall itself unnecessary.

PRECEDENTS—NEARLY ALL THE STATES DO ELECT THEIR JUDGES.

Mr. President, when our Federal Constitution was adopted in 1787 none of the judges were elected by the people, although there was a greatly restricted suffrage; but since that time, although the suffrage has been greatly enlarged, so that we have almost universal manhood suffrage and in five States woman's suffrage, yet with the growth of modern Democracy or progressive Republicanism very many of the States have adopted the doctrine of electing judges and giving them fixed terms of office. For example:

ALABAMA.

1901 (sec. 152, art. 6): "Elected by the qualified electors of the State." Term of five years.

ARKANSAS.

1874 (sec. 6, art. 7): "The judges of the supreme court shall be elected by the qualified electors of the State and shall hold their offices during the term of eight years."

CALIFORNIA.

1879 (sec. 3, art. 6): "The chief justice and the associate justices shall be elected by the qualified electors of the State at large * * * two of them shall go out of office at the end of 4 years, two of them at the end of 8 years, and two of them at the end of 12 years."

COLORADO.

1876 (sec. 6, art. 6): "The judges of the supreme court shall be elected by electors of the State at large." Term of nine years.

CONNECTICUT.

1818 (sec. 3, art. 5): "The judges of the supreme court of errors, of the superior and inferior courts * * * shall be appointed by the general assembly * * *. The judges of the supreme court and the superior court shall hold their offices during good behavior." Amendment 1856: "The judges of the supreme court of errors and of the superior court appointed in the year 1855 and thereafter shall hold their offices for the term of eight years."

DELAWARE.

1897 (sec. 3, art. 4): "The chancellor, chief justice, and associate judges shall be appointed by the governor, by and with the consent of the majority of all the members elected to the senate, for the term of 12 years."

FLORIDA.

1885 (sec. 2, art. 5): "The supreme court shall consist of three justices, who shall be elected by the qualified electors of the State * * * and shall hold their office for the term of six years."

GEORGIA.

1877 (par. 4, art. 6): Elected by the general assembly for a term of six years.

IDAHO.

WYOMING.

1889 (sec. 4, art. 5): "The supreme court * * * shall be elected by the qualified voters of the State, * * * and their term of office shall be eight years."

It will thus be seen that 36 States elect the judges by popular vote; Connecticut, Georgia, Rhode Island, Vermont, and Virginia elect by the general assembly; and Delaware, Maine, Mississippi, New Hampshire, and New Jersey appoint. All of the States have the recall by fixed tenure, except Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island, all of which recall by the legislature. Thirty-two of the States provide by constitution for recall of judges by the legislature.

It is therefore substantially the unanimous opinion of all the States that judges should hold by fixed tenure and be subject to the automatic recall of short terms or by resolution of the legislature.

When the Constitution of the United States was adopted, in many States the legislatures directly elected the judiciary, as in Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, Delaware, New Jersey, Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia, and they exercised control over the judges by fixing their term of office "during good behavior," as was done in New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia, and by a short tenure of office of one year, as in Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Georgia, and by the right of recall by an address of the legislature, as in Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Maryland, Delaware, South Carolina, and Pennsylvania.

THE RECALL OF JUDGES BY STATES.

Many of the States have exercised and now exercise the right of recall of the judiciary by the address of the legislatures, for example:

Article 2, section 18, of the Oregon constitution provides:

"Every public officer in Oregon is subject, as herein provided, to recall by the legal voters of the State or of the electoral district from which he is elected. There may be required 25 per cent, but not more, of the number of electors who voted in his district at the preceding election for justice of the supreme court to file their petition demanding his recall by the people. They shall set forth in said petition the reasons for said demand. If he shall offer his resignation, it shall be accepted and take effect on the day it is offered, and the vacancy shall be filled as may be provided by law. If he shall not resign within 5 days after the petition is filed, a special election shall be ordered to be held within 20 days in his said electoral district to determine whether the people will recall said officer. On the sample ballot at said election shall be printed in not more than 200 words the reasons for demanding the recall of said officer as set forth in the recall petition, and in not more than 200 words the officer's justification of his course in office. He shall continue to perform the duties of his office until the result of said special election shall be officially declared. Other candidates for the office may be nominated to be voted for at said special election. The candidate who shall receive the highest number of votes shall be deemed elected for the remainder of the term, whether it be the person against whom the recall petition was filed or another. The recall petition shall be filed with the officer with whom a petition for nomination to such office should be filed, and the same officer shall order the special election when it is required. No such petition shall be circulated against any officer until he has actually held his office 6 months, save and except that it may be filed against a senator or representative in the legislative assembly at any time after 5 days from the beginning of the first session after his election. After one such petition and special election no further recall petition shall be filed against the same officer during the term for which he was elected unless such further petitioners shall first pay into the public treasury which has paid such special-election expenses the whole amount of its expenses for the preceding special election. Such additional legislation as may aid the operation of this section shall be provided by the legislative assembly, including provision for payment by the public treasury of the reasonable special-election campaign expenses of such officer. But the words 'the legislative assembly shall provide,' or any similar or equivalent words in this constitution or any amendment thereto, shall not be construed to grant to the legislative assembly any exclusive power of law making nor in any way to limit the initiative and referendum powers reserved by the people."

PENNSYLVANIA.

1790: "The judges of the supreme court, and of the several courts of common pleas, shall hold their offices during good behavior. But for any reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground of impeachment, the governor may remove any of them on the address of two-thirds of each branch of the legislature." (Sec. 2, art. 5, vol. 5, p. 2097.)

"Justices of the peace * * * shall be commissioned during good behavior, but may be removed on conviction of misbehavior in office, or of any infamous crime, or on the address of both houses of the legislature." (Sec. 10, art. 5, vol. 5, p. 3098.)

"The judges of the supreme court shall hold their offices for the term of 15 years if they so long behave themselves well. The present judges of the several courts of common pleas, and of such other courts of record, * * * shall hold their offices for a term of 10 years, if they so long behave themselves well. The associate judges of the courts of common pleas, shall hold their offices for the term of 5 years, if they shall so long behave themselves well, but for any reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground of impeachment, the governor may remove any of them on the address of two-thirds of each branch of the legislature." (Sec. 2, art. 5, vol. 5, p. 3109.)

1873: "The supreme court shall consist of seven judges. They shall hold their offices for the term of 21 years, if they so long behave themselves well." (Sec. 2, art. 5, vol. 5, p. 3133.)

"All judges shall hold their offices for the period of 10 years, if they shall so long behave themselves well; but for reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground for impeachment, the governor may remove any of them on the address of two-thirds of each house of the general assembly." (Sec. 15, art. 5, vol. 5, p. 3135.)

RHODE ISLAND.

1842: "Each judge shall hold his office until his place be declared vacant by a resolution of the general assembly to that effect; which resolution shall be voted for by a majority of all members elected to the house in which it may originate and be concurred in by the same majority of the other house." (Sec. 4, art. 10, vol. 6, p. 3232.)

SOUTH CAROLINA.

1778: "That all other judicial officers, excepting officers of the peace, shall be chosen by ballot jointly by the senate and house of representatives, and, except the judges of the court of chancery, commissioned by the governor and commander in chief during good behavior, but shall be removed on the address of the senate and house of representatives." (Sec 27, vol. 6, p. 3254.)

1868: "For any willful neglect of duty, or other reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground for impeachment, the governor shall remove any executive or judicial officer on the address of two-thirds of each house of the general assembly." (Sec. 4, art. 7, vol. 6, p. 3297.)

1895: Same as preceding section. (Sec. 4, art. 15, vol. 6, p. 3342.)

SOUTH DAKOTA.

No express provision relating to recall of judges, except impeachment.

TENNESSEE.

1834: "Judges and attorneys for the State may be removed from office by a concurrent vote of both houses of the general assembly, each house voting separately; but two-thirds of all members elected to each house must concur in such vote." (Sec 6, art. 6, vol. 6, p. 3435.)

1870: Same as section preceding. (Sec. 6, art. 6, vol. 6, p. 3462.)

TEXAS.

1845: "The judges of the supreme court and district shall be removed by the governor, on the address of two-thirds of each house of the legislature, for willful neglect of duty or other reasonable cause which shall not be sufficient grounds for impeachment." (Sec. 8, art. 4, vol. 6, p. 3554.)

UTAH.

1895: "Judges may be removed from office by the concurrent vote of both houses of the legislature, each voting separately; but two-thirds of the members to which each house may be entitled must concur in such vote." (Sec. 11, art 8, vol. 6, p. 3716.)

VERMONT.

No express provision relating to recall of judges, except impeachment.

VIRGINIA.

1830: "Judges may be removed from office by a concurrent vote of both houses of the general assembly; but two-thirds of the members present must concur in such vote, and the cause of removal shall be entered on the journals of each." (Sec. 7, art. 5, vol. 7, p. 3828.)

1864: "Judges may be removed from office by a concurrent vote of both houses of the general assembly, but a majority of all members elected to each house must concur in such vote; and the cause of removal shall be entered of the journal of each." (Sec. 16, art. 6, vol. 7, p. 3868.)

1870: "Judges shall be removed from office by a concurrent vote of both houses of the general assembly, but a majority of all the members elected to each house must concur in such vote, and the cause of removal entered on the journal of each house." (Sec. 23, art. 6, vol. —, p. 3890.)

1902: Same as preceding section. (Sec. 104, vol. 7, p. 3925.)

WASHINGTON.

1889: "Any judge of any court of record, the attorney general, or any prosecuting attorney may be removed from office by joint resolution of the legislature, in which three-fourths of the members elected to each house shall concur, for incompetency, corruption, malfeasance, or delinquency in office, or other sufficient cause stated in such resolution." (Sec. 9, art. 4, vol. 7, p. 3985.)

WEST VIRGINIA.

1863: "Judges may be removed from office for misconduct, incompetence, or neglect of duty, or on conviction of an infamous offense, by the concurrent vote of a majority of all the members elected to each branch of the legislature, and the cause of removal shall be entered on the journals." (Sec. 13, art. 6, vol. 7, p. 4025.)

1872: "Judges may be removed from office by a concurrent vote of both houses of the legislature, when from age, disease, mental or bodily infirmity, or intemperance, they are incapable of discharging the duties of their office. But two-thirds of all the members elected to each house must concur in such vote and the cause of removal shall be entered upon the journal of each house." (Sec. 17, art, 8, vol. 7, p. 4052.)

WISCONSIN.

1848: "Any judge of the supreme or circuit court may be removed from office, by address of both houses of the legislature, if two-thirds of all members elected to each house concur therein." (Sec. 13, art. 7, vol. 7, p. 4088).

WYOMING.

No express provision relating to recall of judges, except impeachment.

In many of the States the language is used in the constitution that where the offense charged is not sufficient ground for impeachment that judges may be recalled or removed by address of the legislature.

IMPEACHMENT IS MERELY A FORM OF RECALL.

It is not denied that judges should be impeached when guilty of high crimes. All the State constitutions, and the United States Constitution also, provide for this, and it is justified by reason. But impeachment is far more serious than recall. Impeachments involve the conviction for criminal conduct. The recall is a much more benign remedy, and can be invoked where the fault of the judge or the reason for removal is not so great as in the case of impeachment and may be invoked with honor to the judge who has become infirm and who may for his own good be retired on a pension. All of the States provide for recalling judges by impeachment, but this recall carries disgrace.

THE SHORT TENURE OF OFFICE OF A JUDGE IS A FORM OF RECALL.

Mr. President, the short tenure of office is a form of recall, by virtue of which the people who elect judges or have them elected by the legislature, or appointed by the governor, prevent them from becoming a judicial oligarchy, prevent them from becoming tyrannical, and prevent them from becoming judicial rulers or indulging any unseemly exercise of power by recalling them with a short tenure of office.

As I pointed out, three of the States when the Constitution was framed elected judges only for 12 months. It is wonderful, when a careful examination is made, to see how universally the people of this country have provided against judicial oligarchy in the States by a fixed tenure of office. I call attention to this record, giving all of the States in order, the number of years for which the higher State judges are elected, and how elected or appointed, and the number of these States which at the same time, in addition to the short tenure, exercise the right of recall directly through the legislature.

Thirty-four of the States elect judges by the qualified electors, six others elect judges by the general assembly, and only six States appoint by the governor and council. Forty-three States exercise automatic recall by the fixed or short tenure of office and 32 States recall directly by the legislature; and no State fails to have the right of recall either by the short or fixed tenure or by the legislature.

TENURE OF OFFICE OF STATE JUDGES, ETC.

Alabama, 5 years. Recall by legislature. Elected by qualified electors of State.
Arkansas, 8 years. Elected by qualified electors of State.
California, 12 years. Recall by legislature. Recall by people's vote (pending). Elected by qualified electors of State.
Colorado, 9 years. Elected by qualified electors of State.
Connecticut, 8 years. Recall by legislature. Appointed by general assembly.
Delaware, 12 years. Recall by legislature. Appointed by governor.
Florida, 6 years. Recall by legislature. Elected by qualified electors of State.
Georgia, 6 years. Recall by legislature. Elected by general assembly.
Idaho, 6 years. Elected by qualified electors of State.
Illinois, 9 years. Recall by legislature. Elected by electors of each district.
Indiana, 6 years. Recall as by law. Elected by electors of State at large.
Iowa, 6 years. Elected by qualified electors of State.
Kansas, 6 years. Recall by legislature. Elected by qualified electors of State.
Kentucky, 8 years. Recall by legislature. Elected by districts.
Louisiana, 12 years. Recall by legislature. Elected by electors of State.
Maine, 7 years. Recall by legislature. Appointed by governor.
Maryland, 15 years. Recall by legislature. Elected by electors of districts.
Massachusetts, during good behavior. Recall by legislature. Appointed by governor.
Michigan, 8 years. Recall by legislature. Elected by electors of State.
Minnesota, 6 years. Elected by electors of State.
Mississippi, 9 years. Recall by legislature. Appointed by governor.
Missouri, 10 years. Recall by legislature. Elected by electors of State.
Montana, 6 years. Elected by electors of State at large.
Nebraska, 6 years. Elected by electors of State at large.
Nevada, 6 years. Recall by legislature. Elected by qualified electors of State.
New Hampshire, during good behavior. Recall by legislature. Appointed by governor and council.
New Jersey, 7 years. Appointed by governor.
New York, 14 years. Recall by legislature. Elected by electors of judicial districts.
North Carolina, 8 years. Recall by legislature. Elected by qualified voters of State.
North Dakota, 6 years. Elected by qualified voters of State.
Ohio, 5 years. Recall by legislature. Elected by electors of the State at large.
Oklahoma, 6 years. Elected by electors of judicial districts.
Oregon, 6 years. Recall by people's vote. Elected by qualified electors of State.
Pennsylvania, 21 years. Recall by legislature. Elected by qualified electors of State.
Rhode Island, subject to resolution of general assembly. Recall by legislature. Elected by the two houses in grand committee.
South Carolina, 8 years. Recall by legislature. Elected by joint assembly.
South Dakota, 6 years. Elected from districts by electors of State at large.
Tennessee, 8 years. Recall by legislature. Elected by qualified voters of the State.
Texas, 6 years. Recall by legislature. Elected by qualified voters of the State.
Utah, 6 years. Recall by legislature. Elected by qualified voters of the State.
Vermont, 2 years. Elected by senate and house of representatives in joint assembly.
Virginia, 12 years. Recall by legislature. Elected by general assembly.
Washington, 6 years. Recall by legislature. Elected by qualified electors of State at large.
West Virginia, 12 years. Recall by legislature. Elected by voters of State.
Wisconsin, 10 years. Recall by legislature. Elected by qualified electors of State.
Wyoming, 8 years. Elected by qualified voters of the State.

It will thus be seen that all of the States have an automatic recall of judges by a short tenure of office, excepting Rhode Island, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts, all three of which expressly provide in their constitutions for the recall of judges by the legislature.

New Hampshire has recalled her judges four times, and I understand on grounds of policy. Rhode Island recalled her judiciary—by dropping them at the end of the short tenure—which declared an act of the Rhode Island Legislature unconstitutional.

ALL THE STATE CONSTITUTIONS ARE DEMOCRATIC.

All the State constitutions are Democratic in providing for the recall of the judiciary—by the short tenure, by the recall of the legislature, or by both—and the recall by the vote of the people is used in Oregon, proposed in Arizona, and submitted to the people by the Legislature of California by an overwhelming vote. The senate of California voted in favor of this method of popular recall of judges by 35 to 4 and the house of representatives voted in favor of it by 75 to 0. They had reason, too, in California for this action, because the courts of California had obviously long been the servants of the Southern Pacific Railroad. It was the recall of judges in California, which was threatened by the people of California, that made the court reconsider their action in the case of Abe Reuf and send Abe Reuf to the penitentiary, where he belonged. I should, however, like to say on behalf of Abe Reuf that he has in him, after all, the elements of a man and is rendering good service now in the prison where he is incarcerated in educating, instructing, and uplifting those who are in prison with him.

When I say the constitutions of the States are democratic I use the term "democratic" in a broad sense, for the word "democratic" and the word "republican" are, in reality, the same. The democratic followers of Thomas Jefferson, who stood for the principle of government of the people and by the people, called themselves Republicans, and then they called themselves Democratic-Republicans, and then they called themselves Democrats; while Abraham Lincoln, who favored the initiative and referendum explicitly, and his followers, who believed in the government of the people and by the people, called themselves Republicans. The terms "democratic" and "republican" mean the same thing—a government in which the governing power rests in the hands of the people; a government where the people are sovereign; a government where there is no political "boss," where there is no ruling power handing down to the people the blessings of government, but where all public officials are public servants, trusted by the people with temporary power as public servants and not as rulers of the people.

THE ELECTION AND RECALL OF JUDGES IS JUSTIFIED BY SOUND REASON AND COMMON SENSE.

The election and recall of judges, which I have shown thus to prevail in all of the States of the Union, has been adopted by the various States after discussion and consideration by the best people in the United States, and their action in regard to this matter is justified by sound reason and common sense. Since the establishment of common schools, of high schools, of university privileges—since the establishment of the modern newspapers which penetrate every nook and cranny of the land—since the growth of universal intelligence—why should not the American people elect judges who are to serve them on the bench? If citizens have a civil dispute, do they not naturally arbitrate their differences and choose their own arbiters? And if they are satisfied, who should complain?

If citizens of a village wish to choose their own justice of the peace, why should they not have the right to elect such an official? If the citizens of a county desire to elect the county judge, what sensible reason can be assigned that those whose lives and property are subject to the jurisdiction should not elect the citizen who is a candidate for county judge? Do they not pay him his salary? Are they not self-governing people? Are they not entitled to the unqualified rights of self-government recognized in the Declaration of Independence and in the various bills of rights in the several States? Or have we forgotten the source of authority in this country, and that it springs from the people and does not descend to the people from a governing class? It seems to be necessary, Mr. President, to recall to the Congress of the United States and to the country the principles laid down by the Declaration of Independence, in which it was set forth that the right to govern came from the people and not from the King.

A JUDICIAL OLIGARCHY, OR JUDICIAL RULERS, INDEPENDENT OF THE PEOPLE, NOT CONSISTENT WITH LIBERTY AND SELF-GOVERNMENT AS SET FORTH IN DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AND BILLS OF RIGHTS—THE PEOPLE ARE SOVEREIGN, NOT THE JUDICIARY—THE SOVEREIGN POWER IN THE PEOPLE MUST BE EXERCISED FOR THE WELFARE OF THE PEOPLE.

"The Unanimous Declaration of the Thirteen United States of America," issued July 4, 1776, said:

We hold these truths to be self-evident; that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

This declaration is a declaration in effect that all powers of government emanate directly from the people. And this right is reiterated in the constitutions of almost every State in the Union, declaring in various forms that all powers of government spring directly from the people. For example:

ALABAMA.

1819: "All political power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority and instituted for their benefit, and therefore they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may deem expedient."

ARKANSAS.

1836: "That all power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority and instituted for their peace, safety, and happiness. For the advancement of these ends they have, at all times, an unqualified right to alter, reform, or abolish their government in such manner as they may think proper."

CALIFORNIA.

1849: "All political power is inherent in the people. Government is instituted for the protection, security, and benefit of the people, and they have the right to alter or reform the same whenever the public good may require it."

COLORADO.

1876: "That all political power is vested in and derived from the people; that all government of right originates from the people, is founded upon their will only, and is instituted solely for the good of the whole."

CONNECTICUT.

1818: "That all political power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority and instituted for their benefit, and they have at all times an undeniable and indefeasible right to alter their form of government in such a manner as they may think expedient."

DELAWARE.

1792: "All just authority in the institutions of political society is derived from the people and established with their consent to advance their happiness, and they may for this end as circumstances require, from time to time, alter their constitution of government."

FLORIDA.

1838: "That all political power is inherent in the people, and free governments are founded on their authority and established for their benefit, and therefore they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may deem expedient."

GEORGIA.

1777: "We, therefore, the representatives of the people, from whom all power originates and for whose benefit all government is intended, by virtue of the power delegated to us, do ordain and declare, and it is hereby ordained and declared, that the following rules and regulations be adopted for the future government of this State."

IDAHO.

1889: "All political power is inherent in the people. Government is instituted for their equal protection and benefit, and they have the right to alter, reform, or abolish the same whenever they may deem it necessary, and no special privileges or immunities shall ever be granted that may not be altered, revoked, or repealed by the legislature."

ILLINOIS.

1818: "That all power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their peace, safety, and happiness."

INDIANA.

1816: "That all power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their peace, safety, and well being. For the advancement of these ends the people have at all times an unalienable and indefeasible right to alter and reform their government in such manner as they may think proper."

IOWA.

1846: "That all political power is inherent in the people. Government is instituted for the protection, security, and benefit of the people, and they have the right at all times to alter or reform the same whenever the public good may require it."

KANSAS.

1855: "All political power is inherent in the people. Government is instituted for their equal protection and benefit, and they have the right to alter, reform, or abolish the same whenever they may deem it necessary, and no special privileges or immunities shall ever be granted that may not be altered, revoked, or repealed by the general assembly."

KENTUCKY.

1792: "That all power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority and instituted for their peace, safety, and happiness. For the advancement of these ends they have at all times an unalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish their government in such manner as they may think proper."

LOUISIANA.

1868: "All men are created free and equal and have certain inalienable rights; among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. To secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

MAINE.

1819: "All power is inherent in the people; all free governments are founded in their authority and instituted for their benefit; they have, therefore, an unalienable and indefeasible right to institute government and to alter, reform, or totally change the same, when their safety and happiness require it."

MARYLAND.

1776: "That all government of right originates from the people, is founded in compact only and instituted solely for the good of the whole."

MASSACHUSETTS.

The first constitution submitted in Massachusetts was rejected by the people by direct vote at town meetings in the spring of 1779, because it contained no bill of rights, and for other reasons. The next constitution submitted, that of 1780, the people adopted by direct vote at town meetings and by more than two-thirds of all who voted. The bill of rights declares:

BILL OF RIGHTS.

1780: "ARTICLE I. All men are born free and equal, and have certain natural, essential, and inalienable rights; among which may be reckoned the right of enjoying and defending their lives and liberties; that of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property; in fine, that of seeking and obtaining their safety and happiness.

"ART. IV. The people of this Commonwealth have the sole and exclusive right of governing themselves as a free, sovereign, and independent State, and do, and forever shall, exercise and enjoy every power, jurisdiction, and right which is not, or may not hereafter be, by them expressly delegated to the United States of America in Congress assembled.

"ART. V. All power residing originally in the people, and being derived from them, the several magistrates and officers of government vested with authority, whether legislative, executive, or judicial, are their substitutes and agents and are at all times accountable to them."

MICHIGAN.

1835: "All political power is inherent in the people.

"Government is instituted for the protection, security, and benefit of the people; and they have the right at all times to alter or reform the same and to abolish one form of government and establish another, whenever the public good requires it."

MINNESOTA.

1857: "Government is instituted for the security, benefit, and protection of the people, in whom all political power is inherent, together with the right to alter, modify, or reform such government whenever the public good may require it."

MISSISSIPPI.

1817: "That all political power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority and instituted for their benefit, and therefore they have at all times an unalienable and indefeasible right to alter or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think expedient."

MISSOURI.

1820: "That all political power is vested in and derived from the people."

MONTANA.

1889: "All political power is vested in and derived from the people; all government of right originates with the people, is founded upon their will only, and is instituted solely for the good of the whole."

NEBRASKA.

1866–67: "All men are born equally free and independent and have certain inherent rights; among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. To secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

NEVADA.

1864: "All political power is inherent in the people. Government is instituted for the protection, security, and benefit of the people, and they have the right to alter or reform the same whenever the public good may require it."

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

In New Hampshire four constitutions were submitted to the people, who voted directly upon them at town meetings. The first three were rejected (American Political Science Review, Vol. II, p. 549) largely because there were no express limitations upon the power of the legislature—no bill of rights. The bill of rights of the fourth one, that of 1784, declares:

1784: "VII. The people of this State have the sole and exclusive right of governing themselves as a free, sovereign, and independent State, and do, and forever hereafter shall, exercise and enjoy every power, jurisdiction, and right pertaining thereto which is not or may not hereafter be by them expressly delegated to the United States of America in Congress assembled."

NEW JERSEY.

The New Jersey constitution of 1776 declares:

1776: "Whereas all the constitutional authority ever possessed by the Kings of Great Britain over these Colonies or their other dominions was, by compact, derived from the people and held of them for the common interest of the whole society, allegiance and protection are, in the nature of things, reciprocal ties, each equally depending upon the other and liable to be dissolved by the others being refused or withdrawn. And whereas George III, King of Great Britain, has refused protection to the good people of these Colonies, and, by assenting to sundry acts of the British Parliament, attempted to subject them to the absolute dominion of that body, and has also made war upon them in the most cruel and unnatural manner for no other cause than asserting their just rights, all civil authority under him is necessarily at an end and a dissolution of government in each Colony has consequently taken place."

NEW YORK.

The New York bill of rights of 1777 declares:

1777: "I. This convention, therefore, in the name and by the authority of the good people of this State, doth ordain, determine, and declare that no authority shall, on any pretense whatever, be exercised over the people or members of this State but such as shall be derived from and granted by them."

NORTH CAROLINA.

1776: "That all political power is vested in and derived from the people only."

NORTH DAKOTA.

1889: "All political power is inherent in the people. Government is instituted for the protection, security, and benefit of the people, and they have a right to alter or reform the same when the public good may require."

OHIO.

1802: "That all men are born equally free and independent, and have certain natural, inherent, and unalienable rights * * * and every free republican government being founded on their sole authority, and organized for the great purpose of protecting their rights and liberties and securing their independence; to effect these ends, they have at all times a complete power to alter, reform, or abolish their government whenever they may deem it necessary."

OKLAHOMA.

1907: "All political power is inherent in the people; and government is instituted for their protection, security, and benefit, and to promote their general welfare; and they have the right to alter or reform the same whenever the public good may require it."

OREGON.

1857: "That all power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority and instituted for their peace, safety, and happiness, and they have at all times a right to alter, reform, or abolish the government in such manner as they may think proper."

PENNSYLVANIA.

1776: "That the people of this State have the sole, exclusive, and inherent right of governing and regulating the internal police of the same.

"That all power being originally inherent in, and consequently derived from, the people; therefore all officers of government, whether legislative or executive, are their trustees and servants, and at all times accountable to them."

RHODE ISLAND.

1842: "The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and alter their constitutions of government."

SOUTH CAROLINA.

1790: "All power is originally vested in the people; and all free governments are founded on their authority, and are instituted for their peace, safety, and happiness."

SOUTH DAKOTA.

1889: "All men are born equally free and independent and have certain inherent rights, among which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty, of acquiring and protecting property, and a pursuit of happiness. To secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

TENNESSEE.

1796: "That all power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority and instituted for their peace, safety, and happiness; for the advancement of those ends they have at all times an unalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish the government in such manner as they may think proper."

TEXAS (REPUBLIC).

1836: "All political power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority and instituted for their benefit; and they have at all times an unalienable right to alter their government in such manner as they may think proper."

TEXAS (STATE).

1845: "All political power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority and instituted for their benefit; and they have at all times the unalienable right to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think expedient."

UTAH.

1895: "All political power is inherent in the people, and free governments are founded on their authority for all their protection and benefit; and they have the right to alter or reform their government as the public welfare may require."

VERMONT.

1777: "That all power being originally inherent in, and consequently derived from, the people; therefore, all officers of government, whether legislative or executive, are their trustees and servants, and at all times accountable to them.

* * * * * * *

"* * * and that the community hath an indubitable, unalienable, and indefeasible right to reform, alter, or abolish government in such manner as shall be, by that community, judged most conducive to the public weal."

VIRGINIA.

1776: "That all power is vested in, and consequently derived from, the people."

WASHINGTON.

1889: "All political power is inherent in the people, and governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, and are established to protect and maintain individual rights."

WEST VIRGINIA.

1861–1863: "The powers of government reside in all the citizens of the State, and can be rightfully exercised only in accordance with their will and appointment."

WISCONSIN.

1848: "All men are born equally free and independent and have certain inherent rights; among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

WYOMING.

1889: "All power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority and instituted for their peace, safety, and happiness; for the advancement of these ends, they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish the government in such manner as they may think proper."

Mr. President, undoubtedly all governing powers spring from the people, and this fundamental fact is recognized universally. One of the most important of the governing powers is the right to elect judges and to recall them when they cease to be satisfactory to the people for any reason whatever, or without any reason whatever. The people are not called upon to assign any reason in exercising this right of self-government.

IF JUDGES SHOULD BE APPOINTED FOR LIFE, WHY NOT HAVE SENATORS AND CONGRESSMEN APPOINTED BY THE PRESIDENT FOR LIFE?

If judges for life, why not Senators and Congressmen for life? Why not prosecuting attorneys for life? Why not a President for life? Would it not make them more independent of "popular clamor"? Would it not thus enable them to be free from the influence of the prejudices, passions, and immature views of the vulgar populace? Would they not, under such favorable conditions, make better rulers of the people?

But, Mr. President, it is not rulers of the vulgar populace we seek. We demand public servants, not rulers, and we wish these servants to respect the will of the people, and not despise the people, or view them as a "vulgar populace." Let us hear no more of "popular clamor"; of the "turbulence of the democracy"; of the "vulgar populace." The people have more wisdom, more dignity, and more justice than those of their paid servants who indulge such sentiments or voice such views. No man has the right to hold public office and thus offend the confidence of those who trust him with their powers and dignities.

THE RIGHT OF RECALL OF JUDGES IS JUSTIFIED BY REASON AND COMMON SENSE AS WELL AS BY PRECEDENT.

The recall, which has been provided for in so many of the States, as I have heretofore pointed out, is certainly justified by sound reason and common sense. Why should anyone contend that a judge who for any reason is incapacitated to properly serve the people should not be recalled, except by impeachment? Why should anyone insist that a judge who is infirm, disabled, feeble, decrepit, and worn out should not be recalled, except by impeachment?

Should a judge who becomes imbecile, weak of intellect, or a neurotic, retain power to pass upon the life and property of citizens, upon the liberty of citizens, without the possibility of recall except by impeachment? Impeachment is too severe in such a case. The recall may be applied with honor. Such a judge having been faithful might well be recalled and placed upon a pension roll by virtue of his past services. Suppose a judge becomes personally malicious, detestable, and hateful to the people and continually guilty of petty tyrannies, shall they have no relief except by impeachment?

Shall a judge who is a victim of paresis or of a permanent malignant disease continue to wear the ermine and oppress those who have honored him, and they have no remedy? Shall his incompetency, his unfitness, his inefficiency have no remedy except by impeachment? The recall is a much milder system than impeachment. It operates benignly, and may remove a judge who becomes infirm, disabled, or inefficient without disgrace, and it may be exercised with honor to the judge.

I think an honorable judge who has rendered faithful service and who becomes disqualified physically or mentally should be put upon an honorable pension roll, but I do not believe a Supreme Court judge should remain on the bench determining the issues affecting the national life long after his vital forces have departed. I do not see how a man with integrity of mind can insist upon life tenure and no recall when he considers this contingency.

Mr. President, a judge upon the bench is only a human being after all, and he might become intemperate, not sufficiently to justify impeachment, perhaps, but sufficiently to justify recall. He might become mentally incapable or physically incapable, not sufficiently, perhaps, to justify impeachment, but quite sufficiently to justify recall for the benefit of the service.

Such a judge might become corrupt and be so skillful in his corrupt judgments that it would be impossible to impeach; and yet the wisdom of his removal by recall might be beyond doubt.

He might become neglectful, remiss in duty, indifferent, or careless—not sufficiently, perhaps, to justify impeachment, but yet, for the good of the service, sufficiently to justify recall.

He might acquire immoral habits, overbearing manners, insolent behavior—not sufficiently, perhaps, to justify impeachment, but quite sufficiently to justify recall.

Mr. President, there are many degrees of malfeasance and of misfeasance justifying recall which would not justify impeachment. Mr. President, a judge upon the bench is merely a lawyer employed by the people, at a salary, to interpret the law. He does so in the light of his environment, influenced by his education, by his previous political and judicial predilections, influenced by his long practice at the bar. Perhaps he may have been the valued attorney of various powerful corporations, whom he has long served and whose interest in him has led to his preferment on the bench by the skilled influences of commercial interests brought to bear upon the appointing power. Suppose such a judge in a series of decisions uniformly decided cases against the interests of the people, whose servant he had become, and uniformly decided such cases in favor of special privilege, whose paid servant he formerly was. Should the people have no right to recall him except by impeachment? Such a judge may be perfectly conscientious; but will that suffice to justify his continuance in office under such circumstances?

Mr. President, the right of recall of judges is all the more important when we recognize the fact that the big interests of this country have taken infinite pains to bring about the nomination and promotion as Federal judges of those whose opinions and bias of mind were known to be favorable to their point of view.

Whenever a vacancy occurs on the Federal bench, immediately the most lively and active pressure is brought to bear by various business interests in favor of candidates desired by them, and I pause to remark that it is quite immaterial whether such candidate has previously been regarded as a Democrat or as a Republican.

I do not mean to suggest that candidates thus urged are in any degree dishonest or corrupt, although that is always a possibility; but I do mean to say that they are merely human beings. That such candidates have been practicing lawyers, some good lawyers and some not so good, gives them no divine unction of infallibility. That they are influenced and controlled in their opinions by their education and their environment and by the arguments which they have previously been engaged in making is absolutely certain. I do mean to say that corporate interests do seek to place upon the Federal bench and in the State courts those candidates who are known to favor the point of view of the special interests as against the interests of the people, and that I do believe such appointments on the Federal bench are the rule and not the exception.

A short time ago I had the honor of calling the attention of the Senate to an illuminating instance of how judges appointed to discharge the most important work are influenced by their previous environment. This was illustrated by the record of the Electoral Commission of 1877, appointed to determine who should be President of the United States—whether Mr. Tilden, of New York, or Mr. Hayes, of Ohio.

That commission was composed of five Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States—Hon. Joseph P. Bradley, Hon. Nathan Clifford, Hon. Samuel F. Miller, Hon. Stephen J. Field, and Hon. W. Strong; five distinguished United States Senators—Edmunds, Morton, Frelinghuysen, Thurman, and Bayard; and five great leaders of the House of Representatives—Mr. Payne, Mr. Hunton, Mr. Abbott, Mr. Garfield, and Mr. Hoar. This distinguished commission passed upon four contested-electoral cases involving the electoral vote of Oregon, of South Carolina, of Louisiana, and of Florida, a voluminous record, involving many difficult questions, and the remarkable result followed that every one of the 15 followed his previous political predilection, and by a decision of 8 to 7 decided every point of importance in that case and decided the result in each of the four cases in the strictest accord with the previous political opinion of each of these 15 judges sitting upon that electoral commission to determine the Presidency of the United States in the Tilden and Hayes controversy.

It is not necessary to question the integrity of purpose or the sincerity of judgment of any one of the seven great Democrats who sat on that Electoral Commission or of the eight distinguished Republicans who sat on it, but it taught a lesson to this country that men are profoundly influenced by their previous environment and partisan prejudices. These illustrations could be multiplied indefinitely.

Mr. President, this peculiar characteristic of mortal man to be influenced by his previous opinions must not be ignored by prudent statesmen in determining the conduct of government. If the Supreme Bench, consisting of nine excellent gentlemen, should be composed of nine loyal and patriotic Irishmen, they would be unanimously in favor of "home rule" for Ireland, and give most learned reasons for the opinion. Or if this excellent tribunal should consist of nine loyal and faithful Tories, they would conscientiously decide "home rule" to be a dangerous heresy, and give overwhelming arguments why it should be denied. Nor would it be fair or decent to charge them with bad faith for their decisions or opinions. It is a question of previous predilection, of previous fixed opinion, of the point of view which has molded itself in the personal experience of the judge and become a part of him.

A President who could be persuaded to appoint a majority of Irishmen on the Supreme Bench need not be astonished at home-rule decisions. Nor should he be shocked if a Tory bench decide against home rule.

This psychological fact gives a sound reason for the active interest of big business in the appointment of Federal judges. Big business men understand perfectly well the importance of engineering the nomination of judges. Yes, Mr. President, and they understand perfectly well the importance of engineering the nomination of a President of the United States whose honest sympathies and views are in harmony with their point of view, so that such an Executive should be expected to listen with respect and with conviction to the convincing arguments in favor of candidates for the ermine "who are the right kind of people." These amiable gentlemen who engineer nominations "know exactly what they want." As Abraham Lincoln once remarked, "for the kind of people that like that kind of thing, it is the very kind of thing that that kind of people like."

I venture to believe, Mr. President, that the people of the United States have slowly learned to know exactly what they want, and the people will acquire it by peaceful processes, by progressive processes, and, among other agencies, by the right of election and of recall of judges.

THE RECALL JUSTIFIED AS A MEANS OF CONTROLLING A JUDICIAL RULING POWER THAT HAS VIOLATED THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES, VIOLATED THE RIGHTS OF THE STATES, INVADED THE LEGISLATIVE FUNCTION, AND BECOME AN INSTRUMENT OF OPPRESSION THROUGH JUDICIAL LEGISLATION.

The Federal courts have invaded the Constitution and invaded the rights of the States and invaded the legislative function of Congress and of the States, and have become an instrument through which the special interests have been enabled to block all progressive legislation of recent years. The manner in which this has been done has been well explained by James Allen Smith, Ph. D., professor of political science, University of Washington, in The Spirit of American Government; by Hon. Walter Clark, chief justice of the Supreme Court of North Carolina, in his address before the law department of the University of Pennsylvania, April 27, 1906 (Exhibit B); by Gilbert E. Roe, under the title of "Our Judicial Oligarchy," in La Follette's, June 17, 1911, to July 15, 1911; and by other able lawyers and students of government.

I ask permission to add the paper to my remarks as an exhibit and to have it printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAPP in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. OWEN. The Constitutional Convention, secret and reactionary though it was, four times refused to provide that the Supreme Court should pass upon the constitutionality of acts of Congress, to wit: On June 5, 1787, the proposal received the vote of two States only; on June 6, July 21, and August 15 the proposal was renewed, and at no time received the votes of more than three States.

The eighth resolution, proposed by Mr. Edmund Randolph, of Virginia, to the convention May 29, 1787, was as follows:

Resolved, That the Executive and a convenient number of the national judiciary ought to compose a council of revision, with authority to examine every act of the National Legislature before it shall operate, and every act of a particular legislature, before a negative thereon shall be final; and that the dissent of the said council shall amount to a rejection, unless the act of the National Legislature be again passed or that of a particular legislature be again negatived by —— of the members of each branch. (Elliot's Debates, vol. 1, p. 144.)

Its passage was refused on June 4, 1787 (Elliot's Debates, vol. 1, p. 159), and was rejected on June 6, 1787 (ibid., 164), and in substance was again rejected on July 21, 1787, only receiving the support of three States. (Ibid., 214.)

On August 5, 1787, in another form, the following proposal was made, which was rejected, only receiving three votes:

Every bill which shall have passed the two Houses shall, before it become a law, be severally presented to the President of the United States and to the judges of the Supreme Court for the revision of each. If, upon such revision, they shall approve of it, they shall respectfully signify their approbation by signing it; but if, upon such revision, it shall appear improper to either, or both, to be passed into a law, it shall be returned, with the objections against it, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider the bill; but if, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of that House, when either the President or a majority of the judges shall object, or three-fourths where both shall object, shall agree to pass it, it shall, together with the objections, be sent to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered; and, if approved by two-thirds or three-fourths of the other House, as the case may be, it shall become a law. (Elliot's Debates, vol. 1, p. 243.) (The Supreme Court to the contrary notwithstanding.)

This mild provision for disapproving a law before passage, which still might pass by a two-thirds vote of Congress, even if disapproved by the Supreme Court was overwhelmingly rejected.

The court now vetoes an act of Congress after it is passed, and a unanimous Congress can not make it constitutional or valid if the court's action is constitutional.

Such a provision in the Constitution would have defeated it before the States, yet by slow degrees the Supreme Court has assumed, without constitutional warrant, to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional. The Constitution is one of delegated powers, and it does not delegate the right to declare statutes unconstitutional.

The courts of no republic have such authority. In the great Republics of New Zealand, Australia, Switzerland, and France, and even in the Empires of Great Britain and Germany, Austria, and of Denmark, the courts exercise no such right.

I understand the constitution of Mexico, our great neighbor on the south, directly forbids the courts to declare unconstitutional an act of the Congress of Mexico.

To declare an act unconstitutional passed by Congress is, in effect, to charge the Senators and Congressmen who pass the act on their solemn oaths to observe the Constitution and the President with having violated their oaths of office by passing unconstitutional laws.

Some power must determine the constitutionality of an act. Why not the House and Senate and President, the immediate representatives chosen by the people? They are subject to quick recall, by short tenure of office, if they violate their 483 several oaths to obey the Constitution.

Is it better to place this imperial power in the hands of nine lawyers not elected by the people and holding office for life and not responsible to the sovereign people?

In England the declaring invalid of an act of Parliament was a contributing cause to the hanging of Chief Justice Tresilian for high treason and banishing his associates. Declaring acts of Parliament invalid in 1688 led to the arrest of Chief Justice Jeffreys, the flight of James II, and the revolution, and the act of settlement of 1701, which established the right of recall of judges in the hands of Parliament.

George Jeffreys, chief justice of England in 1683, aided in destroying popular government in London by pushing on the quo warranto proceedings which deprived London of its charter.

Although chief justice of England he was a bloodthirsty villian of the deepest dye, and in 1685, on the western circuit in his bloody assize, he condemned hundreds of people to death; he assigned 800 persons to his favorites to be sold as slaves, and imprisoned and maimed hundreds more; yet James II made him lord chancellor and keeper of the great seal. The people rose against him. His master, James II, fled, and Jeffreys was taken to the Tower, where he died.

His great intellectual ability only made more damnable his vicious conduct as chief justice.

The revolution of 1688 led to the act of settlement of 1701, since which time Parliament has exercised the right of recall of English judges.

Thomas Jefferson, in his letter to Mr. Jarvis, in 1820, wisely said:

> You seem to consider the judges as the ultimate arbiters of all constitutional questions; a very dangerous doctrine, indeed, and one that would place us under the despotism of an oligarchy.

John Marshall, the famous Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, before he became Chief Justice, declared in the presence of the Supreme Court:

> The legislative authority of any country can only be restrained by its own municipal constitution; this is a principle that springs from the very nature of society, and the judicial authority can have no right to question the validity of a law, unless such a jurisdiction is expressly given by the Constitution. (Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dall., 211.)

No one pretends that the jurisdiction is expressly given by the Constitution, and John Marshall ought to have known it was expressly refused.

In all of the great Governments of Great Britain, Germany, France, Switzerland, and so forth, the Parliament decides the constitutionality of its own acts, being responsible to the suffrage of the people. The Congress of the United States, consisting of 483 elected representatives of the people in the Senate and House, who took a solemn oath of office before Almighty God that they would faithfully observe the Constitution and the President are naturally better qualified and fitted to determine the constitutionality of their own acts, being immediately responsible to their people at home, than any other power. They are better qualified to do this than the nine lawyers comprising the Supreme Court, who are appointed for life, and who are not responsible to the people and who are not elected by the people. The Supreme Court is appointed by the President, the President being nominated by a national convention consisting of delegates three degrees removed from the people, and elected by electors several times removed from the people.

Those who are directly responsible to the people, those who have by constitutional authority the right to make the laws, are charged by the Constitution with the duty of observing the Constitution in making such laws, and they take a solemn oath to perform this very function.

To allow their decisions to be set aside by any tribunal not responsible to the people, not elected by the people, not subject to the recall of the people, or of the people's representatives, is to establish a judicial oligarchy and to overthrow the Republic. It very nearly overthrew the Republic under the Dred Scott decision attempting to nationalize slavery.

To permit the Supreme Court to nullify acts of Congress, declared by Congress to be constitutional, is to permit the judicial branch to overthrow the legislative branch, as it has overthrown the antitrust law without declaring it unconstitutional. No such power was intended by the Constitution to be granted to the judiciary branch. This doctrine was most emphatically denied by President Jackson in the case of the United States Bank, which the Supreme Court attempted to uphold against his policy. Jackson did not permit it, and received the approval of the people of the country.

THE JUDICIAL RULING POWER HAS BECOME A BULWARK OF SPECIAL PRIVILEGE.

> Up to 1887 20 Federal statutes and 185 State statutes had been held invalid by the Supreme Court of the United States alone. This does not include the innumerable State statutes which the lower Federal courts have nullified under the shield of the Supreme Court decisions. This list will be found in One hundred and thirty-first United States Reports, Appendix CCXXXV, and since that time this list has been greatly increased, and the decisions have been most objectionable since 1887. These decisions have usually been made by a divided court, but in some cases the change of a single vote would have completely changed the result. The legislation thus destroyed was practically all carefully devised to meet existing and recognized evils, and enacted in response to an overwhelming demand of the people. (Gilbert E. Roe.)

These various decisions have not only nullified statutes of the greatest importance, passed for the protection of the people, but other decisions have been made, which are, in effect, judicial legislation.

THE GREAT INDUSTRIAL CORPORATIONS HAVE BEEN SHIELDED UNDER THESE DECISIONS, THE CONTROL OF RAILWAYS AND MONOPOLIES OBSTRUCTED, COMPENSATION FOR INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENTS DEFEATED, AND THE ARBITRATION OF INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES STRUCK DOWN, AND VARIOUS STATE STATUTES VETOED AND ABOLISHED.

Out of the great multitude I submit a few instances as illustrations. For example:

In ex parte Young, 209 U. S., 123, the attorney general of Minnesota is punished for contempt for performing his duty in obedience to the statute of the State of Minnesota regulating the rates of public-service corporations.

The statute of Texas was set aside as unconstitutional in the case of Galveston, Harrisburg & San Antonio Railroad Co. versus the State of Texas (210 U. S., 217), taxing the gross receipts of railroad companies within the State.

The statute of Kansas taxing the Western Union Telegraph Co. was set aside in like manner. (216 U. S., 1.)

The Oklahoma constitution establishing a corporation commission was declared invalid under the Constitution of the United States by the decision of Justice Hook, March 29, 1911.

Judge Sanborn's decision in the case of Sheppard versus Northern Pacific Railway Co. on April 11 practically destroyed the Minnesota statute providing for the regulation of rates of public-service corporations.

The fourteenth amendment, intended to protect the negro, has been twisted from its purpose to protect the trusts and monopolies in imposing long hours of labor on employees on the absurd theory that to deny the employee the right to work long hours is a denial of his constitutional "privileges."

> Everyone knows that the sole intent and purpose of the people in adding this amendment to the Constitution was to protect the then recently emancipated negroes in their rights of citizenship. The courts, however, have made this amendment include all manner of trusts and corporations and of contracts and practices, none of which were even in the thoughts of the people when they adopted the amendment. In the hands of the courts this amendment has become a shield to protect corporations and combinations of wealth from the legislation aimed at them by an indignant public and also a sword by which statute after statute has been cut down, enacted by the lawmaking branch of the Government in the public interest. (Roe.)

The employers' liability act, for the protection of employees, was held unconstitutional by 5 to 4. (39 Cong. Rec., 11, 1904; 40 Cong. Rec., 93, 1905.)

The compulsory arbitration act, passed as the result of the great strike at Chicago in 1894 and intended to prevent the recurrence of such unfortunate difficulties, was destroyed by the Supreme Court. (Adair v. U. S., 208 U. S., 164.)

The workmen's compensation law of New York was, in like manner, destroyed by the New York courts. (Ives v. So. Buffalo Ry. Co., 201 N. Y., 271.)

The income tax law was struck down in like manner by the Supreme Court. The serious error of the Supreme Court in this case I heretofore pointed out on the floor of the Senate, where the inhibition of a direct tax on a State was absurdly construed to inhibit a direct tax on a citizen of the United States. (May 7, 1909, Rec., 1821, and May 17, 1909, Rec., 2104.) The decision in this case, by the change of the vote of one judge—of one lawyer in this court, appointed at whose instance we do not know—has cost the mass of the people of the United States a hundred million a year for over 16 years, $1,600,000,000 in all, and relieved those best able to bear the tax of a like amount.

One billion six hundred millions of dollars by the vote of one man, appointed by what influence? We do not know and can not say. No such power ought to be put in the hands of any man. No man not responsible to the people or the representatives of the people ought to have the power to control the fiscal policy of this Nation contrary to the law of the people of the Nation and contrary to the will of the Senate of the United States and the Congress of the United States. No such unconstitutional decision would have been rendered if the court had been subject to recall.

What better evidence could be afforded of the patience, forbearance, and conservatism of the people than that they have so long borne patiently with such a decision?

Mr. Justice Field, in his opinion in this case, spoke of the income tax as "the present assault upon capital," and suggested that, if the court allowed it to stand, the time would come when the limitation on the tax on incomes might be designated by "a board of walking delegates." This insolent reference would have justified his impeachment by Congress.

Justice Jackson, on this court, declared this decision "the most disastrous blow ever struck at the constitutional power of Congress."

It must be remembered that Justice Jackson was not a radical nor a Populist.

Justice Brown expressed the fear that the decision, in some moment of national peril, would rise up to "frustrate the will and paralyze the arm" of Congress. He said:

> I hope it may not prove the first step toward the despotism of wealth. As I can not escape the conviction that the decision of the court in this great case is fraught with immeasurable danger to the future of the country, and that it approaches the proportions of a national calamity, I feel it my duty to enter my protest against it.

Justice Brown, of the Supreme Court, can not be waived aside as a radical. He was a member of the Supreme Court and an associate of the majority which rendered this decision.

Justice Harlan said it was to be "deeply deplored" "as a disaster to the country," and said:

I can not assent to an interpretation of the Constitution that impairs and cripples the just powers of the National Government in the essential matter of taxation and at the same time discriminates against the greater part of the people of our country.

Justice Harlan is not a "radical." Justice Jackson, Justice Brown, and Justice Harlan are all conservatives and patriots, and they deserve the thanks of the country for pointing out the dangerous character of the decisions of the Supreme Court in this and other cases.

The most serious feature of this decision was that the real question in the minds of the judges was not its conflict with the Constitution, but their view of the expediency of the income tax. They thought it bad policy, and for that reason found it unconstitutional by an intellectual legerdemain to set aside the unbroken precedents of the Supreme Court itself of this same court for over a hundred years.

The courts of the country have indeed been in large measure the bulwarks of law and order, and they deserve great praise for their good works, but this does not abate the fact that they also have shown a bias in favor of special privilege, which is highly dangerous to the best interests of the country. The good features should be preserved and the weaknesses of the Federal judiciary should be eliminated.

Mr. President, I am of opinion that the Federal judiciary is the bulwark of special privilege, and therefore anticipate that every organ of special privilege in the country will vigorously denounce the recall of Federal judges. They will say it is radical—that it is revolutionary, that it is populistic, socialistic—even anarchistic. Very well, Mr. President, what have they to say about electing and recalling the judges in the various States of the Union? Are these States to be charged with being anarchistic?

Nearly all the States in the Union elect their judges, and nearly all the States of the Union—43 of the 46—elect them for comparatively short terms, which thus provides for automatic recall by short tenure of office, in addition to which 32 of the States provide the further safeguard of recall through the general assembly, and all 46 States provide for recall by impeachment. It will not do to charge all these States with being radical, extreme, or unsound. They compose the backbone, the brain, and the brawn of this Republic, and their judgment is far more worthy to be relied on than the selfish criticisms of the organs and advocates of special interests concerned in maintaining a bulwark of special privilege.

I know, Mr. President, that I will be denounced for demanding the recall of Federal judges, and I am willing to yield myself to be publicly abused by the organs of privilege if I may to some extent promote the truth and establish the right of the mass of men to their full powers of self-government, which is so essential and necessary before we can hope for a restoration of equality of opportunity, which I regard as the great problem in modern life. I have been a business man and a banker. I believe in stimulating men by encouraging the acquisition of property, by promoting the stability of property. I believe in these things, and for that very reason I am opposed to the gigantic organizations which are slowly undermining the stability of property, which are slowly taking away the opportunity for the mass of men to acquire a reasonable competence, while they promote a policy which permits a few men to appropriate to selfish uses the great volumes of wealth created by the honest labor of the body of the people. I am a conservative, and I am not a radical. It is far better, in my opinion, to urge a fair deal now, before this Republic has gone too far upon the wrong road, as it did do under the Dred Scott decision and the unamendable Constitution in 1861. If the present evils are not corrected we may reach the point where human passion may explode and property rights be subjected to sudden and extreme readjustment.

THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT.

The interstate commerce act has been emasculated by the Supreme Court. Memoranda of the decisions I hereto attach as an exhibit, demonstrating the manner in which it has been steadily depleted and weakened. [Exhibit A.]

THE WHOLESALE LIQUOR INTEREST WAS PROTECTED BY THE SO-CALLED "ORIGINAL-PACKAGE DECISION."

The Declaration of Independence and the principles laid down therein were ignored and reversed in the insular cases, in which this Republic was held to have the imperial power of governing and controlling other people as "subjects" to the imperial power of this Republic, not entitled to the rights set forth in the Declaration of Independence and the Bills of Rights of the 46 States.

THE ANTITRUST ACT.

The Sherman antitrust law has, by the recent decisions of the Supreme Court in the Standard Oil case and in the Tobacco Trust case by writing in the word "unreasonable," been effectually destroyed.

It was loudly proclaimed that the Standard Oil monopoly had been dissolved by this decision. The fact is that the Standard Oil stock immediately went up, instead of down, after this decision was rendered. On May 15, 1911, the day of the decision, it was 679; and on May 19, four days later, it was 686, after the owners of this stock had had time to digest the opinion.

The packers who had been indicted as guilty of a crime, under this statute—Sherman antitrust—immediately offered the defense that their restraint of trade had been reasonable, and as they are entitled to a reasonable doubt, the criminal part of this statute is made nugatory by the Supreme Court of the United States. The court has, in effect, vetoed the act of Congress by judicial legislation.

Mr. President, the constant tendency of the Federal courts has been to sustain property rights as against human rights. This has been exhibited not only in recent days but in times long gone by, as in the Dred Scott decision, when the Supreme Court, appointed by the slave-holding interests, nationalized slavery and declared the sacred right of property, under the Constitution, in human beings—a decision which led to war. This Dred Scott decision was to be expected, considering the frailty of human beings, because, with the greatest respect for the attorneys who are appointed as the public servants on the bench, they, too, are but human, being controlled by their environment and by their previous predilections, and if their appointment is obtained by big business the country may be assured that their judgments will be conscientiously delivered in favor of the interests of big business. It would be, in my opinion, an error to impute to the President of the United States, who appoints the judges, any purpose to do wrong in the appointments. He doubtless does what he believes to be conscientious and right under the advice which he receives as to the fitness of men who are appointed. He doubtless listens to "the right kind of people," and they urge "the right kind" of candidates, and obtain "the right kind of judges." "For people who like that kind of thing, it is the very kind of thing that that kind of people like."

Doubtless the high intelligences in control of great commercial enterprises of the country who know their friends urge those for judicial appointment and preferment in whose point of view or in whose bias they know they can confide. We never hear anything about the dishonesty of the Federal judges. They are never charged with bribery or corruption. The danger in the Federal judiciary and in the State judiciary is not that corrupt men will wear the ermine, but that honest men will be put on the bench whose honest convictions are those of Judge Field, who regarded the income tax as an assault on wealth, and who believe they have a constitutional duty to paralyze the legislative branch of the Government by declaring its acts unconstitutional or "unreasonable." It is this intellectual strabismus, this perverted sense, conscientiously and sincerely entertained, that has established a judicial oligarchy under a system of appointment for life and the nomination of such persons by artful subterfuge, sophisticated pleading, and occult political tricks.

William J. Bryan, in the July North American Review (p. 13), well says:

Opinion on the trust question is largely a matter of bias; it is a question for the heart as well as the head. It is a poor head that can not find reasons for doing what the heart wants to do. It is a fundamental "rule of reason" that a man can generally find a reason—not always conclusive and sometimes not even plausible, but a reason sufficient for himself—for doing anything upon which his heart is really set. If bias is admitted—bias in the President as well as in the judge—it is entirely possible that a President might unconsciously select judges who would, without any previous pledge, agree quite naturally with those who represent their side of the great fundamental issues that divide society. If it "just happened" that in the selection of eight judges all should take the view of Justice White, and if it is not accounted for by bias on great subjects, then it shows what a lottery is conducted at the White House when the President blindfolds himself and picks judges at random, only to find that all the prizes have gone to those who do not fear "reasonable" trusts and none to those who oppose all restraint of trade.

I suppose nobody will deny that President Grant appointed additional judges on the Supreme Court of known opinions for the express purpose of declaring greenbacks constitutional in the legal-tender cases. Indeed, under our system of party government, where a court has been appointed with a bias against the interests of the people, the party representing the people would be justified, if necessary, in enlarging that court by putting on additional judges who believe in the policy of the full and free right of Congress to protect the people against monopoly, and who do not believe in judicial legislation or in the control of the national policies by a life-appointed judiciary.

THE THEORY OF JUDICIAL INFALLIBILITY.

It has always been the habit of kings and potentates to surround themselves with pomp and ceremony to impress the mass of men with their sacred function. They have claimed to receive the right to rule from God himself, and to rule by divine right. The judge in ancient times wore a huge horsehair wig, silk gown, and ermine. It impressed the people with the enormous dignity of the individual so attired. It raised the presumption of his infallibility. It excited the reverence of men, and so those who have found their shelter behind a judicial oligarchy have impressed tremendously upon the people of this country the idea of judicial infallibility. We are taught that we should reverence the courts; that we should not question their judgments, and when the Supreme Court of the United States has spoken it should no more be questioned than we should question the word of God.

I believe that the people should be taught to reverence the judicial branch of the Government, and I believe the judicial branch of the Government should be so framed as to merit reverence. I have a reverence for government. I have a reverence for the judiciary. I have a great respect for the judges on the bench, yet I should not hesitate to vote for the impeachment of a corrupt judge, nor would I hesitate to vote for the recall of a judge who merited recall or a judge who regarded an income tax as an assault on wealth. The theory of judicial infallibility has the same meritorious foundation of truth as Santa Claus. It is a pleasing fiction suitable for very young children.

Four out of five of these distinguished justices and five out of four are constantly assuring the country, with great gravity and decorum, in their various opinions of the honorable and distinguished fallibility of their brethren on the bench. If we take a series of cases, each judge in turn will be found in the minority and will be discovered in the interesting situation of having the majority of the Supreme Court declaring his fallibility. Each judge in turn is proven to be fallible by the Supreme Court of the United States, until not a single justice is left whose fallibility has not been judicially ascertained by a majority of the Supreme Bench of the United States. This is interesting but not surprising, for nobody ever imagined in the first case that the justices on the bench were anything but fallible. In the Legal Tender cases did they not reverse themselves? And was not the court packed by President Grant, with the connivance of Congress, who first reduced the court and then added to it for this very purpose? In the Standard Oil case and the Tobacco Trust case did not the Supreme Court reverse itself and its own decisions in the Inter-Missouri Freight case of 1897 and in the Joint Traffic case in 1898, in which the court expressly refused to write the word "unreasonable" before "restraint of trade"? This fiction of judicial infallibility might as well be abandoned by thinking men.

THE ELECTION AND RECALL OF FEDERAL JUDGES WOULD ELIMINATE STATE JEALOUSY AND BRING INTO MORE HARMONIOUS RELATION THE STATES AND THE NATION.

At present the citizens of the States, because of the aggression of the Federal judiciary, are extremely jealous and impatient because of the power exercised by these Federal officers. They are impatient because these officials are not subject to any control by public opinion. Citizens of the States submit that they are citizens of the United States at the same time, and regard the Federal judges as officers of a quasi alien power, contemptuous and indifferent to the rights of the States.

It is obviously of great importance that the officials of the Nation should be regarded by the people of the Nation as their public servants. If the Federal judges are elected and subject to recall one of the potent causes of friction and suspicion between the States and the Nation would be abated and probably terminated.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL AUTHORITY FOR RECALL.

The Constitution of the United States abundantly justifies both the election and recall of judges. Article II, section 4, provides flatly as follows:

> The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

It is not denied that impeachment can be resorted to as a means of removing any judge by impeachment tried by the Senate. Article I, section 3, paragraphs 6 and 7, requires a concurrence of two-thirds and is a difficult and impracticable method.

The deep disgrace of impeachment is, indeed, made mandatory by the Constitution on the conviction of "high crimes and misdemeanors," but the Constitution provides otherwise for "punishment according to law," which may be more benign for lesser faults or shortcomings. The Constitution says:

> But the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law.

The law, of course, is to be passed by Congress, so that Congress may pass a law under the Constitution for the punishment of any misconduct or misbehavior, which is a punishment to be inflicted in addition to the right of impeachment.

The Constitution provides both for impeachment and punishment otherwise. It provides for indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, and obviously contemplates that all civil officers of the United States may be removed from office on impeachment or may be otherwise subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law, or both to impeachment and trial otherwise. Congress is charged with all the legislative power of the United States, and under the Constitution has provided for the recall of other civil officers of the United States, and can do so as to the judges.

The Congress of the United States was authorized to ordain and establish one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as it might find suitable, in which should be vested the judicial power of the United States.

Article III, section 1:

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

It is to be observed that the judges hold office "during good behavior," and not during bad behavior; that they receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished "during their continuance in office" nor paid beyond their "continuance in office." If they are discontinued, the compensation ceases, but while they continue their compensation shall not be diminished. They hold office "during good behavior," not during bad behavior. In Massachusetts and New Hampshire judges hold likewise "during good behavior," and are recalled by the legislature or general assembly of the people.

With this understanding, which is fairly interpreted by the like stipulations of the various State constitutions, there should be no doubt of what the States intended when they ratified this Constitution providing for "the continuance in office" "during good behavior."

Many of the States at that time had the provision that the judges should hold office "during good behavior," subject to recall by the legislature, while Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, Delaware, New Jersey, Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia elected the judges by the legislature, and Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Georgia only permitted them to hold office for one year at a time, when they were automatically recalled by the short tenure. Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Maryland, Delaware, South Carolina, and Pennsylvania expressly provided for the right of recall by an address of the legislature.

In the original States, which provided for the holding of office "during good behavior," New Hampshire provided by its constitution (1784 and 1792) for the removal of judges without expressed cause by address of the legislature, and has recalled them four times during its history.

In New York judges can be removed by address of the legislature without assigning cause.

In Maryland, where they hold office "during good behavior," they are removable by an address of the legislature of the general assembly.

In North Carolina, where they hold office "during good behavior," they are removable by an address of the general assembly.

In South Carolina, where they hold office "during good behavior," they are removable by an address of the legislature, and in Virginia, where they hold office "during good behavior," they can be removed by an address of the general assembly, and so forth. Thirty-two States so recall their judges.

Who is responsible for the theory that judges can not be removed except by impeachment? Certainly they can be removed by impeachment, but who will maintain that they may not be removed under an act of Congress providing a suitable method?

Congress is authorized by the Constitution (Art. III, sec. 1) to ordain and establish the Supreme Court and the inferior courts. By the judiciary act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat., 73), it did ordain and establish these courts, designating how many judges should be on the court, providing them with suitable conveniences, fixed the time when they should hold office and the place where they should hold office, providing their salary, and annually thereafter made the appropriation to keep them in office and compensate them for their services.

Congress has, since then, increased the number of judges of the Supreme Court. It has diminished the number of the Supreme Court, as it did in the Legal Tender cases, to 7 judges, and thereafter increased the number again to 9 judges (Apr. 10, 1869), and obviously under the law could provide for 25 judges on this bench or 75 or diminish it to 3 judges. It certainly has the legal power to refuse to appropriate its salaries if it wants to do so.

The exercise of such powers as I have enumerated—the power of impeachment, the power to ordain and establish the court, to determine the number of judges on the bench, the power to pay or withhold salaries, to determine when it shall sit and where it shall sit—certainly carries with it the smaller and lesser power of recalling judges from the bench for bad behavior and to determine what bad behavior is.

WHO SHALL DETERMINE THE TENURE "DURING GOOD BEHAVIOR."

Mr. President, who is to determine "good behavior"? Is the court to do it? This would be absurd. Yet the power to determine "good behavior" must be somewhere. Does the Constitution not contemplate that the legislative branch, which ordains and establishes the court, which may increase or diminish the number of these judges, should have the right of determining what the "good behavior" is of these public servants, whose salaries are provided for by Congress annually? The Constitution put abundant power in the hands of the legislative branch, and the Legislature, consisting of 483 sworn Members of the House of Representatives and of the Senate, directly elected by the 90,000,000 of people of the United States, has the power to determine the "good behavior" of these judicial officers, and ought to declare it in terms most explicit, and when the right of removal for bad behavior is declared we shall have no more trouble with the conduct of the courts.

Recall would be more dignified than putting a sufficient number of new judges on the Supreme Bench (an undenied constitutional power) to reverse offensive unconstitutional decisions.

We are considering the question of power in Congress, not the wisdom of its possible exercise.

Congress, having power to establish this court, to provide for the appointment of judges during good behavior, and to pay them during their continuance in office, has a right, in my judgment, to recall them for bad behavior and discontinue their office and terminate their pay, and, in my judgment, the time has come to declare the right to exercise this authority.

When the right to exercise this power has been declared the need to exercise the power will immediately cease.

PUBLIC OPINION OF JUDICIAL ABUSE.

Mr. President, the country has been profoundly disturbed by the aggression of the courts, by the nullification of acts of Congress on alleged constitutional grounds, by judicial legislation, even where the constitutionality of the act was conceded, and by the other judicial aggressions I have pointed out.

The Republican platform of 1908, representing the great political party, declares against certain injunctions by the court.

The Democratic platform (1908) protests against the government by injunction.

The Independence Party (1908) condemns the arbitrary use of injunctions and contempt proceedings by the courts as a violation of the fundamental American right of trial by jury.

The People's Party of 1908 emphatically condemned the unjust assumption of authority by inferior Federal courts into nullifying by injunction the laws of the State and demanding its prohibition, and so forth.

The Socialist Party, casting half a million votes and representing two and a half million people in 1908, said "our courts are in the hands of the ruling classes."

But what difference does it make, Mr. President, whether the Republican Party protest or not; whether the Democratic Party, the Independence Party, the People's Party, and the Socialist Party protest against the aggression of the Federal judiciary, if these judges are appointed for life and can not be recalled? This court and its judicial dominance will long outlive any of these parties if this court, uncontrolled, can declare acts of Congress unconstitutional; if this court can, by judicial legislation, veto acts which are conceded to be unconstitutional, unless Congress has the right of recall. The remedy for the complaints of these five great political parties is the right of recall. It is a benign remedy; it is a constitutional remedy; it is the remedy of common sense and sound reason; it is a remedy, the example for which we have in all the States of the Union, either by short or fixed tenure or the right of recall. The whole court procedure, the manner in which difficulties are interposed in the way of obtaining justice, has practically made justice almost impossible to be obtained in the United States, and it is largely the fault of the judiciary and of the striking fact that they are not subject to the power of public opinion. Mr. President, they do not willingly permit free criticism. The jail is easily open to any man who ventures to express an opinion unfavorable to the courts. A jury trial is denied in such cases, and tyranny is thus exercised by judges on the bench, under color of protecting the bench.

Mr. Roosevelt, before the Colorado Legislature, pointed out the grave danger in recent court decisions in defeating humane laws, and stated:

If such decisions as these two indicated the court's permanent attitude, there would be really grave cause for alarm, for such decisions, if consistently followed up, would upset the whole system of popular government—

And he referred to such decisions as—flagrant and direct contradictions to the spirit and needs of the time.

Miss Jane Addams, the great sociological authority, points out that—

The workingmen's growing distrust of the integrity of the court, the belief that the present judge had been a corporation attorney, that his sympathies and experience, and his whole view of life is on the corporation's side.

President Taft, in his speech of September 16, 1909, is reported by the press of the city in which he spoke to have said:

Of all the questions that are before the American people I regard no one as more important than this, to wit, the improvement of the administration of justice. We must make it so that the poor man will have as nearly as possible an equal opportunity in litigating as the rich man; and under the present conditions, ashamed as we may be of it, this is not the fact.

Gilbert E. Roe, in a series of cases, demonstrates that the poor man is not on an equality with the rich man under the law expounding the "assumption of risk" by the poor employee and the rule of negligence of a fellow servant, and so forth. (La Follette's, July 29, 1911.)

The Hon. Walter L. Clark, chief justice of the Supreme Court of North Carolina, recently said (Arena, November, 1907):

At the present time the supreme power is not in the hands of the people, but in the power of the judges, who can set aside at will any expression of the people's will, made through an act of Congress or a State legislature. These judges are not chosen by the people nor subject to review by them. This is arbitrary power, and the corporations have taken possession of it by simply naming a majority of the judges.

Justice Clark also said, in his address at the University of Pennsylvania April 27, 1906, in referring to the Supreme Court:

A more complete denial of popular control of this Government could not have been conceived than the placing of such unreviewable power in the hands of men not elected by the people and holding office for life.

The Hon. William J. Bryan, in commenting on the Standard Oil case and the judicial legislation of the court, says:

If the Supreme Court is to become a legislative body, what reason can be given for not making it elective also? The people would submit much more willingly to judicial legislation if they had a chance to elect the judges for fixed terms. Will they consent to legislation on important questions by a court whose members are not only appointed by the President but appointed for life?

Justice Harlan, in the Standard Oil and Tobacco Trust cases, said:

Nobody can tell what will happen. When the American people come to the conclusion that the judiciary of this land is usurping to itself the functions of the legislative department of the Government, and by judicial construction only is declaring what is the public policy of the United States, we will find trouble. Ninety millions of people—all sorts of people with all sorts of opinions—are not going to submit to the usurpation by the judiciary of the functions of other departments of the Government and the power on its part to declare what is the public policy of the United States.

Mr. President, the Hon. Peter S. Grosscup, judge of the United States circuit court of appeals since 1899, says (North American Review, July, p. 9), in speaking of the Supreme Court in the Standard Oil and Tobacco Trust cases and of the Sherman Act:

As a weapon it will look dismantled. As a mere weapon it is dismantled. * * * But it was a gun that, whatever the terror of the explosion, never fired anything other than blank cartridges. And in the development of ways to secure to the ordinary man his rights in the world in which he lives, this formidable looking weapon, dismantled and abandoned, is of infinitely greater service than when in fruitless action, for though it accomplished for the ordinary man nothing that really counted, it kept him and those who have his interest in mind from looking elsewhere for immediate needs against existing wrongs.

This is magnificent. It is exceeding judicial frankness. I agree with the Hon. Peter S. Grosscup "that this decision is an event—a turning event in the life of the Nation."

Mr. President, in considering the life tenure and freedom from control of the Supreme Court I remind the Senate of the language of the Republican national platform when it criticized the Supreme Court of the United States on the Dred Scott decision, as follows:

The new dogma, that the Constitution, of its own force, carries slavery into all of the Territories of the United States, is a dangerous political heresy, at variance with the explicit provisions of that instrument itself, with contemporaneous exposition, and with legislative and judicial precedent; is revolutionary in its tendency and subvertive of the peace and harmony of the country. (National Conventions, McKee, 114.)

The great Lincoln, who ran on this platform, in his famous speech in Chicago July 10, 1858, severely criticized this decision, this fatal decision, which brought on the great war.

The sacredness that Judge Douglas throws around this decision is a degree of sacredness that has never been before thrown around any other decision. I have never heard of such a thing. Why, decisions apparently contrary to that decision, or that good lawyers thought were contrary to that decision, have been made by the very court before. It is the first of its kind; it is an astonisher in legal history. It is a new wonder of the world. It is based upon falsehood, in the main, as to the facts—allegations of facts upon which it stands are not facts at all in many instances—and no decision made on any question—the first instance of a decision made under so many unfavorable circumstances—thus placed, has ever been held by the profession as law, and it has always needed confirmation before the lawyers regarded it as settled law. But Judge Douglas will have it that all hands must take this extraordinary decision, made under these extraordinary circumstances, and give their vote in Congress in accordance with it, yield to it and obey it in every possible sense. Circumstances alter cases. Do not gentlemen here remember the case of that same Supreme Court, some 25 or 30 years ago, deciding that a national bank was constitutional. I ask if somebody does not remember that a national bank was declared to be constitutional? Such is the truth, whether it be remembered or not. The bank charter ran out and a recharter was granted by Congress. That recharter was laid before Gen. Jackson. It was urged upon him, when he denied the constitutionality of the bank, that the Supreme Court had decided that it was constitutional; and Gen. Jackson then said the Supreme Court had no right to lay down a rule to govern a coordinate branch of the Government, the members of which had sworn to support the Constitution; that each member had sworn to support that Constitution as he understood it. I will venture here to say that I have heard Judge Douglas say that he approved of Gen. Jackson for that act. What has now become of all his tirade against resistance to the Supreme Court?

And this opinion of Lincoln was prophesy. The decision did not stand. The decision could not stand, although made by judges holding for life and who were never held responsible to the people or by the people for the fatal issues of their conduct. No; the judges dropped out of sight. People forgot them in the dust and blood and excitement of the battle field. But they were the honorable and irresponsible gentlemen who conscientiously threw the switch and ditched the national express train. All hail to the irresponsible power that can wreck the Nation without personal responsibility! The question is: Shall this irresponsible power continue?

Hon. Peter S. Grosscup, United States circuit judge, of Chicago, referring to the late Standard Oil decision, says of the antitrust act of 1890: "As a mere weapon it is dismantled; but it was a gun that "never fired anything other than blank cartridges"; and Judge Grosscup knows, for he was one of the gunners. Why was the grand jury not instructed by the Federal judges to indict the trust criminals, among others the beef packers of Chicago, who, in conspiracy, for 21 years during the life of this statute, have been stealing millions from the farmers and cattle producers. The trusts have not been afraid of the gun, because they knew the gunners "never fired anything other than blank cartridges." Such gunners ought to be subject to election and recall.

THERE MUST BE A FINAL TRIBUNAL TO SETTLE DISPUTED QUESTIONS; AND WHY NOT THE SUPREME COURT?

This is the narrow argument which persuades many thoughtful, good citizens that the Supreme Court ought to have the right of finally determining all disputed questions.

The answer to this is that so long as the Supreme Court is merely passing upon titles to property or the meaning of the law affecting common rights, but not determining national policies, the Supreme Court is a convenient tribunal for final determination of such disputes; but when it is necessary to determine a national policy such as an income tax or whether monopoly shall control the people of the United States or be controlled by the people of the United States, the final power in that case is vested in the people of the United States, who are sovereign and who declare the national policies through their lawmaking Representatives elected by them and sent to Congress for that purpose.

The people of the United States have never delegated to the Supreme Court of the United States the determination of national policies, and when that court, by the Dred Scott decision, nationalized slavery, under a Constitution not amendable, the question of policy was settled by the people of the United States on the battle field in the blood and tears and grief and disaster of the Nation.

I agree, Mr. President, that there must be some final power to determine disputed questions, but I assert without fear of successful contradiction that the final power on national policies is vested in the sovereign people and their elected representatives.

I assert that the final power is vested where the constitution of every State in the Union has placed it, as I have abundantly shown by the various bills of rights of the 46 States, which uniformly declare that the sovereign power is in the people.

It ought not to be left, as a matter of policy, in the hands of a few lawyers on the supreme bench, who are not elected by the people, who are not nominated by the people, but who are nominated at the instance, perhaps, of big business by an Executive officer—the President, who himself, by the Constitution of the United States and by the practice of political parties, is twice removed from the people in his election and four times removed from the people in his nomination.

All men who are informed with regard to the strenuous struggle, to the skillful lobbying, and ingenious pressure brought to bear in the scramble to nominate judges for the Supreme Bench will know that these nominations are brought about by great pressure and by the strenuous activity of persons interested. It is true that this lobbying and pressure is given little or no publicity, but secrecy is no virtue in a self-governing republic. If the final sovereign power of this Republic is to vest in a judicial oligarchy, then the science of Government is reduced to the skillful nomination and selection of these judges, who will be thus made the final ruling power.

When the people of the United States, who are the sovereign power, demanded an income tax, and the Congress of the United States, consisting of over 480 Senators and Members of the House, on their oaths of office declared the act was constitutional, and when the President of the United States declared the act was constitutional, the Supreme Court, consisting of a few lawyers nominated in this way, declared that it was unconstitutional, by a divided court. Three of the judges on that court at least declared in effect that the decision of their associates was a national disaster. The people of the United States, who were the SOVEREIGN POWER, had their will vetoed by this court, which, in my opinion, had no right to declare unconstitutional this act of Congress. Congress is responsible to the people of the United States if it violates or appears to violate the written Constitution, which it is solemnly sworn to observe.

I believe in the sovereignty of the people of the United States and not in the sovereignty of any judicial tribunal appointed for life. I therefore believe that they should be subject to recall, as the Constitution authorizes.

THE CASE OF WILLIAM MARBURY V. JAMES MADISON.

In this case the court held that an act of Congress repugnant to the Constitution can not become a law; yet John Marshall, in this case, although declaring that the mandamus was the proper remedy to compel the Secretary of State to deliver a commission to which the party was entitled, refused to issue the mandamus to the Secretary of State on the ground that the Supreme Court of the United States could not exercise an original jurisdiction not warranted by the Constitution. The court rests its decision in this case on the ground that the Constitution, being the paramount and supreme law, the court is bound by it; that the courts can not close their eyes to the Constitution; and that such a doctrine would subvert the foundation of all written constitutions.

In delivering the opinion, Marshall said:

Those, then, who controvert the principle that the Constitution is to be considered in court as the paramount law are reduced to the necessity of maintaining that courts must close their eyes on the Constitution and see only the law.

This doctrine would subvert the very foundation of all written constitutions. It would declare that an act which, according to the principles and theory of our Government, is entirely void is yet in practice completely obligatory. It would declare that if the legislature shall do what is expressly forbidden such act, notwithstanding the express prohibition, is in reality effectual. It would be giving to the legislature a practical and real omnipotence, with the same breath which professes to restrict their powers within narrow limits. It is prescribing limits and declaring that those limits may be passed at pleasure.

That it thus reduces to nothing what we have deemed the greatest improvement on political institutions, a written constitution would of itself be sufficient in America, where written constitutions have been viewed with so much reverence, for rejecting the construction. (1 Cranch., 178.)

The court obviously believes it would be dangerous and would give a practical and real omnipotence to the legislature to allow the legislature, consisting of the directly elected representatives of the people, directly responsible to the people on their oaths to obey the Constitution, to determine the constitutionality of their own act. Somebody must have what the court calls "the practical and real omnipotence" of determining the constitutionality of an act, and therefore the court took the "practical and real omnipotence" out of the hands of Congress and appropriated it as an attribute of itself.

That the court has arrogated this power to itself has been observed by many able men in recent years. Perhaps no one has more clearly expressed this than Prof. Smith in The Spirit of American Government:

Through the sole right to exercise this power (to interpret the Constitution) our Federal judiciary has become in reality the controlling branch of our Government. * * * Our Supreme Court thus has what virtually amounts to the power to enact as well as the power to annul. Congress can legislate only with the consent of the Federal judiciary; but the latter, through its control over the interpretation of the Constitution, may in effect legislate without the consent of the other branches of the Government, and even in opposition to them. Under the guise of an independent judiciary we have in reality an independent legislature, or rather an independent legislative and judicial body combined. This union of sovereign legislative authority and ordinary judicial functions in the same independent body is a significant and dangerous innovation in government.

President Hadley, of Yale, asks the startling question whether the work of the courts is to be undone by constitutional amendment, by the courts themselves overturning their own decisions, or by a revolution?

Mr. President, the remedy for this condition which the country faces—of a judicial oligarchy—is not revolution. The remedy may not be expected from the Federal judiciary itself, holding by life tenure and subject to no controlling power at the hands of the people. They will not under such circumstances reverse their own decisions. They will not cease to be nominated, and proposed, and urged, and appointed through the influence of special interests. Their decisions will continue to reflect their honest previous predilections and bias by virtue of which they were nominated.

Amending the Constitution would afford a remedy, and it is of the greatest importance that the Constitution of the United States should be amended, and should be made fundamentally and thoroughly democratic in the amendment.

And upon this remedy I hope at an early day to present to the Senate reasons justifying the constitutional amendment which I have already submitted for the consideration of the Senate.

But we have an immediate remedy against the aggression of the judicial oligarchy which has slowly grown up in this country, and that remedy I have proposed—the right of election and recall of the Federal judiciary. This reform will make the Federal system harmonious with the various States of the Union, all of whom, as I have abundantly shown, elect for short terms of office, subject to recall. The Federal Government, consisting as it does of the powers of the several States, may well follow the opinions of the people of the several States in the control of the judiciary by short tenure and by recall.

But, Mr. President, the great substantial remedy which this country needs to protect the people against the dangerous menace of accumulated wealth in a few hands, which in the history of the world has always been the precursor of revolution, is a prompt return to the fundamentals of democracy, to a government of the people, by the people, and for the people; to a government by majorities, and not a government of minorities, against which I have justly complained. To restore a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, the people themselves, outside of constitutional amendment, and outside of revolution, as suggested by President Hadley, have found a peaceful path through the initiative, referendum, and recall; through the direct primary; the direct election of Senators; through the corrupt-practices act; through the commission form of government for cities and the local initiative, referendum, and recall; and through the direct control and instruction of party delegates.

Political parties make declarations of principle in national conventions by party platforms which they are unable to carry out because of an iron-bound Federal Constitution which never permits of any one party having a majority to govern or make good its promises, any and all parties being always capable of being defeated under the minority rule provided by the Constitution itself.

It is the rule of the minority which we must put an end to, and the fraudulent methods by which the minority has always ruled must be terminated, as they soon will be by the gigantic, progressive movement that is sweeping the country; that has inspired the Democracy; and which is penetrating the inner councils of the Republican Party itself.

The remedy which is acknowledged by all of enlarging the Supreme Court to any number and putting judges on that bench who are harmonious with the latest expression of the will of the people of the United States is confessedly available under the Constitution, but such a remedy by a self-governing nation I should regard as undignified and not to be adopted until all other remedies were exhausted.

It is not necessary to wait for constitutional amendment to obtain relief against the aggression of the Federal bench. That can be accomplished, as I have shown, under the authority of the Constitution and in accordance with the principles of government laid down by all of the States of the Union, which obviously would approve a system applied to the Federal bench which they have enacted for the control of the State bench within their own borders. The people of the United States, in 43 States, have shown their views by actually providing in their constitutions for the election of the State judges for fixed terms of office, usually short terms, from two to six years.

In addition to the automatic recall by short tenure of 43 States, 32 States provide for the recall of judges by the legislatures, as Alabama, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Mississippi, Missouri, Nevada, New Hampshire, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, and Wisconsin; and Oregon recalls by the vote of the people, which is also proposed by California and Arizona.

In the States where the judges are appointed by the governor—Delaware, Maine, Massachusetts, Mississippi, New Hampshire, and New Jersey—all provide for the recall by the legislature except New Jersey, and New Jersey has a short tenure. In Connecticut, Georgia, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Virginia, and Vermont, where they are elected by the legislatures, they are subject to recall by the legislature, except in Vermont, where their tenure of office is only two years.

Is it possible that all of the States of the Union are wrong in their view of the necessity of controlling the judiciary by the popular vote? And if they be right, Mr. President, by what reasoning do the Senators on this floor representing those States disregard or lightly set aside the ascertained views of policy of the people of their own States?

The Supreme Court held that party rates were not unlawful. The court said that while section 22 provided that discrimination in favor of certain persons named should not be deemed unjust, it did not forbid discriminations in favor of others under circumstances so substantially alike as to justify the same treatment.

The Supreme Court held that the commission was not empowered to fix rates in advance.

T. & P. Ry. Co. v. I. C. C., 162 U. S., 197 (March, 1896).

(In New York Board of Trade v. P. R. R. Co., 4 I. C. C., 447, the commission held that it was unjust discrimination not to accord equal rates and equal facilities to domestic traffic as accorded to foreign traffic between ports of entry and place of destination in the United States.)

The Supreme Court held that there was no undue discrimination.

I. C. C. v. C., N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co., 167 U. S., 479 (May, 1897).

The Supreme Court held that the commission had no power to prescribe rates, either maximum, minimum, or absolute.

I. C. C. v. D., G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 167 U. S., 633 (May, 1897).

(In Stone & Carten v. D., G. H. & M. Ry. Co., 3 I. C. C., 613, the commission held it unlawful, as in the nature of a rebate, to grant free cartage without tariff authority; it was also held a violation of section 4 to grant free cartage at the farther-distance point where the rate to the shorter-distance point, together with the cartage charge, amounted to more than the rate to the farther-distance point where free cartage was granted.)

The Supreme Court held that the failure to publish the free-cartage privilege was not a violation of the act, and that there was no violation of section 4.

I. C. C. v. Ala. Mid. Ry. Co., 168 U. S., 144 (November, 1897).

(In Board of Trade of Troy v. Ala. Mid. Ry. Co., 6 I. C. C., 1, the commission held that the greater charge to the shorter distance point was discriminatory and in violation of sec. 4.)

The Supreme Court held that there was no violation of the act because of competition of rival carriers. It was also held that the commission had no power to prescribe rates, either maximum, minimum, or absolute.

L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Behlmer, 175 U. S., 648 (January, 1900).

(In Behlmer v. M. & C. R. R. Co., 6 I. C. C., 257, the commission held that competition of carriers and of markets did not justify greater charge to shorter distance point. The rate adjustment was held to be in violation of sec. 4.)

The Supreme Court held that material competition arising from carriers subject to the act can be taken into consideration for the purpose of determining the dissimilarity of circumstances and conditions.

E. T., V. & G. Ry. Co. v. I. C. C., 181 U. S., 1 (April, 1901).

(In Chattanooga Board of Trade v. E. T. V. & G. Ry. Co., 5 I. C. C., 546, the commission held that there was no such competition as to justify greater charge to shorter distance point. The rate adjustment was held to be in violation of sec. 4.)

The Supreme Court held that competition between rival carriers justified greater charge to shorter distance point.

I. C. C. v. C., B. & Q. R. R. Co., 186 U. S., 320 (June, 1902).

(In Cattle Raisers' Associatioin of Texas v. Ft. W. & D. C. Ry. Co., 7 I. C. C., 513, a terminal switching charge of $2 per car on live stock at Chicago was held by the commission to be unreasonable to the extent that it exceeded $1.)

The Supreme Court held that the terminal switching charge was not unlawful.

I. C. C. v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 190 U. S., 273 (May, 1903).

(In Calloway v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 7 I. C. C., 431, the commission held the rate adjustment unreasonably high and in violation of sec. 4.)

The Supreme Court held that competition justified the greater charge to the shorter distance point.

S. P. Co. v. I. C. C., 200 U. S., 536 (February, 1906).

(In Consolidated Forwarding Co. v. S. P. Co., 9 I. C. C., 182, the commission held that the reservation by initial lines of the right to dictate the routing beyond their lines was unlawful.)

The Supreme Court held that such reservation did not amount to a pooling of freight in violation of section 5. It was further held that there was no unjust discrimination.

Penn Refining Co. v. W. N. Y. & P. R. R. Co., 208 U. S., 208 (January, 1908).

(In Independent Refiners' Asso. v. W. N. Y. & P. R. R. Co., 4 I. C. C., 415; 6 I. C. C., 52; and 6 I. C. C., 378, the commission held that unjust discrimination resulted from the imposition of higher charges on shipments of oil in barrels, where the use of tank cars was practically limited to one class of shippers. Reparation was awarded.)

The Supreme Court held that there was no unjust discrimination.

I. C. C. v. C. G. W. Ry. Co., 209 U. S., 108 (March, 1908).

(In Chicago Live Stock Exchange v. C. G. W. Ry Co., 10 I. C. C., 428, the commission held that it was unduly discriminatory to charge higher rates for the transportation of cattle and hogs than for the transportation of live-stock products.)

The Supreme Court held that there was no unjust discrimination.

Harriman v. I. C. C., 211 U. S., 407 (December, 1908).

The Supreme Court held that the power to require testimony was limited to investigations concerning a specific breach of existing law; and that this power did not extend to mere investigations by provisions in any of the amendatory acts in regard to annual reports of interstate carriers, or of the commission, or for the purpose of recommending legislation.

U. S. v. D. & H. Co., 213 U. S., 366 (May, 1909).

The Supreme Court held that the commodities clause did not prohibit a railway company from moving commodities in interstate commerce because the company had manufactured, mined, or produced them, or owned them in whole or in part, or had an interest, direct or indirect, in them, wholly irrespective of the relation or connection of the carrier with the commodities at the time of transportation.

S. Ry. Co. v. St. Louis Hay & Grain Co., 214 U. S., 297 (June, 1909).

(In St. Louis Hay & Grain Co. v. M. & O. R. R. Co., 11 I. C. C., 90, a reconsignment charge on hay was held by the commission to be unreasonable to the extent that it exceeded the cost of service.)

The Supreme Court held that the carriers were entitled to a profit over and above the cost of service.

I. C. C. v. Stickney, 215 U. S., 98 (November, 1909).

(In Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas v. C., B. & Q. R. R. Co., 12 I. C. C., 507, a $2 switching charge at Chicago was held by the commission to be unreasonable to the extent that it exceeded $1.)

The Supreme Court held that such switching charge was not unlawful.

I. C. C. v. D., L. & W. R. R. Co., 216 U. S., 531 (March, 1910).

The Supreme Court held that the commission had no power to compel switch connections with lateral branch lines upon the application of a branch road, but only upon the application of a shipper.

I. C. C. v. N. P. Ry. Co., 216 U. S., 538 (March, 1910).

The Supreme Court held that the existence of one reasonable and satisfactory through route precluded the commission from establishing another through route. It was also held that the existence of such route may be inquired into by the courts, notwithstanding a finding by the commission.

Penn Refining Co. v. W. N. Y. & P. R. R. Co., 208 U. S., 208 (January, 1908).

(In Western Oregon Lumber Mfrs.' Asso. v. S. P. Co., 14 I. C. C., 61, the commission held that a sudden high advance in rates was unreasonable to the extent named, where the lower rate had been maintained for a long period and upon the strength of which the lumber industry had been built up.)

The Supreme Court reversed the commission, holding that an order of the commission made in consequence of an assumption of powers not granted is void.

EXHIBIT B.

SOME DEFECTS IN THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES—AN ADDRESS TO THE LAW DEPARTMENT OF THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA, APRIL 27, 1906.

[By Walter Clark, chief justice of North Carolina.]

Philadelphia is one of the great cities of the world. To the student of history who remembers that Nineveh and Palmyra, Carthage and Thebes, and many another, have been great, populous, and wealthy, and then have passed entirely away from the thoughts and lips of men, Philadelphia has yet a glory that shall live always. Mohammedanism has its Mecca, the cradle and the acme of its hopes. Jew and Christian alike turn to Jerusalem. But to the utmost verge of earth, and to the last syllable of recorded time, in whatever language liberty and freedom shall be honored among men, in whatever accents government "of the people, by the people, and for the people" shall be asserted, there Philadelphia shall be remembered as the cradle of its birth. Her streets at some far distant day may be overgrown with grass and her ruined and tottering buildings may become the home of bats and birds of night; but around her name will linger a luster that shall never depart.

Here, on July 4, 1776, was proclaimed "Liberty throughout all the land and to all the inhabitants thereof." And here, too, 11 years later, was another notable event, when on September 17, 1787, was issued to the world the Constitution of these United States. It is of the latter—"its defects and the necessity for its revision"—that I shall speak to you to-night.

Just here it is well to call to mind the radical difference between these two conventions. That which met in 1776 was frankly democratic. Success in its great and perilous undertaking was only possible with the support of the people. The great Declaration was an appeal to the masses. It declared that all men were created equal and endowed with certain inalienable rights—among them life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness—to secure which rights governments are instituted, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; and that when government becomes destructive of these ends it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it and institute a new government in such form as shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness. Never was the right of revolution more clearly asserted or that government existed for the sole benefit of the people, who were declared to be equal and endowed with the right to change their government at will when it did not subserve their welfare or obey their wishes. Not a word about property. Everything was about the people. The man was more than the dollar then. And the convention was in earnest. Every member signed the Declaration, which was unanimously voted. As Dr. Franklin pertinently observed, it behooved them "to hang together, or they would hang separately."

The convention which met in 1787 was as reactionary as the other had been revolutionary and democratic. It had its beginning in commercial negotiations between the States. Wearied with a long war, enthusiasm for liberty somewhat relaxed by the pressing need to earn the comforts and necessities of life whose stores had been diminished and oppressed by the ban upon prosperity caused by the uncertainties and impotence of the existing government of the Confederacy, the convention of 1787 came together. Ignoring the maxim that government should exist only by the consent of the governed, it sat with closed doors, that no breath of the popular will should affect their decisions. To free the members from all responsibility, members were prohibited to make copies of any resolution or to correspond with constituents or others about matters pending before the convention. Any record of yeas and nays was forbidden, but one was kept without the knowledge of the convention. The journal was kept secret, a vote to destroy it fortunately failed, and Mr. Madison's copy was published only after the lapse of 49 years, when every member had passed beyond human accountability. Only 12 States were ever represented, and one of these withdrew before the final result was reached. Of its 65 members, only 55 ever attended, and so far from being unanimous, only 39 signed the Constitution, and some actively opposed its ratification by their own States.

That the Constitution thus framed was reactionary was a matter of course. There was, as we know, some talk of a royal government, with Frederick, Duke of York, second son of George the Third, as King. Hamilton, whose subsequent great services as Secretary of the Treasury have crowned him with a halo, and whose tragic death has obliterated the memory of his faults, declared himself in favor of the English form of government, with its hereditary Executive and its House of Lords, which he denominated "a most noble institution." Failing in that, he advocated an Executive elected by Congress for life, Senators and judges for life, and governors of States to be appointed by the President. Of these he secured, as it has proved, the most important from his standpoint, the creation of judges for life. The convention was aware that a Constitution on Hamilton's lines could not secure ratification by the several States. But the Constitution adopted was made as undemocratic as possible, and was very far from responding to the condition, laid down in the Declaration of 1776, that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. Hamilton, in a speech to the convention, stated that the members were agreed that "we need to be rescued from the democracy." They were rescued. Thomas Jefferson unfortunately was absent as our minister to France and took no part in the convention, though we owe largely to him the compromise by which the first 10 amendments were agreed to be adopted in exchange for ratification by several States which otherwise would have been withheld.

In truth, the consent of the governed was not to be asked. In the new government the will of the people was not to control and was little to be consulted. Of the three great departments of the Government—legislative, executive, and judiciary—the people were intrusted with the election only of the House of Representatives, to wit, only one-sixth of the Government, even if that House had been made equal in authority and power with the Senate, which was very far from being the case. The Declaration of 1776 was concerned with the rights of man. The Convention of 1787 entirely ignored them. There was no Bill of Rights and the guaranties of the great rights of freedom of speech and of the press, freedom of religion, liberty of the people to assemble, and right of petition, the right to bear arms, exemption from soldiers being quartered upon the people, exemption from general warrants, the right of trial by jury and a grand jury, protection of the law of the land, and protection from seizure of private property for other than public use, and then only upon just compensation; the prohibition of excessive bail or cruel and unusual punishment, and the reservation to the people and the States of all rights not granted by the Constitution—all these matters of the utmost importance to the rights of the people were omitted, and were inserted by the first 10 amendments only because it became imperatively necessary to give assurances that such amendments would be adopted in order to secure the ratification of the Constitution by the several States.

The Constitution was so far from being deemed satisfactory, even to the people and in the circumstances of the time for which it was framed, that, as already stated, only 11 States voted for its adoption by the convention, and only 39 members out of 55 attending signed it, some members subsequently opposing its ratification. Its ratification by the conventions in the several States was carried with the greatest difficulty, and in no State was it submitted to a vote of the people themselves. Massachusetts ratified only after a close vote and with a demand for amendments; South Carolina and New Hampshire also demanded amendments, as also did Virginia and New York, both of which voted ratification by the narrowest majorities and reserving to themselves the right to withdraw; and two States (North Carolina and Rhode Island) rejected the Constitution, and subsequently ratified only after Washington had been elected and inaugurated—matters in which they had thus no share.

George Washington was president of the convention, it is true, but as such was debarred from sharing in the debates. His services, great as they were, had been military, not civil, and he left no impress upon the instrument of union, so far as known. Yet it was admitted that but for his popularity and influence the Constitution would have failed of ratication by the several States, especially in Virginia. Indeed, but for his great influence the convention would have adjourned without putting its final hand to the Constitution, as it came very near doing. Even his great influence would not have availed but for the overwhelming necessity for some form of government as a substitute for the rickety Articles of Confederation, which were utterly inefficient and whose longer retention threatened civil war.

An instrument so framed, adopted with such difficulty and ratified after such efforts and by such narrow margins, could not have been a fair and full expression of the consent of the governed. The men that made it did not deem it perfect. Its friends agreed to sundry amendments, 10 in number, which were adopted by the first Congress that met. The assumption by the new Supreme Court of a power not contemplated, even by the framers of the Constitution, to drag a State before it as defendant in an action by a citizen of another State, caused the enactment of the eleventh amendment. The unfortunate method prescribed for the election of President nearly caused a civil war in 1801 and forced the adoption of the twelfth amendment, and three others were brought about as the result of the great Civil War. The Convention of 1787 recognized itself that the defects innate in the Constitution, and which would be developed by experience and the lapse of time, would require amendments, and that instrument prescribed two different methods by which amendments could be made.

Our Federal Constitution was adopted nearly a century and a quarter ago. In that time every State has radically revised its constitution and most of them several times. Indeed, the constitution of New York requires that the question of a constitutional convention shall be submitted to its people at least once every 20 years. The object is that the organic law shall keep abreast of the needs and wants of the people and shall represent the will and progress of to-day and shall not, as is the case with the Federal Constitution, be hampered by provisions deemed best by the divided counsels of a small handful of men in providing for the wants of the Government considerably more than 100 years ago. Had those men been gifted with divine foresight and created a Constitution fit for this day and its development, it would have been unsuited for the needs of the times in which it was fashioned.

When the Constitution was adopted, in 1787, it was intended for 3,000,000 of people, scattered along the Atlantic slope from Massachusetts to the southern boundary of Georgia. We are now trying to make it do duty for very nearly 100,000,000, from Maine to Manila, from Panama and Porto Rico to the Pole. Then our population was mostly rural, for three years later, at the First Census, in 1790, we had but five towns in the whole Union which had as many as 6,500 inhabitants each, and only two others had over 4,000. Now we have the second largest city on the globe, with over 4,000,000 of inhabitants, and many that have passed the half-million mark, some of them of over a million population. Three years later, in 1790, we had 75 post offices, with $37,000 annual post-office expenditures. Now we have 75,000 post offices, 35,000 rural-delivery routes, and a post-office appropriation of nearly $200,000,000.

During the first 10 years the total expenditures of the Federal Government, including payments on the Revolutionary debts, and including even the pensions, averaged $10,000,000 annually. Now the expenditures are 75 times as much. When the Constitution was adopted Virginia was easily the first State in influence, population, and wealth, having one-fourth the population of the entire Union. North Carolina was third, and New York, which then stood fifth, now has double the population of the whole country at that date, and several other States have now a population greater than the original Union, whose very names were then unheard and over whose soil the savage and the buffalo roamed unmolested. Steamboats, railroads, gas, electricity (except as a toy in Franklin's hands), coal mines, petroleum, and a thousand other things which are a part of our lives to-day were undiscovered.

Corporations, which now control the country and its Government, were then so few that not till four years later, in 1791, was the first bank incorporated (in New York), and the charter for the second bank was only obtained by the subtlety of Aaron Burr, who concealed the banking privileges in an act incorporating a water company—and corporations have had an affinity for water ever since.

Had the Constitution been perfectly adapted to the needs and wishes of the people of that day, we would still have outgrown it. Time has revealed flaws in the original instrument, and it was, as might be expected, wholly without safeguards against that enormous growth of corporations, and even of individuals, in wealth and power, which has subverted the control of the Government.

The glaring defect in the Constitution was that it was not democratic. It gave, as already pointed out, to the people—to the governed—the selection of only one-sixth of the government, to wit, one half—by far the weaker half—of the legislative department. The other half, the Senate, was made elective at second hand by the State legislatures, and the Senators were given not only longer terms, but greater power, for all presidential appointments and treaties were subjected to confirmation by the Senate.

The President was intended to be elected at a still further remove from the people, by being chosen by electors, who, it was expected, would be selected by the State legislatures. The President thus was to be selected at third hand, as it were. In fact, down till after the memorable contest between Adams, Clay, Crawford, and Jackson, in 1824, in the majority of the States the presidential electors were chosen by the State legislatures, and they were so chosen by South Carolina till after the Civil War, and, in fact, by Colorado in 1876. The intention was that the electors should make independent choice, but public opinion forced the transfer of the choice of electors from the legislatures to the ballot box, and then made of them mere figureheads, with no power but to voice the will of the people, who thus captured the executive department. That department, with the House of Representatives, marks to-day the extent of the share of the people in this Government.

The judiciary were placed a step still further removed from the popular choice. The judges were to be selected at fourth hand by a President (intended to be selected at third hand) and subject to confirmation by a Senate chosen at second hand. And to make the judiciary absolutely impervious to any consideration of the "consent of the governed," they are appointed for life.

It will be seen at a glance that a constitution so devised was intended not to express, but to suppress, or at least disregard, the wishes and the consent of the governed. It was admirably adapted for what has come to pass—the absolute domination of the Government by the "business interests," which, controlling vast amounts of capital and intent on more, can secure the election of Senators by the small constituencies, the legislatures which elect them, and can dictate the appointment of the judges, and if they fail in that, the Senate, chosen under their auspices, can defeat the nomination. Should the President favor legislation and the House of Representatives pass the bill, the Senate, with its majority chosen by corporation influences, can defeat it; and if, by any chance, it shall yield to the popular will and pass the bill, as was the case with the income tax, there remains the judiciary, who have assumed, without any warrant, express or implied, in the Constitution, the power to declare any act unconstitutional at their own will and without responsibility to anyone.

The people's part in the Government in the choice of the House of Representatives, even when reenforced by the Executive, whose election they have captured, is an absolute nullity in the face of the Senate and the judiciary, in whose selection the people have no voice. This, therefore, is the Government of the United States—a government by Senate and judges—that is to say, frankly, by whatever power can control the selection of Senators and judges. What is that power? We know that it is not the American people.

Let us not be deceived by forms, but look at the substance. Government rests not upon forms, but upon a true reply to the question, "Where does the governing power reside?" The Roman legions bore to the last day of the Empire upon their standards the words, "The Senate and the Roman people," long centuries after the real power had passed from the curia and the comitia to the barracks of the Pretorian Guards, and when there was no will in Rome save that of their master. There were still tribunes of the people, and consuls, and a senate, and the title of a republic, but the real share of the people in the Roman Government was the donation to them of "bread and circuses" by their tyrants.

Years after the victor of Marengo had been crowned Emperor and the sword of Austerlitz had become the one power in France, the French coins and official documents still bore the inscription of "French Republic"—"République Francaise."

In England to-day there is a monarchy in form, but we know that in truth the real government of England is vested in a single House of Parliament, elected by the people, under a restricted suffrage; that the real executive is not the King, but the prime minister and his cabinet, practically elected by the House of Commons and holding office at the will of the majority in that House; that the King has not even the veto power, except nominally, since it has not been exercised in a single instance for more than 200 years, and that the sole function of the House of Lords—a club of rich men representing great vested interests—is in the exercise of a suspensive veto (of which the King has been deprived), which is exercised only till the Commons make up their mind the bill shall pass—when the House of Lords always gives way, as the condition upon which their continued existence rests. So in this country we retain the forms of a Republic. We still choose our President and the House of Representatives by the people; but the real power does not reside in them or in the people. It rests with those great "interests" which select the majority of the Senate and the judges.

This being the situation, the sole remedy possible is by amendment of the Constitution to make it democratic and place the selection of these preponderating bodies in the hands of the people.

First, the election of Senators should be given to the people. Even then consolidated wealth will secure some of the Senators; but it would not be able, as now, at all times to count with absolute certainty upon a majority of the Senate as its creatures. Five times has a bill proposing such amendment to the Constitution passed the House of Representatives by a practically unanimous vote, and each time it has been lost in the Senate; but never by a direct vote. It has always been disposed of by the chloroform process of referring the bill to a committee, which never reports it back, and never will. It is too much to expect that the great corporations which control a majority of the Senate will ever voluntarily transfer to the people their profitable and secure hold upon supreme power by permitting the passage of an amendment to elect Senators by the people. The only hope is in the alternative plan of amendment, authorized by the Constitution, to wit, the call of a constitutional convention upon the application of two-thirds of the States, to wit, 30 States. More than that number have already instructed in favor of an amendment to elect Senators by the people.

It may be recalled here that in the Convention of 1787 Pennsylvania did vote for the election of Senators by the people. A strong argument used against this was that the farming interests, being the largest, would control the House and that the Senate could only be given to the commercial interests by making its members elective by the legislatures—which was prophetic—though the deciding influence was the fear of the small States that if the Senate was elected by the people its membership would be based on population.

It is high time that we had a constitutional convention, after the lapse of near a century and a score of years. The same reasons which have time and again caused the individual States to amend their constitutions imperatively require a convention to adjust the Constitution of the Union to the changed conditions of the times and to transfer to the people themselves that control of the Government which is now exercised for the profit and benefit of the "interests." Those interests, with all the power of their money and the large part of the press which they own or control, will resist the call of such a convention. They will be aided, doubtless, by some of the smaller States who may fear a loss of their equal representation in the Senate. But in truth and justice it may be that there might be some modification now in that respect without injury to the smaller States. There is no longer any reason why Delaware or Nevada or Rhode Island should have as many Senators as New York or Pennsylvania or Illinois. It would be enough to grant to every State having 1,000,000 inhabitants or less one Senator, and to allot to each State having over 1,000,000 inhabitants an additional Senator for every million above 1,000,000 and for a fractional part if over three-quarters of a million. This, while not putting the Senate frankly on the basis of population, would remove the dissatisfaction with the present unjust ratio and would quiet the opposition to the admission of the new States whose area and development entitle them to self-government, but whose population does not entitle them to two Senators.

The election of President is now made by the people, who have captured it, though the Constitution did not intend the people should have any choice in naming the Executive. The dangerous and unsafe plan adopted in 1787 was changed in consequence of the narrowly averted disaster in 1801. But the method in force still leaves much to be desired. It readily lends itself to the choice of a minority candidate. It is an anomaly that 1,100 votes in New York (as in 1884) should swing 70 electoral votes (35 from one candidate to the other) and thus decide the result. The consequence is that while, nominally, any citizen of the Republic is eligible to the Presidency, only citizens of two or three of the larger States, with doubtful electoral votes, are in fact eligible. All others are barred. For proof of this look at the history of our presidential elections. For the first 40 years of the Union the Presidents came from two States—Virginia and Massachusetts. Then there followed a period when, the growing West requiring recognition, Tennessee, Ohio, and New York commanded the situation for the next 16 years. The Mexican War gave us a soldier who practically represented no State, and was succeeded by a New Yorker. Then for the only time in our history "off States" had a showing, and Pennsylvania and New Hampshire had their innings. Since then the successful candidates have been again strictly limited to "pivotal States"—New York in the East and Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio in the West.

This condition is unsatisfactory. The magnetic Blaine, from Maine, was defeated, as was Bryan, from Nebraska. Had the former hailed from New York and the latter from Illinois, the electoral votes and influence of those States might have secured their election.

It would be dangerous, and almost a certain provocation of civil war, to change the election of President to a per capita vote by the whole of the Union. Then a charge of a fraudulent vote at any precinct or voting place, however remote, might affect the result; and as frauds would most likely occur in those States where the majorities are largest—as in Pennsylvania or Texas, Ohio or Georgia—a contest would always be certain. Whereas now frauds in States giving large majorities, unless of great enough magnitude to change the electoral vote of the whole State, can have no effect. The remedy is, preserving the electoral-vote system as now, and giving the smaller States, as now, the advantage of electoral votes to represent their Senators, to divide the electoral vote of each State according to the popular vote for each candidate, giving each his pro rata of the electoral vote on that basis, the odd elector being apportioned to the candidate having the largest fraction. Thus, in New York, Mr. Blaine would have gotten 17 electoral votes and Mr. Cleveland 18. Other States would have also divided, more or less evenly; but the result would be that the choice of President would no longer be restricted to two or three States, as in our past history, and is likely to be always the case as long as the whole electoral vote of two or three large pivotal States must swing to one side or other and determine the result. This change would avoid the present evil of large sums being spent to carry the solid electoral vote of "pivotal" States, for there would cease to be "pivotal" States. At the same time this would avoid the open gulf into which a per capita ballot by the whole Union would lead us. While the electoral vote of a State should be divided pro rata, according to the popular vote for each candidate, it is essential that each State should vote as one district, since its boundaries are unchangeable. To permit the legislature of each State to divide it into electoral districts would simply open up competition in the art of gerrymandering.

By the Convention of 1787 the term of the President was originally fixed at seven years and he was made ineligible for reelection. This was reduced to four years by a compromise that he could be relected without limitation. This was done in the interest of those who favored a strong Government and a long tenure. Washington imposed a limitation by his example which will not always be binding. An amendment making the term six years and the President ineligible to reelection has long been desired by a large portion of the public. Indeed, when the Constitutional Convention of the Union shall assemble, as it must do some day, to remodel our Constitution to fit it to face the dangers and conform to the views of the people of this age, with the aid of our experience, in the past, it is more than probable that the powers of the Executive will be more restricted. His powers are now greater than those of any sovereign in Europe. The real restrictions upon executive power at present are not in constitutional provisions, but in the Senate and judiciary, which often negative the popular will, which he represents more accurately than they.

And now we come to the most important of the changes necessary to place the Government of the Union in the hands of the people. By far the most serious defect and danger in the Constitution is the appointment of judges for life, subject to confirmation by the Senate. It is a far more serious matter than it was when the Convention of 1787 framed the Constitution. A proposition was made in the convention—as we now know from Mr. Madison's Journal—that the judges should pass upon the constitutionality of acts of Congress. This was defeated June 5, receiving the vote of only two States. It was renewed no less than three times, i. e., on June 6, July 21, and finally again for the fourth time on August 15; and though it had the powerful support of Mr. Madison and Mr. James Wilson, at no time did it receive the votes of more than three States. On this last occasion (August 15 Mr. Mercer thus summed up the thought of the convention: He disapproved of the doctrine that the judges, as expositors of the Constitution, should have authority to declare a law void. He thought laws ought to be well and cautiously made, and then to be incontrovertible.

Prior to the convention, the courts of four States—New Jersey, Rhode Island, Virginia, and North Carolina—had expressed an opinion that they could hold acts of the legislature unconstitutional. This was a new doctrine never held before (nor in any other country since) and met with strong disapproval. In Rhode Island the movement to remove the offending judges was stopped only on a suggestion that they could be "dropped" by the legislature at the annual election, which was done. The decisions of these four State courts were recent and well known to the convention. Mr. Madison and Mr. Wilson favored the new doctrine of the paramount judiciary, doubtless deeming it a safe check upon legislation, since it was to be operated only by lawyers. They attempted to get it into the Federal Constitution in its least objectionable shape—the judicial veto before final passage of an act, which would thus save time and besides would enable the legislature to avoid the objections raised. But even in this diluted form, and though four times presented by these two very able and influential members, this suggestion of a judicial veto at no time received the votes of more than one-fourth of the States.

The subsequent action of the Supreme Court in assuming the power to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional was without a line in the Constitution to authorize it, either expressly or by implication. The Constitution recited carefully and fully the matters over which the courts should have jurisdiction, and there is nothing, and after the above vote four times refusing jurisdiction there could be nothing, indicating any power to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional and void.

Had the convention given such power to the courts, it certainly would not have left its exercise final and unreviewable. It gave the Congress power to override the veto of the President, though that veto was expressly given, thus showing that in the last analysis the will of the people, speaking through the legislative power, should govern. Had the convention supposed the courts would assume such power, it would certainly have given Congress some review over judicial action and certainly would not have placed the judges irretrievably beyond "the consent of the governed" and regardless of the popular will by making them appointive, and further clothing them with the undemocratic prerogative of tenure for life.

Such power does not exist in any other country, and never has. It is therefore not essential to our security. It is not conferred by the Constitution; but, on the contrary, the convention, as we have seen, after the fullest debate, four times, on four several days, refused by a decisive vote to confer such power. The judges not only have never exercised such power in England, where there is no written constitution, but they do not exercise it in France, Germany, Austria, Denmark, or in any other country which, like them, has a written constitution.

A more complete denial of popular control of this Government could not have been conceived than the placing of such unreviewable power in the hands of men not elected by the people and holding office for life. The legal-tender act, the financial policy of the Government, was invalidated by one court and then validated by another, after a change in its personnel. Then the income tax, which had been held constitutional by the court for a hundred years, was again so held, and then by a sudden change of vote by one judge it was held unconstitutional, nullified, and set at naught, though it had passed by a nearly unanimous vote both Houses of Congress, containing many lawyers who were the equals, if not the superiors, of the vacillating judge, and had been approved by the President and voiced the will of the people. This was all negatived (without any warrant in the Constitution for the court to set aside an act of Congress) by the vote of one judge; and thus $100,000,000 and more of annual taxation was transferred from those most able to bear it and placed upon the backs of those who already carried more than their fair share of the burdens of government. Under an untrue assumption of authority given by 39 dead men one man nullified the action of Congress and the President and the will of 75,000,000 of living people, and in the 13 years since has taxed the property and labor of the country, by his sole vote, $1,300,000,000, which Congress, in compliance with the public will and relying on previous decisions of the court, had decreed should be paid out of the excessive incomes of the rich.

In England one-third of the revenue is derived from the superfluities of the very wealthy by the levy of a graduated income tax and a graduated inheritance tax, increasing the per cent with the size of the income. The same system is in force in all other civilized countries. In not one of them would the hereditary monarch venture to veto or declare null such a tax. In this country alone the people, speaking through their Congress and with the approval of their Executive, can not put in force a single measure of any nature whatever with assurance that it shall meet with the approval of the courts; and its failure to receive such approval is fatal, for, unlike the veto of the Executive, the unanimous vote of Congress (and the income tax came near receiving such vote) can not prevail against it. Of what avail shall it be if Congress shall conform to the popular demand and enact a "rate-regulation" bill and the President shall approve it if five lawyers, holding office for life and not elected by the people, shall see fit to destroy it, as they did the income-tax law? Is such a government a reasonable one, and can it be longer tolerated after 120 years of experience have demonstrated the capacity of the people for self-government? If five lawyers can negative the will of 100,000,000 of men, then the art of government is reduced to the selection of those five lawyers.

A power without limit, except in the shifting views of the court, lies in the construction placed upon the fourteenth amendment, which passed, as everyone knows, solely to prevent discrimination against the colored race, has been construed by the court to confer upon it jurisdiction to hold any provision of any statute whatever "not due process of law." This draws the whole body of the reserved rights of the States into the maelstrom of the Federal courts, subject only to such forbearance as the Federal Supreme Court of the day, or in any particular case, may see fit to exercise. The limits between State and Federal jurisdiction depend upon the views of five men at any given time; and we have a government of men and not a government of laws, prescribed beforehand.

At first the court generously exempted from its veto the police power of the several States. But since then it has proceeded to set aside an act of the Legislature of New York restricting excessive hours of labor, which act had been sustained by the highest court in that great State. Thus labor can obtain no benefit from the growing humanity of the age, expressed by the popular will in any State if such statute does not meet the views of five elderly lawyers, selected by influences naturally antagonistic to the laboring classes and whose training and daily associations certainly can not incline them in favor of restrictions upon the power of the employer.

The preservation of the autonomy of the several States and of local self-government is essential to the maintenance of our liberties, which would expire in the grasp of a consolidated despotism. Nothing can save us from this centripetal force but the speedy repeal of the fourteenth amendment or a recasting of its language in terms that no future court can misinterpret it.

The vast political power now asserted and exercised by the court to set aside public policies, after their full determination by Congress, can not safely be left in the hands of any body of men without supervision or control by any other authority whatever. If the President errs, his mandate expires in four years, and his party as well as himself is accountable to the people at the ballot box for his stewardship. If Members of Congress err, they, too, must account to their constituents. But the Federal judiciary hold for life, and though popular sentiment should change the entire personnel of the other two great departments of government, a whole generation must pass away before the people could get control of the judiciary, which possesses an irresponsible and unrestricted veto upon the action of the other departments—irresponsible because impeachment has become impossible, and if it were possible it could not be invoked as to erroneous decisions unless corruption were shown.

The control of the policy of government is thus not in the hands of the people, but in the power of a small body of men not chosen by the people, and holding for life. In many cases which might be mentioned, had the court been elective, men not biased in favor of colossal wealth would have filled more seats upon the bench, and if there had been such decision as in the income-tax case, long ere this, under the tenure of a term of years, new incumbents would have been chosen, who, returning to the former line of decisions, would have upheld the right of Congress to control the financial policy of the Government in accordance with the will of the people of this day and age, and not according to the shifting views which the court has imputed to language used by the majority of the 55 men who met in Philadelphia in 1787. Such methods of controlling the policy of a government are no whit more tolerable than the conduct of the augurs of old who gave the permission for peace or war, for battle or other public movements, by declaring from the flight of birds, the inspection of the entrails of fowls, or other equally wise devices, that the omens were lucky or unlucky—the rules of such divination being in their own breasts and hence their decisions beyond remedy.

It may be that this power in the courts, however illegally grasped originally, has been too long acquiesced in to be now questioned. If so, the only remedy which can be applied is to make the judges elective, and for a term of years, for no people can permit its will to be denied, and its destinies shaped, by men it did not choose, and over whose conduct it has no control, by reason of its having no power to change them and select other agents at the close of a fixed term.

Every Federal judgship below the Supreme Court can be abolished by an act of Congress, since the power which creates a Federal district or circuit can abolish it at will. If Congress can abolish one, it can abolish all. Several districts have from time to time been abolished, notably two in 1801; and we know that the 16 circuit judges created by the judiciary act of 1801 were abolished 18 months later.

It is true that under the stress of a great public sentiment every United States district and circuit judge can be legislated out of office by a simple act of Congress and a new system recreated with new judges. It is also true, as has been pointed out by distinguished lawyers, that while the Supreme Court can not be thus abolished, it exercises its appellate functions "with such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress shall make" (Const., Art. III, sec. 2), and as Congress enacted the judiciary act of 1789, it has often amended it and can repeal it. Judge Marshall recognized this in Marbury v. Madison, in which case in an obiter opinion he had asserted the power to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional, for he wound up by refusing the logical result, the issuing of the mandamus sought, because Congress had not conferred jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court to issue it.

In 1831 the attempt was made to repeal section 25 of the judiciary act of 1789, by virtue of which writs of error lay to the State supreme courts in certain cases. Though the section was not repealed, the repeal was supported and voted for by both Henry Clay, James K. Polk, and other leaders of both of the great parties of that day. But what is needed is not the exercise of these powers which Congress undoubtedly possesses and in an emergency will exercise, but a constitutional revision by which the Federal judges, like other public servants, shall be chosen by the people for a term of years.

It may be said that the Federal judges are now in office for life and it would be unjust to dispossess them. So it was with the State judges in each State when it changed from life judges to judges elected by the people; but that did not stay the hand of a much needed reform.

It must be remembered that when our Federal Constitution was adopted in 1787, in only one State was the governor elected by the people, and the judges in none, and that in most, if not all, the States the legislature, especially the senate branch, was chosen by a restricted suffrage. The schoolmaster was not abroad in the land, the masses were illiterate and government by the people was a new experiment and property holders were afraid of it. The danger to property rights did not come then, as now, from the other direction—from the corporations and others holding vast accumulations of capital and by their power crushing or threatening to crush out all those owning modest estates.

In the State governments the conditions existing in 1787 have long since been changed. In all the States the governor and the members of both branches of the legislature have long since been made elective by manhood suffrage. In all the 45 States save 4—Delaware, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island—the judges now hold for a term of years, and in three of these they are removable, as in England, upon a majority vote of the legislature, thus preserving a supervision of their conduct, which is utterly lacking as to the Federal judiciary. In Rhode Island the judges were thus dropped summarily once when they had held an act of the legislature invalid. In 33 States the judges are elected by the people, in 5 States by the legislature, and in 7 States they are appointed by the governor, with the consent of the senate. Even in England the judges hold office subject to removal upon the vote of a bare majority in Parliament—though there the judges have never asserted any power to set aside an act of Parliament. There the will of the people, when expressed through their representatives in Parliament, is final. The King can not veto it, and no judge has ever dreamed he had power to set it aside.

There are those who believe and have asserted that corporate wealth can exert such influence that even if judges are not actually selected by the great corporations, no judge can take his seat upon the Federal bench if his nomination and confirmation are opposed by the allied plutocracy. It has never been charged that such judges are corruptly influenced. But the passage of a judge from the bar to the bench does not necessarily destroy his prejudices or his predilections. If they go upon the bench knowing that this potent influence, if not used for them, at least withheld its opposition to their appointment or their confirmation, and usually with a natural and perhaps unconscious bias from having spent their lives at the bar in advocacy of corporate claims, this will unconsciously, but effectively, be reflected in the decisions they make. Having attempted as lawyers to persuade courts to view debated questions from the standpoint of aggregated wealth, they often end by believing sincerely in the correctness of such views, and not unnaturally put them in force when in turn they themselves ascend the bench. This trend in Federal decisions has been pronounced. Then, too, incumbents of seats upon the Federal circuit and district bench can not be oblivious to the influence which procures promotion; and how fatal to confirmation by the plutocratic majority in the Senate will be the expression of any judicial views not in accordance with the "safe, sane, and sound" predominance of wealth.

As far back as 1820, Mr. Jefferson had discovered the "sapping and mining," as he termed it, of the life-tenure, appointive Federal judiciary, owing no gratitude to the people for their appointment and fearing no inconvenience from their conduct, however arbitrary, in the discharge of such office. In short, they possess the autocratic power of absolute irresponsibility. "Step by step, one goes very far," says the French proverb. This is true of the Federal judiciary. Compare their jurisdiction in 1801, when Marshall ascended the bench, and their jurisdiction in 1906. The Constitution has been remade and rewritten by the judicial glosses put upon it. Had it been understood in 1787 to mean what it is construed to mean to-day, it is safe to say not a single State would have ratified it.

An elective judiciary is less partisan, for in many States half the judges are habitually taken from each party, and very often in other States the same men are nominated by both parties, as notably the recent selection by a Republican convention of a Democratic successor to Judge Parker. The organs of plutocracy have asserted that in one State the elective judges are selected by the party boss. But they forget that, if that is true, he must, in such a condition of affairs, name the governor too, and through the governor he would select the appointive judges. If the people are to be trusted to select the executive and the legislature, they are fit to select the judges. The people are wiser than the appointing power which, viewing judgeships as patronage, has with scarcely an exception filled the Federal bench with appointees of its own party. Public opinion, which is the corner stone of free government, has no place in the selection or supervision of the judicial augurs, who assume power to set aside the will of the people when declared by Congress and the Executive. Whatever their method of divination, equally with the augurs of old, they are a law to themselves and control events.

As was said by a great lawyer lately deceased, Judge Seymour D. Thompson, in 1891 (25 Am. Law Review, 288): "If the proposition to make the Federal judiciary elective instead of appointive is once seriously discussed before the people, nothing can stay the growth of that sentiment, and it is almost certain that every session of the Federal Supreme Court will furnish material to stimulate that growth."

Great aggregations of wealth know their own interests, and it is very certain that there is no reform and no constitutional amendment that they will oppose more bitterly than this. What, then, is the interest of all others in regard to it?

Another undemocratic feature of the Constitution is that which requires all Federal officials to be appointed by the President or heads of departments. This is a great evil. Overwhelming necessity has compelled the enactment of the civil-service law, which has protected many thousands of minor officials. But there has been no relief as to the 75,000 postmasters. When the Constitution was adopted there were only 75 postmasters, and it was contemplated that the President or Postmaster General would really appoint. But this constitutional provision is a dead letter. The selection of this army of 75,000 postmasters, in a large majority of cases, is made by neither, but in the unconstitutional mode of selection by Senator, Member of the House, or a political boss. There is no reason why Congress should not be empowered by amendment to authorize the department to lay off the territory patronizing each post office as a district in which an election shall be held once in four years, at the time a Member of Congress is chosen, and by the same machinery, the officer giving bond and being subject to the same supervision as now. Thus the people of each locality will get the postmaster they prefer, irrespective of the general result in the Union, relieving the department at Washington of much call upon its time, which can be used for the public interest in some better way; and, besides, it will remove from the election of President and Members of Congress considerations of public patronage. Elections will then more largely turn upon the great issues as to matters of public policy.

Another obstruction to the effective operation of the popular will is the fact that, though Congressmen are elected in November, they do not take their seats (unless there is a called session) for 13 months, and in the meantime the old Congress, whose policy may have been repudiated at the polls, sits and legislates, in any event, till March 4 following. This surely needs amendment, which fortunately can be done by statute. In England, France, and other countries the old Parliament ceases before the election, and the new Assembly meets at once and puts the popular will into law.

In thus discussing the defects of the Federal Constitution I have but exercised the right of the humblest citizen. Few will deny that defects exist. I have indicated what, in my opinion, are the remedies. As to this, many will differ. If better can be found, let us adopt them. But could the matter be more appropriately discussed than on the spot where the original Constitution was debated?

For my part, I believe in popular government. The remedy for the halting, halfway popular government which we have is more democracy. When some one observed to Mr. Gladstone that the "people are not always right," he replied, "No; but they are rarely wrong." When they are wrong their intelligence and their interests combine to make them correct the wrong. But when rulers, whether kings or life judges or great corporations, commit an error against the interest of the masses there is no such certainty of correction.

The growth of this country in population and in material wealth has made it the marvel of the ages.

"But what avail the plow or sail,
Or land or life, if freedom fail?"

The government and the destinies of a great people should always be kept in their own hands.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator from Oklahoma, before he takes his seat, permit me to make an inquiry?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. OWEN. I do with pleasure.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have been much interested in this proposition. In scanning the bill under consideration I find no designation of the cause or the manner of ascertaining the cause for the removal of the judges. Did the Senator intend to leave that question open without saying for what reason they might be recalled?

Mr. OWEN. Assuredly.

Mr. CLAPP. Just as the appointing power does not have to assign any cause.

Mr. OWEN. The power that appoints the judges does not have to give any reason for the appointment, and the power that recalls can exercise the same discretion. Many of the States provide for the recall without designating any cause, and it is more creditable to the judge not to assign any cause, but simply to exercise the power of setting him aside. I should set him aside and put him on a pension roll and treat him with respect and dignity. I believe that the bench deserves respect, and I think it ought to be accorded by Congress and by individuals in Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma desire to have the bill referred?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; I desire to have it referred to the Judiciary Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THE FREE LIST.

The Senate, as in Committee of Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire the attention of the Senate for a few moments to discuss briefly a proposed amendment by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] to the free-list bill, providing for the elimination of the Dutch standard and a reduction of the present rates of duty on sugar. It seems to me there is a misunderstanding among Senators as to the real effect of the Dutch standard as a protection to the sugar manufacturers of the United States.

THE DUTCH STANDARD OF COLOR—ORIGIN AND APPLICATION.

The Dutch standard of color for testing sugar was devised and put into operation by the Dutchmen long before the discovery of the centrifugal machine and the polariscope.

At the time this color standard was devised and adopted sugar was manufactured only by what is known as the "open kettle" process. The cane juice was subjected to numerous boilings over open fires, during which time various crude processes of clarification were employed, and when, through evaporation of the water contained in the liquid, it had reached a certain stage of density, it was run into hogsheads to cool and crystallize, after which holes in the bottom of the hogsheads were opened and the noncrystallizable molasses was allowed to drain off, leaving a brownish-colored mass of raw sugar known as "muscavados."

This process of manufacture still is employed to some extent in the more backward portions of the Tropics.

Sugars of a given color, made by the process described, approximate each other in sucrose content, and hence the Dutch standard of color test gauges them fairly well, and it was the only raw sugar test employed by our customhouses from 1861 to 1883.

For many years the only way of judging the sugar content of these moist masses was by the color, and the Dutchmen, being interested in the production of raw sugar in their colonies and in the refining of sugar at home, devised what came to be known throughout the sugar world as the "Dutch standard of color."

This standard consists of 18 square, 4 ounce, wide-mouthed, clear, glass bottles numbered from 8 to 25, which are filled, respectively, with sugar of various shades. The sugar in No. 8 is very dark, being scarcely above a molasses; No. 9 is a trifle lighter than No. 8; No. 10 is a shade lighter than No. 9, and so on up to No. 25, which is not quite as white as refined sugar. No. 16 is several shades darker than the average manila paper.

The bottles are filled and sealed by an association of sugar brokers in Amsterdam, packed in a neat wooden case having a compartment for each of the 18 bottles, and they are supplied to the sugar world at $20 per set. This is a sample [exhibiting] sized bottle I hold in my hand.

For sugar-testing purposes these sets are renewed each year because of the slight changes of color which are brought about by age, but each new set is identical in color not only with the other sets sent out at the same time, but with all the sets which have been sent out since this standard was devised and put into use.

Testing sugar with the Dutch standard means matching the color of the sugar to be tested with the sugar contained in some one of the 18 sealed bottles.

With the advent of the centrifugal machine and its employment in separating the molasses from the sugar it was found that the sugar mills could turn out not only a whiter raw sugar than could be secured by the muscovado process, but that they could regulate the color to a very considerable extent. In fact, the producer of raw centrifugal sugar has no trouble in making a high-grade dark-colored sugar, or a comparatively low-grade light-colored sugar.

The interior of a sugar crystal being pure white sugar, the impurities consist of the dark-colored molasses which adheres to the exterior of the crystals. With a coating of a given thickness it necessarily follows that the smaller the crystals the greater the proportion of impurities, and vice versa. If the sugar maker desires to produce a high-grade dark-colored sugar he makes large crystals and allows the sugar to cool off so that the molasses will thoroughly set to the crystals before he puts it through the centrifugal machines to remove the surplus molasses. If, on the other hand, he wishes to make a low-grade light-colored sugar he makes small crystals and runs the sugar into the centrifugals hot, before much molasses has set on the crystals. If he wishes to make a high-grade sugar, almost white in color, he makes large crystals, purges the sugar hot, and squirts a delicate stream of water or steam into the centrifugals in order to wash off the molasses as thoroughly as possible.

The sugar trade did not remain long in ignorance of these possible manipulations of raw sugar, and with the adoption of the centrifugal machines in the sugar mills of the world came the adoption of the polariscope in the customhouses of the world.

By the aid of the polariscope the exact purity of the sugar can be determined, regardless of color or other conditions, and from 1883 to date our customhouses have used the polariscope to determine the duty on dark-colored sugars and the Dutch standard of color to classify the light-colored sugars for a higher rate of duty, regardless of purity.

In adopting the polariscopic test our tariff law was so framed as to take advantage of this scientific method of testing sugar. This was done by providing that on all sugars testing not above 75° a certain rate of duty should be paid, and that for each additional degree of sugar shown by the polariscopic test an additional rate of duty should be paid. Under the present law sugars testing not above 75° by the polariscope pay a duty of 95 cents per 100 pounds and the increasing unit for each additional degree is 3½ cents per 100 pounds. Under this schedule 76° sugars pay 98½ cents per 100; 77°, $1.02; 78°, $1.05½; and so on up, which brings the duty to $1.68½ per 100 on 96° sugar and $1.82½ on 100° of pure raw sugar. The unit of 3½ cents per 100 pounds which is added for each extra degree of sugar was determined upon after a long series of scientific experiments and was embodied in the law for the purpose of equalizing the duty and the refining value of the various grades of "raw material" from which to produce the finished product. To obtain 100 pounds of granulated sugar requires 106½ pounds of 96° raw sugar, the loss in remelting being practically 2½ pounds of sugar and 4 pounds of dirt, on all of which full duty is paid. In addition to this, while 106½ pounds of 96° sugar yields 100 pounds of refined, 107½ pounds of 95° does not yield 100 pounds of refined, hence the increasing unit of 3½ cents per degree.

To further protect the public from imposition and the home producers of refined sugar from what was considered an unjust competition, Congress provided that, irrespective of the per cent of sugar it contained, a raw sugar that was white enough to masquerade as refined sugar (in other words, which was above No. 16 Dutch standard of color) should pay the same duty as was exacted on refined sugar, or $1.90 per 100 pounds. It was $1.95 under the Dingley bill. Under present conditions the consumer has no concern as to the purity of his purchase. With white unrefined sugar on the market the consumers would have no means of telling what percentage of their purchase was sugar and what percentage impurities.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMOOT. I would very much prefer to submit my remarks in regular order, and then I will be glad to answer any question the Senator may ask me.

WOULD MAKE NO TARIFF DISTINCTION BETWEEN A "RAW MATERIAL" AND A "FINISHED PRODUCT."

It is contended that as long as we have a differential or extra duty on refined sugar and a graded tariff on raw sugar, both are protected and we do not need the Dutch standard color restriction. While American consumers do not seem to care for high-grade raw sugars, sugars "above No. 16 Dutch standard" should be considered as "refined sugar," for the reason that both can be used as "finished products" for "direct consumption." The term "refined sugar" and "above No. 16 Dutch standard of color" as used in our tariff law are meant to be synonymous as describing a "finished product" as distinguished from a "raw product," and not as the Senator from Kansas stated in his speech the other day, in which he says:

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will allow me, let me state exactly what I did say. I said the customs officials in assessing the duty interpreted the word "refining" to refer only to that process of refining used by American refiners, who use the bone-black process.

The contention of those who advocate the removal of the color restriction from the sugar schedule means that, in their judgment, a "finished product," ready for "direct consumption" can enter our ports by paying only the duty prescribed for a "raw product," and they missed the whole purpose, intent, and theory of every schedule of the bill, which is to levy a higher duty on a "finished product" than on a "raw product," in order that the manufacturers of both a "raw product" and a "finished product" may be accorded a due measure of protection.

As all of our beet-sugar factories turn out a "finished product" for "direct consumption," this color restriction is for their protection primarily rather than for the protection of our seaboard refineries. For years we have been building up a home sugar industry, which makes sugar instead of merely refining an imported raw material. The duty on the raw product protects our farmers, who are producers of the raw material, while the duty on the finished product protects the beet-sugar manufacturers and, incidentally, the seaboard refineries. With a duty on the finished product and no duty on the raw product, the latter would be furnished by tropical and European planters, where labor is cheap, instead of by American farmers, where labor is dear. On the other hand, unless we afford a full measure of protection to our beet-sugar producers on the finished product, be it refined sugar or washed unrefined sugar, for direct consumption, they will cease to operate and the farmers will have no market for their beets.

PRECEDENT FOR EMPLOYING TWO STANDARDS IN TESTING SUGAR IMPORTS.

It has been contended that the Dutch standard of color as a means for testing sugar became obsolete with the advent of the polariscope and that we should not have two methods for testing the same commodity. The purpose of a protective tariff is to protect home industry, and it is not limited as to the number of methods employed to accomplish the desired result. In the cotton-goods schedule the rates of duty are regulated by the fact of the goods being bleached or unbleached, dyed or uncolored, the twisting of a given number of yarns into a thread, as well as by other provisions which are deemed to be effective. So with various other schedules throughout the act, and hence there is abundant precedent for using both the polariscope and the color test in the sugar schedule.

The amendment offered two years ago providing for the elimination of the words "No. 16 Dutch standard of color" and substituting therefor the words "bleached sugars" would have been ineffective, inasmuch as if we were to eliminate "Dutch standard" and substitute "bleaching" we would come back to the matter of color (but without an established gauge of color), for bleaching is whitening, secured by the use of sulphur, strontium, sulphuric acid, or other substances. And who would determine the amount which could be used before the sugar should be declared "bleached" sugar, and how could it be determined how much bleaching material had been used except each cargo be traced to its origin—an endless and all but impossible undertaking.

DUTCH STANDARD NOT IN USE BY ALL EUROPEAN COUNTRIES.

Inasmuch as many foreign governments are not using the Dutch color standard, it is claimed that it should be abandoned by the United States Government.

I think the Senator from Kansas was unfair in his statement to the Senate in relation to the abandonment of the Dutch standard by foreign countries, because of the fact but half of the story was told by him. The fact that the color test is not now in use in some of the foreign sugar-producing countries affords no reason for our abandoning it, for the reason that the tariff rates on sugar imports into those countries are already prohibitive, and as they import no sugar the use or nonuse of the "Dutch standard" of color would in no wise affect them other than to cumber up their statutes.

I have here Senate Document No. 7 of the Sixty-first Congress, first session. It is a message of the President of the United States transmitting a report by the Secretary of State with an accompanying statement in response to Senate resolution of April 8, 1909, requesting information as to duties, taxes, and concessions on sugar in certain foreign countries.

I will call the attention of Senators to what that report shows in order to prove what I say, that some of the countries which have abandoned the Dutch standard are to-day imposing a duty upon sugar that is considered prohibitive, and the leading foreign countries, with the exception of England, impose a duty that is absolutely prohibitive.

Under the terms of the Brussels convention, which was signed March 5, 1902, and went into effect September 1, 1903, Austria-Hungary, Belgium, France, Germany, Spain, the United Kingdom, Italy, Holland, and Sweden agreed to make their surtax (that is, the amount of import duty in excess of the internal duty) 6 francs per 100 kilograms on refined sugar and 5 francs 50 centimes on other sugar. On refined sugar the surtax amounts to about 50 cents per 100 pounds, and is amply sufficient to prevent the importation of sugar. Inasmuch as Spain, Italy, and Sweden were not exporters of sugar, it was agreed that they should be exempt from this stipulation concerning the amount of surtax. The convention was made for five years and has been renewed. Under it the sugar bounties of Europe were abolished. Russia did not become a member of the convention, but an arrangement with Russia since has been entered into, whereby that country is allowed to export, I believe, 200,000 tons of sugar.

I find in this report that in Austria-Hungary on refined sugar, as well as kinds of sugar of polariscopic test of 98 per cent and above, the duty is $4.03 per 100 pounds. I find that France imposes a duty on 98 per cent sugar of $2.89 per hundred. I find that Germany imposes a duty upon sugar refined of $2.03 a hundred. I find that Italy imposes a duty upon first-class sugar refined of $8.68½ a hundred. I find that the Netherlands impose a duty upon sugar of $4.93 a hundred. I find that Russia imposes a duty upon sugar of $8.56 a hundred. I find that Spain imposes a duty upon sugar of $7.46 a hundred.

Is it any wonder that the Dutch standard has been abolished by those Governments? Is there any need of it? The rate is so high that it is absolutely prohibitive.

I call attention to the fact that in England a duty is imposed on sugars exceeding 98 per cent saccharine of only 39.6 cents per hundred. I want Senators to follow me and I will show them what the effect of this low duty has been upon the business of refining sugar in England.

DUTCH STANDARD NOT IN USE BY GREAT BRITAIN.

Great Britain is cited as one of the progressive countries which does not use the Dutch standard. The sugar tariff of Great Britain, the only other large importer of sugar among the progressive nations of the world, furnishes no guide for us, unless it be to force the conclusion home that the "Dutch standard" of color restriction is necessary to one branch of the home industry, namely, that of producing finished sugar, ready for direct consumption, be it home-produced beet sugar or refined sugar made from imported raws. Great Britain has no home sugar-producing industry to foster or protect, and her sugar tariff is levied as a revenue measure, pure and simple. The arranging of her sugar schedule, though on a lower rate of duty, is much like our own, except that the "Dutch standard of color" is not employed and there is no differential on refined sugar. Beginning with 17.9 cents per 100 pounds on 76° sugar, the duty gradually rises with each degree until it reaches 39.6 cents per 100 pounds on 98° sugar.

The effect of the British tariff not only has been to discourage the establishment of a home beet sugar industry, for which her soil and climate are admirably adapted, but to ruin and drive out of business her sugar refiners and transfer a large portion of that industry to continental Europe.

In 1860 Great Britain refined 96 per cent of the sugar she imported; in 1892 but 60 per cent, and in 1909 only 43 per cent; and while her sugar consumption has increased amazingly, her refiners handle less sugar to-day than they did 20 years ago.

I say now if the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is adopted it will have the same effect in this country.

The Dingley law also provided for a flat duty of $1.95 per 100 on all sugars which had passed through a process of refining, and this 12½ cents difference in duty between 100° raw sugar paying $1.82½, and refined sugar paying $1.95, has come to be termed the "refiner's differential." Under the Payne bill the duty on refined sugar has been reduced to $1.90, thus lowering the differential to 7½ cents per 100 pounds. Had the levying of duty on sugar been confined to these two regulations—the polariscopic test on raw sugar and the differential on "refined sugar"—the building up of the home beet-sugar industry would have depended upon a customs ruling as to what constitutes "refined sugar."

We are told here upon the floor of the Senate that refined sugar is the only sugar that has passed through a refining process known as the bone-black process.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will let me finish this sentence, then I will yield to him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah will continue his remarks.

Mr. SMOOT. Known as the bone-black process, and also a centrifugal process.

The original method of refining sugar, which is still employed universally in the refining of cane sugar, includes the passing of the remelted raw sugar through animal charcoal or bone-black filters, and the standard definitions of "refined sugar" embody the two features, "remelting" and the use of "bone black." It is less difficult to remove the alkaline impurities from beet sugar than it is to remove the gums from cane sugar, and some years ago a German scientist developed a successful process for producing pure beet sugar without the use of bone-black and without remelting. This process is being adopted more and more extensively in Europe and is employed by all the American beet-sugar factories. While these sugars are perfectly pure sucrose, a product identical in every way with so-called "refined sugar," it is a question, technically speaking, as to whether or not they would be classed as "refined sugars"—and if the Senator from Kansas is correct they would not be classed as refined sugars—since they have not been passed through "bone-black" filters, and, second, because they have not been "remelted," the process being continuous from the time the beets enter one end of the factory until the pure sugar comes out at the other.

WHAT IS "REFINED SUGAR"?

To eliminate the Dutch standard color test would mean either the elimination of the extra duty on so-called "refined sugar" or an endless amount of confusion and trouble in our customhouses, for the reason that "refined sugar" is more or less a relative term. The Standard Dictionary has this to say about refining sugar (p. 1797, 1909 edition):

The crude product, called raw or muscovado sugar, is sent to the refinery, where it is further purified by solution and filtration through animal charcoal, and boiled down in a vacuum pan to recrystallization, yielding a refined sugar, which is dried in a centrifugal machine.

If it should be held that only such sugar as had been purified by being passed over boneblack or animal charcoal was "refined sugar," then the perfectly pure, white, lustrous beet sugars turned out in Germany, France, Austria, and elsewhere on the continent of Europe could not be taxed as refined sugar, for many of those refineries use no animal charcoal whatever any more than our American beet-sugar factories use it.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah now yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator, of course, does not mean that only muscovado sugars are refined by the refiners. The definition which he read indicates that only the muscovado sugars are refined by being filtered through bone black.

Mr. SMOOT. I had no intention of conveying that idea. Not only muscovado sugars are refined, but other sugars are refined in the United States.

Mr. BRISTOW. The definition which the Senator read is not accurate, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it is.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator does not mean that only muscovado sugars are refined. That is what the definition says, as he will see if he reads it again.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is speaking of the definition given by the dictionary?

Mr. BRISTOW. Given by the dictionary.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply say that is one definition which is given. It does not cover the whole subject, nor did I say it did.

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, that is what I suggested.

Mr. SMOOT. If, on the other hand, it were held that the use of animal charcoal is not necessary in order to constitute "refining," where would the line be drawn? After the juice is secured from the beet or cane the whole process is one of purification by repeated boilings, limings, etc. To what extent can this process be termed "refining"?

If it were held that a given number of boilings should constitute "refining," what would there be about the sugar to indicate to the customhouse officials whether it had been "refined" or not? To-day anyone who is not color blind can determine which sugars shall pay the extra 7½ cents per hundred and which shall not, for the simple reason that the so-called "refined sugars" are white, and with the "16 Dutch standard of color" in the law, all sugars whiter than No. 16 Dutch standard pay the 7½ cents extra duty, no matter to what extent the process of purification may or may not have been carried.

To remove the "No. 16 Dutch standard" from our tariff laws and still levy an extra duty on refined sugar would put our customhouses in a chaotic condition.

In a speech delivered by the Senator from Kansas the other day we find this statement:

But in answer to the Senator from Virginia, I will speak for a moment of the high-grade centrifugal sugars, which are sugars that have been refined at the factory by the centrifugal process, which is a rotary process, exactly similar to the process that is now used in separating cream from milk on the farm. The sugar is thrown into a whirling vat, and the molasses, which is the heavier, is thrown out by a rotary motion of some 1,500 revolutions a minute. So the sugar in the center of the receptacle gradually whitens as the molasses is thrown out of it by the momentum, the molasses being the heavier, just like cream gathers in the center because it is the lighter, and the milk which is the heavier gets onto the outer side of the separator.

That process, which is a modern process, has been improved, so that there is a great deal of very fine sugar that is produced by these centrifugal factories that will grade 98 and 99 and be 18 and 20 and 22 in color.

Now, that could find a market if it could be offered to the American people at a cheaper price than is our refined granulated sugar. There is no one in the Senate who does not remember years ago that we had different grades of sugar before the Dutch-standard monopoly was perfected. We had what were known as coffee sugars. I remember when I was a boy there was a coffee A and a coffee C. They were light-brown sugars; they had a little molasses in them, and they had a better flavor, indeed, than our refined sugars, because they had the molasses flavor.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator remember how much they cost?

Mr. BRISTOW. They were much cheaper, probably 50 cents a hundred pounds, and sometimes 75 cents a hundred less than the refined. There was then a market for those sugars, and they would find a market now if the duty was assessed on the purity and not on the color, but they are lighter than 16, and so when a 17 sugar comes in—a sample of which I now hold in my hand—it pays just as high a duty as this granulated sugar [indicating] pays. So there is a penalty against this light-brown sugar coming in at all, a penalty of almost 20 cents a hundred pounds, and that keeps it out. Take that penalty off, and these sugars will find a market with the American public and the Sugar Trust will not get to handle them and add 75 cents a hundred to the price that the American people pay. That is the reason I am contending for taking the Dutch standard out of the sugar tariff.

Here it is claimed by the Senator from Kansas that the American people desire and would consume large quantities of high testing unrefined sugar if only they were able to get it at a slight reduction from the price of refined sugar, but that with the retention of the "Dutch standard" clause in the tariff bill, which clause imposes the same rate of duty on high colored unrefined sugar as on refined sugar, all of these sugars must be kept below a certain color (No. 16 Dutch standard), that anything below this color is not marketable for direct consumption, and thereby necessarily is forced into the refineries to the great detriment of the American people and the enrichment of the refiners, and if this Dutch color restriction were removed the tropical planters would hot purge and wash their sugars and turn out a high testing, light colored unrefined sugar, such as the American people want but are unable to get. The fallacy of this argument lies in the fact that on American soil, without any restrictions as to color and without any duty to pay, we are producing in Louisiana, Hawaii, and Porto Rico nearly 1,000,000 tons a year of light colored 96° to 99° sugar and the direct market for it is so small that practically all of it has to be sold to the refiners and be refined before it becomes marketable for direct consumption. There isn't a sugar maker in the world so ignorant as not to know that he could raise the color of his sugar by washing it, and to contend that if we would remove the "Dutch standard of color" restriction the foreign tropical planters could wash their sugars, pay full duty, and find a great American market waiting for them is to brand as fools every producer of raw sugar in Louisiana, Hawaii, and Porto Rico for failing to grasp such a golden opportunity.

I hold, Mr. President, a sample of those sugars in my hand. This [indicating] is a cane sugar. It tests only 92.2°, and yet it is almost white. Here is one [indicating] the color of coffee C sugar, and it tests only 91.8°. Without the Dutch standard that sugar could be made white, brought into this country, and sold to the American people as pure refined sugar. Referring to the colored sugar the American people would like to buy, as stated by the Senator from Kansas, here is a sample [indicating] of that kind of sugar, made in Louisiana. That grade of sugar can be purchased in any quantities desired or demanded by the American people, yet not to exceed 20 per cent of the sugar raised in Louisiana is sold in that condition. As I say, nearly 1,000,000 tons are produced in Hawaii, Porto Rico, and Louisiana, and could all be sold to the American people without ever passing through a sugar refinery, if the American people should demand this grade of sugar that is so much sweeter than the refined sugar, according to the testimony of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Utah mean to imply that the people who buy the 20 per cent Louisiana sugar, such as the sample before him, are defrauded, and that the people who sell the sugar are committing a crime against business morality?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did not so intimate or state such a proposition. I said that the Senator from Kansas had stated in his recent speech on this subject that if the American people could get this grade of sugar they would buy it, but that the American people were forced to take refined sugars because of the fact that the cane-sugar producer is compelled to send his sugar to the refiner to be refined, and——

Mr. CUMMINS. If I understand the argument of the Senator from Utah, it is——

Mr. SMOOT. And in further answer to the question which the Senator has asked is this: Here is a sugar [indicating] which tests 92.2°. That sugar is not 100 per cent pure, but there is 7.8 per cent of impurities in it, consisting of molasses and water; yet it is bleached white. If the Dutch standard were not in the law, that sugar could be imported and pay duty only on a basis of 92.2 per cent saccharine and be sold to the American people for 100 per cent pure sugar.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understood that; but if there is any strength in the argument of the Senator from Utah, it is that the Dutch standard is necessary in order to protect the consumers of sugar in this country from imposition. That is the only purpose which the Senator says it now really serves.

Of course as to the sugar produced in Louisiana, there is no Dutch standard of color, and the sugar manufacturers there can impose upon the American people in just the same way as the Senator from Utah says the imported sugar might impose upon them if we should remove the Dutch standard. My question is: Do the sugar manufacturers of Louisiana commit that fraud upon the American people, or is their sugar honestly sold? If it is honestly sold, why does the Senator from Utah think that the same kind of sugar coming in from abroad would be dishonestly sold?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am referring to the sugar of which this is a sample [indicating] produced in Louisiana. That is a sugar that comes directly from the centrifugal. No one in Louisiana sells that for pure, white sugar, but if it were bleached, the people of the United States would not know whether it was 100° sugar or 96 per cent.

In further answer to the Senator I will also say that I know of no attempt on the part of Louisiana sugar producers to sell as pure sugar bleached or whitened sugar.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the sugar manufacturers of Louisiana have not so attempted, what reason has the Senator from Utah to think that sugar coming from Cuba or the Philippines would be sold upon the market in such a way as would be dishonest?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think so from the very fact that it has been done in the past by other countries. A duty is imposed upon sugars from Cuba and other foreign countries, but Louisiana sugars pay no duty no matter in what shape they are placed upon the market.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then, why do not the Louisiana sugar makers do it?

Mr. SMOOT. I am not authorized to speak for the Louisiana sugar planters. I have never heard them say why they do not do it; but I know that sugars are bleached in Scotland, that they are sold in different countries as white sugars, and they could be so sold in this country if it were not for the Dutch standard.

Mr. CUMMINS. But it is not done by those who have the opportunity to sell that sort of sugar.

Mr. SMOOT. No; not by the cane planters of this country.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, I say it is not availed of in this country.

Mr. SMOOT. Not that I am aware of.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Senator from Utah is perfectly sure, is he, that the only reason for maintaining the Dutch standard of color is to prevent the sale of white sugar to the people of this country upon the supposition that it is pure sugar, when, as a matter of fact, it is of less saccharine strength?

Mr. SMOOT. Not the only reason, Mr. President.

Mr. CUMMINS. What other reason is there?

Mr. SMOOT. I have already gone over that ground while the Senator was out of the Chamber, and if he will take time to read my speech he will see that I have done so.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was compelled to be out of the Chamber for a few moments, and I am rather curious and anxious to know what the other reason is.

SUGAR TARIFFS AND THE DUTCH STANDARD—"BLEACHED SUGARS."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in years gone by Scotch and other bleached sugars, high in color and low in sucrose, have invaded our market, to the great loss of our customs revenues as well as to our consumers, who had no means of knowing how pure the sugar was.

Inasmuch as nearly 1,000,000 tons of raw sugar a year is produced in the United States and its possessions, none of which pays any duty and all of which can be washed and marketed as readily as can other tropical sugar, and yet practically none of it is handled in this manner, a fair conclusion would seem to be that the foreign tropical planters who have urged persistently the removal of the Dutch standard of color test have in view the flooding of our market with high-colored, low-grade bleached sugars.

Mr. CUMMINS. Might I ask another question, Mr. President, at this point?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah further yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. Just for a question.

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. Would it not be entirely practicable to compel the manufacturers and sellers of sugar to put such a stamp or label on it as would indicate its saccharine strength?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have heretofore stated, in discussing this subject, that it would be practicable, but the law does not compel it at this time.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; but, Mr. President, I only suggest that if we can save the people of the country something in the price of sugar it would be quite easy to supplement our present pure-food laws by such a requirement.

Mr. SMOOT. If an amendment to the pure-food law were an accomplished fact, then I do not see why it would be necessary to maintain the Dutch standard, but until that is done it certainly is necessary, in my judgment.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMOOT. For a question only.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire if the Senator thinks the foreign refiners are any more dishonest than are the American refiners?

Mr. SMOOT. That has nothing to do with the question under discussion. I do not know that the refiners of America are any more honest than the refiners of foreign countries; but the refiners in foreign countries may have a process of bleaching sugars, as they have in Scotland to-day, that the refiners in this country have not. I do not think that any of the refiners in a foreign country or in this country, or men in other avocations of life, are endowed with too much honesty.

Mr. President, speaking upon the question of refiners, it is charged that the only thing that the Dutch standard accomplishes is to benefit the refiners. I have before me——

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. Just for a question.

Mr. NELSON. Would it not be well in the sugar schedule to put in a proviso that no company that has been guilty of defrauding the Government by false weights shall have the benefit of this tariff law?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Congress of the United States desires to enact such a provision, it is in their power to do so. I have no excuse to offer for any person or company defrauding or attempting to defraud the Government.

Mr. President, it has been charged, as I have stated, that the Dutch standard is put into our law for the purpose of benefiting the refiners; and yet, Mr. President, I find the refiners of this country working and pleading for free sugar, sending broadcast over this country this kind of circular advertisement [exhibiting], and signed "Committee of Wholesale Grocers", formed to assist in obtaining cheap sugar for consumers through reduction of duties on raw and refined sugars, 138 Front Street, New York. I understand that this circular is being distributed at the instigation of Mr. C. A. Spreckels, president of the Federal Sugar Refinery Co. This has already been proved before the committee of the House investigating the Sugar Trust. In the circular it is stated:

> For years it has been the claim of the promoters of our domestic beet-sugar industry that our infamous sugar tariff, equal to an ad valorem rate of 78.87 per cent, must be continued so as to protect the "high-priced laboring man."

Mr. President, that is falsehood number one. The ad valorem duty on sugar is 52.76 per cent, instead of 78.87 per cent as stated in the circular. The circular contains illustrations showing that the laborers in the sugar industry in Germany all dress for their work as if they were going to a coronation ceremony, and that all who are employed in raising sugar beets in this country are foreigners of the lowest type. This is falsehood number two, and I shall not take the time of the Senate longer to point out other equally as flagrant falsehoods. I wish to say that if the refiners could only secure free sugar they would have the sugar business of this country absolutely in their hands, controlling, as I believe they do, most of the sugar lands in Cuba, Porto Rico, and Hawaii.

I support a duty upon sugar for two purposes. In the first place, for the revenue derived from that source. Many of the leading countries of the world raise a great share of the necessary revenue for maintaining their governments from the collection of import duties or an excise tax upon sugar.

I have a statement showing the amount of excise taxes collected on sugar for the year 1907 by eight foreign Governments, amounting in all to $188,359,720. The names of the Governments and amounts collected by each are as follows:

Russia	$52,255,640
Germany	35,118,408
Austria-Hungary	38,191,500
France	30,020,055

Italy	$14,745,691
Little Holland	9,902,250
Spain	4,618,531
Belgium	3,507,645

I support a protective duty upon sugar because it enables the home manufacturers of sugar to produce at least a part of the sugar consumed by the people of this country. I believe that if it were understood that for 20 years the rate of duty on sugar would remain the same as it is to-day there would be produced in America, long before the expiration of that time, beet and cane sugar enough to supply the American people. Men do not want to invest their money in beet-sugar factories so long as there is an agitation every year or two for free sugar, for it is impossible to make sugar in this country in competition with Germany, Russia, Holland, France, and other countries where wages are so low.

In the speech of the Senator from Kansas the other day he said:

By the Cuban treaty this differential was increased by a 20 per cent reduction of the duty on Cuban sugars, thereby reducing the maximum duty on raw sugar from Cuba from $1.82½ to $1.46, making the differential 49 cents per hundred pounds. When the Payne-Aldrich bill became a law the duty on refined sugar was reduced from $1.95 to $1.90, leaving the differential on Cuban sugar since that date 44 cents per hundred. I have shown, however, that the differentials, based upon actual importations was, prior to that time, 25 cents—not 12½ cents—and since that time it is the difference between $1.348, the duty actually paid upon importations, and $1.90, or about 55 cents per hundred pounds. That 60 cents a hundred pounds is a great deal more than the entire cost of refining. There is no evidence that it costs as much as 60 cents a hundred pounds to refine sugar, except a statement at one time made by Mr. Havemeyer. The result has been that this 20 per cent reduction in duty has enabled the sugar refiners to buy their sugar in Cuba for about 34 cents a hundred less—that is, the amount of the 20 per cent reduction in duty—than they did before. They have gotten the advantage of the reduction of the duty; the Cuban has not received any more for his sugar; and the American consuming public has not received the advantage of that reduction. I make that statement and challenge any man to contradict it.

I do not claim, nor never have, that the Cuban planter gets all the benefit of the 20 per cent reduction as provided for in the Cuban treaty, but I do claim that at times they get a large portion of it and at other times but very little of it. I also claim that the quotations on sugars at times in this country, as compared with the price of foreign sugars, prove that the American people get some advantage in lower price sugars on account of the Cuban preferential.

The difference between the New York price of raw and refined sugar, as given in Table No. 1, represents the margin the refiners secured for the cost of refining and for profit. It will be observed that during the free raw sugar period it was much greater than at present, or just prior. The result was reflected in the dividends of the American Sugar Refining Co., on its common stock, which have been as follows:

	Per cent.
1892	10½
1893	21½
1894	12
1895	12
1896	12
1897	12
1898	12
1899	12
1900	7½
Since 1900	7

Table No. 2 shows how much the New York price of 96° sugar has been below the New York parity of the Hamburg price since 1901.

Table No. 3 shows how much less or how much in excess of Hamburg export prices the American people have paid for refined sugar.

The fact of the matter is that with the impetus given to raw-sugar production through the annexation of Hawaii, free sugar from Porto Rico, and 20 per cent reduction to Cuba the American markets have been flooded with raw sugar and the market greatly depressed.

The refiners have paid the New York market price of raw, have maintained a difference of 76 to 90 cents per 100 for their labor and profit, and where the prices of raw have been excessively low the excess has gone to the people in a cost of sugar lower than the Hamburg parity.

It seems to be true that whatever the price of raw sugar is in New York, the Cubans get 34 cents a hundred more for their sugar than do the producers of nonpreferential sugar.

I have, Mr. President, these tables, but will not take the time of the Senate to read them, but will ask permission to have them inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON in the chair). Without objection, permission is granted.

The tables referred to are as follows:

NOTE.—The intrinsic value of German-Austrian granulated is one-eighth to one-fourth cent per pound less than New York standard granulated. In the above figures 15 cents per 100 pounds has been added to the quoted New York parity of Hamburg "First-marks" in order to equalize the difference in value of the two sugars.

Mr. SMOOT. Again, Mr. President, in the report issued by the Czarnikow-Rionda Co., of New York, dated April 28, 1911, quotations of sugar are given. The costs, including freight, are as follows:

Centrifugals, Cuba, 96° test, is $2.66 a hundred; centrifugals, 96° test, not preferential, $2.22; muscovados, 89° test, $1.97.

And in their circular of July 21, 1911, the quotations are as follows:

Centrifugals, Cuba, 96° test, $3 to $3.12; centrifugals, 96° test, nonpreferential, $2.66 to $2.78; and muscovados, 89° test, $2.41 to $2.53.

So, Mr. President, the quotations upon the market in New York in April and in July of this year show that there was a difference in favor of the Cuban sugars.

I was somewhat astonished the other day when I heard the Senator from Kansas say that he did not know a Mr. Bass.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think the Senator is mistaken as to what I said. I did say that I had heard of Mr. Bass a few years ago during the sugar controversy, and I think I got some circulars from him. I do not remember saying that I did not know Mr. Bass.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President, I certainly was mistaken, because, as I remembered, the Senator made that statement, but I shall certainly take the Senator's word if he now says that he did not say that he did not know Mr. Bass.

Mr. BRISTOW. I supposed the Senator and everybody understood that Mr. Bass was here and that he sent voluminous letters to a number of Senators two years ago; but I know nothing about Mr. Bass except concerning his relations to the controversy two years ago. I do not know whether he is from Porto Rico or where he is from, and I know nothing about his responsibility.

Mr. SMOOT. He is generally known as the father of this movement. He once had a testing plant in an office building in Washington, and he tried to get nearly every Senator to visit his office for the purpose of explaining in his own way the Dutch standard. He has issued more circulars and made more statements through the public press than any man I know of supporting the elimination of the Dutch standard. I do not care to take up the time of the Senate now by going into the history of Mr. Bass and letting the Senate know what kind of a man he is, but I ask permission to include in my remarks certain circulars, issued in English and in Spanish, numbered A, B, C, D, E, and F, issued by Mr. Bass, and first signed "Fiscus." I shall not ask to have his photograph appearing in Circular "D" included in the RECORD. Up to that time he was not known, but he thought in issuing Circular "D" that it was about time to let the American people know who he was, and so he put his photograph in Circular "D."

I also have here a book signed "Fiscus No. 1," dated New York, December 1, 1907, which gives in his own language a description of what a wonderful character he is. I should like, Mr. President, to insert the English portion of these publications also as a part of my remarks. These precious documents should be preserved, showing what a remarkable man the "father of the Dutch standard" is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, permission is granted to insert the matter indicated by the Senator from Utah.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"FISCUS."

I, the undersigned, give my solemn word and promise not to reveal to anyone the contents and subject matter of all such communications as I may become acquainted with in connection with the word "Fiscus," relating to the secret work being carried on in an effort to place sugar and other products of this country, with a material saving of import duty, upon the markets of the United States, and the products of the United States imported into this country with a minimum amount of duty, and that in any correspondence upon the subject I shall not use my name, but only the numbers assigned to me.

I am connected with the enterprise ———.
In the capacity of ———.
My age is ———. My nationality is ———.
I speak the following languages ———.
My signature and address is ———.
Date ——— ——, 1907. Number ———.
Mr. ——— ———, whose address is ———; Mr. ——— ———, whose address is ———; Mr. ——— ———, whose address is ———; Mr. ——— ———, whose address is ———; Mr. ——— ———, whose address is ——— may also, in my judgment, be similarly pledged.

Date ———.

Your name has been submitted in confidence with the suggestion that one of the inclosed pledges be sent to you.

Kindly send the names of several other parties who you are confident will be interested in the subject, preserve the pledge of secrecy, and not take any steps to embarrass the movement.

With the close of the United States Congress on March 4, 1907, the Cuban situation remains still in the hands of the Executive branch of the American Government. Care must be taken in order not to conflict with the program of campaign carried on by the members of the "Fiscus" movement; that you are not identified, publicly or privately, with any movement that purports to bring about reciprocity, a protectorate, or annexation.

Having given your pledge of secrecy, you are relied upon to have confidence in such as have in hand the "Fiscus" movement, and only act upon suitable instructions and when so instructed. Kindly write, stating how your interests may be benefited by a realization of the "Fiscus" movement, and briefly outline what your interests are.

This information will be appreciated by the management of the "Fiscus" movement, and will facilitate the early instructing you upon the details of the plan of campaign, as you will understand that until each member pledged has demonstrated his loyalty, secrecy, and interest in the movement, every particle of information must be kept back in order not to permit the enemies of the movement from creating obstacles to its early and complete accomplishment.

Under no circumstances submit the names of any parties unless you are confident they will preserve the secrets. The movement will gain nothing by having a great number of supporters. It requires a limited number of intelligent men, sufficiently interested to prompt them to realize the value of secrecy.

Up to the present no outsider has any idea of the movement. Already it has the support of the leading proprietors, exporters, and importers in every locality on the island of Cuba, and, as you will observe, the press as yet is silent upon the subject. That is as it should be. The Cuban press will be suitably instructed at the opportune moment. Meanwhile the work of organization is going on at a rapid rate. There is no necessity to enlarge upon the individual advantages that will accrue to the members of the "Fiscus" movement when its aim is accomplished. Each member is sufficiently intelligent to recognize that when he signed the pledge of secrecy.

Recollect the "Fiscus" movement does not want everybody to be connected with it. Its members, therefore, should be interested in not giving the names of any indiscreet parties or such as are inclined to indulge in liquor enough to make them loquacious. There is too much at stake. There are too many sincere men interested in the movement.

It is believed that you are interested in the subject hereinafter indicated, and that is the reason why the inclosed is sent to you.

The "Fiscus" movement has for its primary object to get several thousand interested individuals in Cuba in communication with one leading individual. Later an attempt will be made to get all to think alike upon a certain subject, which is: The urgency of properly increasing the existing 20 per cent Cuban-American reciprocity.

The originators of the "Fiscus" movement believe that, without in any way injecting politics into the subject, the attainable limit of Cuban-American tariff reduction is 99 per cent; and that the one-hundredth per cent may be properly left to represent the continuance of the Cuban flag, and with which Cuban flag the "Fiscus" movement is in no manner concerned. It is believed that no effort should be spared by interested parties to attain, as near as possible, to the limit of 99 per cent; and, furthermore, that by preconcerted action the same may soon be brought about.

You are asked to fill out the inclosed blank, which will not compromise nor in any manner make you liable for anything. By so doing it will be known to the manager (and to no one else) that you are interested in the subject, and additional printed matter will be sent to you; otherwise it will be taken for granted that you are not interested.

Many have stated that it would be impossible to organize those who would be immediately benefited by a larger than 20 per cent Cuban-American tariff reduction. It is assumed that such is the case, and consequently no attempt will be made to organize any number of Cubans. An effort will be made to get in communication with several thousand individuals interested in the subject and to later submit certain ideas for their consideration. Meanwhile it is hoped that they will exercise a little patience and not become unduly or prematurely agitated upon the subject.

It has, furthermore, been stated that the principal reason why no one could deal with the Cubans to the latter's advantage was because the Cubans were suspicious of one another, and that this feature permitted their becoming a ready prey to the designs of their industrial opponents. The "Fiscus" movement will endeavor to get the Cubans to cease being suspicious of one another and to direct and concentrate their suspicions against certain parties who will be later indicated.

In the deal of 1903 the Cubans in general (and the sugar planters particularly) were deceived; that is, their cause was actually sacrificed because they did not know enough about the subject to prompt them to see that their interests were intrusted to competent individuals.

Gradually the entire matter will be explained in order that by next spring (1908) the Cuban industrials will not be again improperly represented either before the Cuban or the American Governments.

Someone, in the article in the New York Herald of May 9, 1907, has fired the first shot in the coming struggle and against the interests of the Cuban sugar estates.

What will be communicated to the "Fiscus" correspondents will not be read in the newspapers or other publications for some time to come. Therefore, if you desire to keep informed upon that which will be later distributed, kindly fill out the inclosed blank and return it at an early date to the address indicated on the inclosed envelope, as it is a considerable task to send out over 3,000 sealed circulars—some of them needlessly. If you are interested in the subject (and every planter, merchant, banker, or other in the island of Cuba is interested), the least you can do is to see that your name and address is properly recorded.

Mr. Bass is the originator and present head of the "Fiscus" movement. In 1902 he went to Washington for the fixed purpose of securing a Cuban-American reciprocity treaty that did not make any reference to any such restraining clause as the "16 Dutch standard in color." He, individually, sustained all the expenses of the campaign successfully carried on by the Cuban-American reciprocity bureau, at a cost of over $50,000, and which lasted over a period of more than 15 months.

Mr. Bass's work in 1902 and 1903 should be justly considered as a complete success. Although he did not succeed in securing a large enough reduction of American import duty to admit of the Cubans making white unrefined sugar for direct sale to the American public (the same as the American beet-sugar producers), he did succeed in keeping the "16 Dutch standard" clause out of the primary or actual treaty. This objectionable clause he kept out of the treaty by overcoming tremendous odds: (1) The Cuban planters' delegation approved of its insertion in the treaty; (2) the resolutions adopted at the meetings held throughout Cuba, under the auspices of the Provisional American Government, were later secretly presented to the United States Senators, and these resolutions approved of the insertion of the 16 Dutch standard clause in the treaty; (3) the American Beet-Sugar Association, and (4) the Louisiana Planters' Association, (5) together with the delegates from Hawaii, and (6) Porto Rico also urged the insertion of the 16 Dutch standard clause; (7) many "paid-for" articles at the time appeared in the American periodicals urging the insertion of the clause. The subject finally provoked a scandal and prompted a senatorial investigation, headed by Senator Teller, of Colorado. Against the foregoing open influences and (8) powerful secret work, the Cuban-American reciprocity bureau nevertheless succeeded in keeping the 16 Dutch standard clause out of the treaty.

In the coming campaign there remains to be secured not only a greater than 20 per cent reduction of American import duty, but particular care must be taken that the "16 Dutch standard" clause is not inserted in any Cuban-American arrangement. It is firmly believed that the "Fiscus" movement will triumphantly accomplish the desired results.

The "Fiscus" movement counts upon the loyalty of the Cuban planters, merchants, and bankers to no other interest than their own. What is that which they most desire? Is it not a material reduction of American import duty upon Cuban products shipped from Cuba to the United States? And to secure this is what the "Fiscus" movement was originated and is being carried on for.

You will recall that the existing Cuban-American reciprocity arrangements began to take effect in 1903, and were to last for five years. The coming session of the United States Congress will be the long session, as it will begin the early part of December, 1907, and continue until May or June, 1908.

The Cuban-American reciprocity arrangement will be brought up for consideration at that time. It is hoped that history will have served to teach a lesson to the Cuban sugar planters.

In 1903 the Cubans petitioned for that which they were instructed to ask for by some one. Who that "some one" was need not be referred to here. The general petition was for a reduction of American import duty on sugars not lighter than 16 Dutch standard in color.

It was no fault of the Circulo de Hacendados, or the delegation that they sent to Washington, that the existing reciprocity arrangements do not specifically limit the existing (20 per cent) reduction to sugars not lighter than 16 Dutch standard in color.

What the Cuban sugar industry actually requires is a greater than 20 per cent reduction of American import duty, and the reduction must not be confined to any particular color of sugar.

As long as any reduction is operative only on sugars not lighter than 16 Dutch standard in color, or the reduction is not large enough to prompt and permit the Cuban producer to make white unrefined sugar, the advantages of any Cuban-American reciprocity are, to all intents and purposes, mythical and of no tangible benefits to the Cuban sugar producer. When the reduction of American import duty becomes 30 per cent or 40 per cent on all grades of unrefined sugar, then the Cubans will get every cent of the reduction. Under such conditions the American refiners will have to give the Cubans the same price as they would have to give for European beet sugar or American beet sugar laid down at the Atlantic seaboard where the refineries are located. Should the refiners attempt to absorb, as they do at present, the benefits of a 30 per cent or 40 per cent tariff concession, the Cuban planters will only have to purge hot after sulphuring the juice prior to defecation, and send the hot purged bleached sugars direct to any United States port for local consumption. They would then get the same prices that the American beet-sugar producers get for their current product, which is 10 cents per hundred pounds less than the local market price for ordinary refined sugar such as is not made up into "Cubes," "Cut-loaf," or "Domino-crystal."

The Cuban sugar planters did not know this five years ago, or, if they did, the parties they sent to Washington to represent them either did not know it or they failed to take advantage of it. That is a matter of historical record and does not admit of any denial; future circulars will enlarge on this subject.

It was indeed a cruel wrong to have the entire interests of the Cuban sugar planters in 1903 become bottled up in the hands of their enemies. That is what happened, and unless a great deal of care is taken it is liable to happen again; particularly if the Cuban planters are not careful as to in whose hands they intrust their cause next time. Powerful influences are already working to capture the Cuban planters' confidence, and have history repeat itself.

As the American refiners make no attempt to disguise the fact that the Cubans are not getting the 33 cents a hundred pounds, or any part thereof, the American beet-sugar producers' representatives in Washington have a strong argument for petitioning the United States Congress not to extend the Cuban-American reciprocity arrangement of 20 per cent. The Cubans must bear in mind that since they have been for the past five years delivering 1,000,000 tons annually at 33 cents per 100 pounds less than they should to the refiners, the American beet-sugar producers have had to sell their sugars just 33 cents less than if the Cubans got the 33 cents from the refiners. The beet people should not be blamed if they spare no effort to put a stop to such a condition of affairs adverse to their interests. It may be that at an early date an announcement will be made to the effect that the American Beet Sugar Association favors the present 20 per cent Cuban-American reduction. The reason why such an announcement may be made will be explained in a later "Fiscus" circular.

The "Fiscus" movement has for one of its purposes to keep the 20 per cent in force and to increase that 20 per cent. And the "Fiscus" adherents recognize no limit short of 99 per cent reduction as the proper thing to strive for. And furthermore, the management of the "Fiscus" movement does not intend to advocate any greater reduction than 20 per cent upon sugars not lighter than 16 Dutch standard only. That is what the former Cuban delegation did, and thus played directly into the hands of the American refiners.

The reduction which the management of the "Fiscus" movement will urge will be upon and for all grades of unrefined sugar coming from Cuba to the United States, whether consigned to the refiners or the consumers, and whether such sugars are raw, cooked, baked, roasted, fried, or broiled.

Cuba really needs this increased reduction of import duty into the United States, because after 1908 the United States Supreme Court can be counted upon to declare that Philippine sugars will be entitled to free entry into the United States. Cuba must either secure a timely heavy reduction of American import duty or be ready to accept the consequences. Annexation is a theme that the management of the "Fiscus" movement prefers to leave to some one else to handle and work upon. The Cuban politician has no objection to the sugar planters getting more money by paying less import duty into the United States Treasury, but the Cuban politicians require the Cuban flag.

What will the Cuban planter do if this coming long session of the United States Congress goes by, in 1907–8, and that 20 per cent is not made 75 per cent or at least 50 per cent?

Better think it over now.

The Cuban planters had better keep clear of anyone who proposes to urge a protectorate—because a protectorate is liable to delay the Cuban presidential election, and that may make for a shortage of Cuban crops. The hidden advocates of a protectorate are hoping that by delaying the elections in the spring of 1908 the Cuban planters will be too busy to petition the United States Congress for an increase of United States tariff reduction. Besides, if Cuba has no president, who is going to negotiate for a new Cuban-American treaty other than the provisional American governor? Therefore the Cuban planters should petition for themselves. The "Fiscus" movement has for its object the unification of the planters for that purpose and to advocate strictly as herein set forth.

It is unfortunate for the Cuban sugar industry in general that many leading interested individuals are secretly yet keenly desirous that annexation may take place. They desire annexation so earnestly that they sincerely believe that it is a feasible accomplishment without being able to indicate how it may be brought about. Those that entertain such ideas are inclined to be reluctant to occupy themselves with any movement which has for its purpose petitioning for greater Cuban-American tariff reductions. This in turn greatly weakens the cause of the Cuban sugar planters in general. Let such as believe that annexation is more feasible to bring about than an increase of Cuban-American tariff reduction begin a corresponding propaganda. Then there will be in the field three movements: (1) For greater Cuban-American tariff reduction; (2) one for a protectorate; and (3) one for annexation.

[Extract taken from treaty of peace, signed in Paris, between Spain and United States.]

The United States of America and Her Majesty the Queen Regent of Spain, in the name of her august son, Don Alfonso XIII, desiring to end the state of war now existing between the two countries, have for that purpose appointed as plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States—William R. Day, Cushman K. Davis, William P. Frye, George Gray, and Whitelaw Reid, citizens of the United States; and Her Majesty the Queen of Spain—

Don Eugenio Montero Rios, President of the Senate; Don Buenaventura de Abarzursa, Don Jose Garnica, Don Wenceslao Ramirez de Villa Urrutia, and Don Rafael Cerero;

Who, having assembled in Paris, and having exchanged their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper forms, have, after discussions of the matters before them, agreed on the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

Spain relinquishes all claim of sovereignty over and title to Cuba.

And as the island is, upon its evacuation by Spain, to be occupied by the United States, the United States will, so long as such occupation shall last, assume and discharge the obligations that may, under international law, result from the fact of its occupation for the protection of life and property.

ARTICLE II.

Spain cedes to the United States the island of Porto Rico and other islands now under Spanish sovereignty in the West Indies, and the island of Guam in the Marianas or Ladrones.

ARTICLE III.

Spain cedes to the United States the archipelago known as the Philippine Islands, and comprehending the islands lying within the following lines:

* * * * * * *

The United States to pay $20,000,000 within three months of evacuation of Philippines.

* * * * * * *

ARTICLE VIII.

In conformity with the provisions of Articles I, II, and III, Spain relinquishes in Cuba, and cedes in Porto Rico and other islands in the West Indies, in the island of Guam, and in the Philippines Archipelago, all the buildings, wharves, barracks, forts, structures, public highways, and other immovable property which, in conformity with law, belongs to the public domain, and as such belongs to the Crown of Spain.

* * * * * * *

ARTICLE XVI.

It is understood that any obligations assumed in this treaty by the United States with respect to Cuba are limited to the time of its occupancy thereof; but it will, upon the termination of such occupancy, advise any government established in the island to assume the same obligations.

As a tropical cane-sugar planter of some 22 years' experience I have repeatedly seen fire devastate my fields; succored the sick; helped the outlaw; interposed at quarrels between my laborers; known mechanical breakdowns; been once incarcerated amongst the lowest of criminals; stood over a battery of boilers blowing off the fires freshly charged with wood, and known that somebody had opened the cock and run off the boiler feed-water supply; suffered polite exile; experienced the ill favor of the leading authorities of three Governments for urging the cause of the industries of the Antilles; had the tubes of three locomotives burnt in one night in the crop; seen crowbars pass through my mills; paid exactions not creditable to the high functionaries who imposed them; experienced financial difficulties with refracciosistas; had prolonged legal entanglements with colonos breaking contracts; plead before a United States Congressional committee to apply local taxes to Cuba as referred to. Had some experience as the sole manager of the Cuban-American reciprocity bureau in Washington in 1902 and 1903. Under the circumstances I believe I have some claim to be rated as a sugar planter and confèrer of the Cuban sugar producers, and hope I may enjoy their confidence in the future as I have in the past.—(Fiscus No. 1. New York, Dec. 1, 1907.)

Mr. SMOOT. I am informed that Mr. Bass inherited from his father a sugar estate on the south side of the island of Santo Domingo. The estate consisted of some 16,000 acres of land and was equipped with a sugar mill, the whole being known as the "Consuelo estate." He has been associated in some local revolutions to such an extent that he was compelled to flee the island.

During the Cuban reciprocity contest in 1902–3, Mr. Bass maintained headquarters at the Fairfax Hotel in Washington for the purpose of urging the elimination of the No. 16 Dutch standard of color restriction from the Cuban reciprocity treaty, his theory being that whatever treaty might be negotiated with Cuba would perhaps be duplicated at a later date with Santo Domingo.

In 1907 Mr. Bass opened up what was known as the Cuban-American reciprocity bureau, with headquarters in the Star Building. He issued a great deal of literature, but it was next to impossible to determine just what he expected to accomplish for himself. He circularizes the planters of Cuba soliciting subscriptions for carrying on his propaganda, and in one of these circulars stated that in the 15 months' contest in 1902–3 he had spent $50,000 of his own money.

In another circular, issued at about the same time and sent to the same people, he stated that the purpose of securing the elimination of the "16 Dutch standard" of color was to enable the Cuban planters to find a direct market for their sulphured, hot purged, bleached sugars.

Mr. President, I have little more to say upon this subject at this time, but I do hope that, until the pure-food law has been amended so as to require sugars sold in the United States to be marked as to the quantity of saccharine they contain, we will not allow the 16 Dutch standard to be eliminated from our sugar schedule. I know what it means, Mr. President, to the sugar producers of this country; and you might just as well, if you intend to eliminate it, tell the sugar producer that there is to be a reduction of duty upon his product.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if he is quite sure that the present pure-food law does not cover the case?

Mr. SMOOT. I have asked a number of parties at the Treasury Department, and I am told that it does not.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Treasury Department would not determine that question. That is for the court to determine under the pure-food law.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I will say the courts have never yet determined it.

Mr. HEYBURN. No. I think perhaps the statement I have heard made several times is true, that it is because no test has been made of that question in the courts. It is quite certain that the language of the pure-food law could reasonably be interpreted so as to cover it. In other words, packages of sugar, in whatever form, that were denominated as pure sugar, which in fact were not, would clearly come within the pure-food law.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Would that be true if the sugars were not deleterious?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; because it is a case of misbranding. You see the pure-food law is dual in character.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] requested that he be not interrupted any more than was necessary during his address, and so I deferred asking a number of questions that I otherwise would have asked until he concluded, and to make some corrections of statements, from my point of view, that I desired to make.

The Senator from Utah stated that the Dutch standard protected the public from impure sugars, and the trend of his argument was——

Mr. SMOOT. Not impure sugars. I said sugars that were not 100 per cent saccharine—that is, sugars that were white, but would test by the polariscope only 94, 95, or 96 per cent instead of 100 per cent.

Mr. BRISTOW. Of course what is meant, as I understand it, by impure sugar is a sugar that does not test a hundred—a sugar that has in it some foreign substance, molasses or moisture of some kind. A pure sugar, a 100 per cent sugar, is absolutely pure. It has no foreign substance in it, as I understand.

The Senator claims that light-colored sugar might have 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, or 8 degrees of foreign substance. It might be simply the molasses or the moisture; still it is not pure sugar, because it has water in it and it has molasses in it.

The difference between the saccharine substance in the molasses and in the sugar is that the sugar crystallizes and the molasses does not. It is not an impurity in the sense that it would be unwholesome, but it is an impurity in the sense that it is not the crystallization, or it is not sugar. It is another substance.

The Senator's desire is to protect the American consumer from this impure sugar that would be imported into the United States. But the Dutch standard does not protect the American consumer from the impure sugars that might be put upon the market by the producers of Porto Rico, Hawaii, the Philippines, up to 300,000 tons from there, or by the Louisiana producers.

If it is possible to bleach a sugar white by a cheap process and put it on the market, does the Senator think that the manufacturers who produce, as he says, over a million tons of cane sugar every year within the boundaries of the United States territory would not be utilizing such a method?

Mr. SMOOT. I stated before, I think, to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] once or twice that I do not believe they would, for the reason that they have not done so in the past.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator also stated that there had been a large quantity of impure sugar imported from Scotland, to the detriment of American producers. Will the Senator please specify when and the amount?

Mr. SMOOT. Before the Dutch standard was put into our law. I have not the amount here, but if the Senator wants to find out I suppose there is plenty of history on the subject.

Mr. BRISTOW. There is a great deal of sugar literature. I should like to have the Senator cite an instance, giving the amounts and the dates, when Scottish importers imported here large quantities of white sugar that was impure to the detriment of American producers.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the figures with me, but I have no doubt I can secure from the records of the Treasury Department when it was.

Mr. BRISTOW. I would be glad if the Senator would do so at some future time.

The Senator referred to the duties levied by foreign countries that do not use the Dutch standard, and stated that they were exporters of sugar, and therefore the Dutch standard would have been of no use to them; that they did not import sugar, and it was, therefore, of no consequence whether the light-brown sugars were imported into that country or not.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I stated that the rates of duty imposed upon sugar by foreign countries—the ones I named, the great civilized countries of this world—that do not have the Dutch standard, are so high that they are absolutely prohibitive. Therefore it is not right for the Senator to say that I think they imported sugar under a prohibitive rate. Germany imposes a duty of over $6 a hundred on imported sugar. And then there are the other countries to which I called attention. There is no need of the Dutch standard or any test other than the polariscopic test if a duty is imposed of $6 a hundred.

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, I should think if they paid $6 a hundred there would be no use for the polariscopic test.

But I did not misunderstand the Senator. He has simply repeated what he said in his address. But he does not refer to England.

Mr. SMOOT. But I did refer to England.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator referred to England, but not in the argument that he was then making.

Mr. SMOOT. Absolutely. I delivered my argument, leaving England out for later mention, but called particular attention to the fact that England is the only great country that does not have a prohibitive duty, as her duty is only 39.6 cents per hundred pounds.

Mr. BRISTOW. True.

Mr. SMOOT. And then I went on and stated what the result of the elimination of the Dutch standard was to the refineries of England——

Mr. BRISTOW. True.

Mr. SMOOT. And made it a part of my argument.

Mr. BRISTOW. True; but England, which imports sugars, has not found it necessary, in order to protect her people, to use the Dutch standard.

Mr. SMOOT. No; because she is not a producer of beet sugar or cane sugar. She does not produce a pound.

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly not.

Mr. SMOOT. To protect the American sugar producer is why we want the Dutch standard.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will give me time, I will make myself plain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the attention of Senators to the fact that in these unlimited interruptions without addressing the Chair they are violating the rule which was invoked the other day. The Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will suggest to the Senator from Utah that while a Dutch-standard provision would not be necessary in Germany to protect the German people from the importations of impure sugar, because Germany does not import sugar for consumption, but exports sugar to other countries, England does import sugar for consumption; and if the Senator's argument was good England ought to have a color test to protect her sugar consumers. But she does not. She abandoned the color test, which she formerly had, when the polariscopic test was invented. Although she is the second largest consumer of sugar among the nations of the earth, she does not find it necessary to have any color test to protect her people from imposition because of the importations of impure sugars that are of a light color.

There is not a nation upon the earth, with the exception of China, which uses a color test that does not use a graduation of that test in fixing the duty, raising it as the sugar becomes purer or lighter. That is, the duty in Japan on sugar testing 16 is not as much as upon sugar testing 22.

In Canada 16 is the standard of color, but the polariscopic test is used in fixing the duties, as the purity of the sugar advances above 88 when it is above 16 in color. I will illustrate: Sugar can be imported into Canada testing 88 in purity and 16 in color for $1.08—the general tariff duty. If it tests more than 88 in purity—90, for instance—there is a cent and a half added for each degree; so that the duty on 90 sugar above 16 instead of being 1.08 would be 1.11, while if Canada used the same system we do in the United States, the duty instead of being 1.11 would be 1.26—the maximum rate the same as if it was 100 per cent pure.

China fixes the standard at No. 10, a black sugar, because her people largely use that kind. But there is not another country that uses the color test which follows the system of charging the maximum duty for all light sugars regardless of their saccharine purity except the United States.

As I said the other day, and I want to say it again with all the emphasis I can command, this Dutch standard is not intended to protect the American people from impure sugar, but to protect the sugar refiners from competition in the purchase of raw sugar by keeping it so dark that it can not find any other purchaser except the refiner, unless it pays the full duty—the full protection which the refiner has for the refined sugar he puts on the market. That is, a light-brown sugar that would be used by the American people in their homes can not be imported unless it pays the full duty on refined sugar, while other countries permit it to come in and determine the duty by the polariscope test—the accurate test as to its purity. Canada uses both a double standard after it reaches No. 16 in color, while we use but one, the color test, and abandon the polariscope when it reaches 16.

I am sorry that the Senator from Utah is not more frank in this discussion, because I had hoped he was interested in the protection of the beet-sugar industry, and he knows that the only competitor the beet sugar has is the American refiner who refines tropical sugars—cane sugars from the Tropics.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It may be interesting to the Senator from Kansas to know, if he does not already know it, that the State of Michigan, which I in part represent, is now the first in the production of beet sugar in the United States. The production of beet sugar in the State of Michigan retains among our people $20,000,000 every year. It is a very important industry. They take these sugar beets in at one end of the factory and turn them out at the other as refined sugar in competition with the great refineries of cane sugar; and anything that is calculated to discourage the development and growth of that industry or to imperil its permanency as a part of our American policy ought to be opposed by every patriotic American.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I wanted to ask the Senator from Michigan a question, as doubtless he has given a good deal of attention to it, his State being a large producer of beet sugar. What effect would the abolishing of the Dutch standard have upon the beet-sugar industry?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think one effect would be to give the great refiners of sugar cheaper sugar than they get now.

Mr. BRISTOW. May I ask the Senator from Michigan how it would help the refiner to get cheaper sugar?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have an impression upon my mind that they will bring these tropical sugars to a higher state than they do now, but having them brought to that high state they will still be obliged to put them through the refinery in order to compete with the beet sugar that is being produced in the United States. As such I think the refiner would be the gainer.

Now, anything which will tend to discourage or thwart the further development of the beet-sugar industry of the United States would be a calamity. Everybody must admit that who is at all familiar with that industry, and I do not wish to see any experiments made with that industry which may be detrimental.

I opposed Cuban reciprocity years ago as a Member of the House of Representatives, because I felt we were paving the way for the ultimate annihilation of our domestic sugar industry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to the fact that the Senator from Kansas has the floor and that the Senator from Michigan is only entitled to the floor for the purpose of asking questions.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I think I have finished my question.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I wanted to ask the Senator from Michigan a question, but I suppose I can not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am very sorry.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Michigan is entirely in error when he thinks that the abolition of the Dutch standard would give the refiners a cheaper raw sugar, for the reason that the refiners would be compelled to pay much more for a high-grade light centrifugal sugar than they pay for a sugar 16 in color and 96 in purity. It would increase the price which the refiners would have to pay for high-grade raw sugars, because the sugar would be of a purer and better quality, and they would have to pay more for it.

The refiners would not buy that sugar because they could not pay the price and melt it over again and make a profit by refining it. It is too good to put through the process of refining because the expense of refining would be added to the price, and they would not buy it for that purpose. They do not buy it. But that light-brown, wholesome sugar would find a market to the American public at a price less than refined and at a price more than the refiner for the raw sugar pays, so that the sugars which the American people formerly used, which are the light-brown sugars known to commerce, would find a market with the public because they would be of that purity of color as well as saccharine strength that would make them useful and desirable.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Kansas is evidently laboring under the impression that the American people desire a white unrefined sugar. Am I correct about that?

Mr. BRISTOW. They may and they may not. If they desire it, I think they ought to have an opportunity to buy it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They can buy it, and every pound that is produced in Louisiana is free from tariff and is as brown or as golden brown or as light as the best sugars that are made, and about as pure.

Mr. BRISTOW. I want to say to the Senator, in reply, that a great deal of the Louisiana sugar of this pure quality finds a market to the American public, but all that is produced in Louisiana, about 250,000 tons last year, is a very small quantity as compared with what the American people use, they having consumed last year 3,350,000 tons, in round numbers.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The thing I am seeking to avoid, if the Senator will indulge me, is the further exploitation of the sugar industry of Cuba particularly. Cuba has a productive sugar capacity of 5,000,000 tons, more than twice the ability of the United States to consume, and if we make it easy for the American people to get sugar from Cuba, refined or unrefined, we will annihilate the domestic sugar industry and turn the millions of American acres that are now under beet cultivation over to other products of the soil, of which we already have a surplus.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator from Michigan will just give me an opportunity, I will save him a great deal of trouble.

The Senator knows that the maximum duty which the Cuban sugar pays is $1.46, does he not—20 per cent less than the general tariff on sugar?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They have a preferential.

Mr. BRISTOW. A preferential, which reduces the duty on pure sugar, 100 per cent sugar, from $1.82½, the rate which countries that do not have the preferential pay, to $1.46. Therefore the only protection that the Michigan beet-sugar factories now have, as against Cuba, is $1.46, for that is the maximum duty that the Cuban raw sugar pays.

Does the Senator think that reducing the duty on refined sugar from $1.90 to $1.75, which I propose, would therefore open the American market to Cuban sugar any more than it is at the present?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. When this slight preferential was given to the Cuban sugar producer I argued in the House of Representatives that it would not lessen the cost of sugar to the consumer; that the owners of the sugar crop in Cuba, largely American citizens, would get the benefit, and that the benefit would neither go to those who labored in the Cuban sugar fields nor to the consumer of sugar in America.

Now, then, what was its effect? Slight as it was, it arrested the development of the sugar industry of America. Slight as it was, it drove the individual citizen who had put his money into the sugar industry of our country out of the business. Slight as it was, it drove factory after factory in my own State into the hands of the Sugar Trust, and if we still have an American sugar industry, and if the State I represent has a sugar industry of gigantic proportions, worth this year to the people of our State more than $20,000,000, it is due to the remaining confidence, not altogether destroyed, but threatened and partially destroyed by the preferential extended to Cuba a few years ago, which I stoutly resisted, because I do not believe it to be wise governmental policy to have our people dependent upon any foreign State for any great article of necessity.

Mr. BRISTOW. In reply I will say that the Senator from Michigan is mistaken when he says that the Cuban reciprocity agreement seriously retarded the development of the beet-sugar industry.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I know personally of scores of people who sold their holdings.

Mr. BRISTOW. It may be true that in the State of Michigan, where there is less profit in the production of the sugar than in any other State in the United States, so I am advised, and where there is a large production of beet sugar, the reduction of the protective duty from $1.82½ on Cuban sugar to $1.46 had some detrimental effect on the Michigan factories, because they are closer to the Atlantic seaboard and come more nearly in contact, more nearly in direct competition, with the cane sugars from Cuba. Michigan would have suffered more than the States farther west, as the freight rate is more to the advantage of the western refiner than it is to the Michigan refiner.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think the Senator is right about that.

Mr. BRISTOW. But I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that this Cuban treaty, which I do not defend——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator——

Mr. BRISTOW. Just wait a moment until I get through, and I will be glad to answer any question the Senator may ask.

The Cuban treaty, which I do not defend, did not retard the development of beet sugar materially, because in 1900 there were produced in the United States 81,000 tons of beet sugar; in 1901, 86,000 tons; in 1902, 184,000 tons; in 1903, the year that the Cuban treaty was agreed to, 218,000 tons; in 1904, 240,000 tons; in 1905, 242,000 tons; in 1906, 312,000 tons, an increase every year.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator is correct. I will call his attention to the fact that the second year following the ratification of that preferential with Cuba the relative increase in production fell off very materially.

But I come to the question I wanted to ask the Senator, for I have the highest respect for my honored friend from Kansas, and I believe he is animated by the purest motives in the course he is taking in this matter. I compliment him upon the degree of thoroughness he has manifested. I desire to ask the Senator from Kansas the straight, plain question, whether he believes that the preferential extended to Cuba was intended to be in the interest of our domestic sugar production or not.

Mr. BRISTOW. Not by the organization that promoted it? I think a great many men supported the Cuban reciprocity treaty who were absolutely honest and thought it would be the best thing for the American people to have that treaty entered into, but as far as the sugar duty is concerned it amounted to taking from the United States Treasury $10,000,000 of revenue and turning it over to the American sugar refiners. That is what it did.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is entirely mistaken when he undertakes to prove that the Cuban planter received material advantage as a result of that treaty. He did not. He is mistaken when he says that the American consumer received any material advantage from the treaty. He did not. The truth is that refined sugar—granulated sugar—was reduced in price in the United States about 1.7 cents per hundred pounds as a result of the Cuban treaty. That was the average reduction in the five years following the treaty as compared with the five years preceding the treaty. This result was obtained by comparing the Hamburg and New York price, as set forth in detail when I addressed the Senate last week.

The sugar refiners themselves do not claim that the sugar planter of Cuba received any more money for his sugar than he did before. Since the Senator from Utah undertook to prove that he did, I want to read from the testimony given by Mr. Gilmore, of the Arbuckle's Refining Co., directly upon this point in a hearing before the House committee recently.

The chairman of the committee asked:

What effect, if any, did it have on the market price of raw sugar at New York?

Referring to the Cuban treaty.

Mr. GILMORE. Well, we had cheaper raw sugar from Cuba.

Mr. Gilmore is a refiner.

The CHAIRMAN. Cheaper by the amount of the reduction in duty?

Mr. GILMORE. Well, I do not know that it was that amount fully, and yet I think it was, too.

The CHAIRMAN. You think it was?

Mr. GILMORE. I do; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. That concession was 34.5 cents, was it not?

Mr. GILMORE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you think it reduced the price of raw sugar that much in New York?

Mr. GILMORE. I believe it did. We commonly believed that the Cubans had not benefited at all, because they had given away the benefit.

This is a purchaser of sugar himself, representing the Arbuckle's refinery.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom did they give it?

Mr. GILMORE. To the refiners.

This ought to be pretty good testimony. To whom did the Cuban planters give it? Mr. Gilmore's answer was:

To the refiners; and the refiners, of course, gave it to the public.

But the statistics show that the refiners did not give it to the public, for while they got a reduction of 34½ cents per hundred in the duty, it reduced the price of their product only 1.7 cents a hundred to the American public.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the consumer of refined sugar in the United States get the benefit of that concession, in your judgment?

Mr. GILMORE. I believe he did get the full benefit of it.

The statistics show that he got but 1.7 cents a hundred covering a period of five years.

That is the testimony of Mr. Gilmore, of the Arbuckle Refining Co.

Now, I refer to the testimony of Mr. Atkins, of the Sugar Trust, or the American Sugar Refining Co., the largest purchaser of raw sugars in the world.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And I suppose the largest owner of Cuban sugar land.

Mr. BRISTOW. That may be.

Mr. ATKINS. You asked me another question that I wanted to explain a little further. That was, what advantage the Cuban has out of this—

That is, the reciprocity treaty—

if he makes no dollars and cents out of it. He has the advantage of the United States market against all the world. He can undersell every country in the world in the United States market to the extent of that differential. Porto Rico or any of the free sugars that come in can undersell Cuba to the extent of $1.34 and still get the same money for the sugar that Cuba gets. Now, that is the very greatest advantage—for Cuba to be able to have the control of the United States market.

To-day—and when I say "to-day" I mean at this period—the foreign imports from all other parts of the world have practically disappeared. The rate of duty under the Dingley Act of $1.68½ is a dead letter, and $1.34 is the revenue rate of duty on sugars, because Cuban sugars supply nearly all the demand for foreign imports.

So the protection to-day which the American beet-sugar producer has is not 1.82½ on 100 per cent sugar, but 1.46, the Cuban duty, and, in my judgment, you can reduce the duty on refined sugar to 1.46 without injuring the American beet-sugar industry.

I am just as much interested in preserving that great industry and aiding its development as the Senator from Michigan is. In the amendment I have offered I do not propose to reduce it as much as I think it could be reduced, but I want to reduce it somewhat and leave to the future the other reductions which in time should come.

I invite the attention of the Senator from Michigan to this fact: I do not in the amendment reduce the duty on raw sugar beginning at 95 degrees of purity and running up the scale, because if I did the Cuban differential would apply to such a reduction, but I begin at the top of the scale. You can grade down from the top of the scale to 1.46 before the Cuban gets any advantage of the reduction. The controversy which will come in time before this legislation is perfected, in my judgment, will be for a reduction of all raw sugars, beginning at 75 degrees and scaling up, because that is what the sugar refiners want; they want the Cuban differential to apply to every reduction that is made, and instead of having the opposition of the beet-sugar factories against the amendment that I have offered I should have their support, for it is in their interest and against the refiners who exploited them as a result of the Cuban treaty.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. PERKINS. I will say to the Senator from Kansas that the beet-sugar producers want an opportunity of being heard before the Committee on Finance in relation to the duty on sugar.

We have in California 12 sugar factories. In 1887 they produced 3,700,000 pounds; in 1910 they produced 265,000,000 pounds of sugar. Challenging the claim made by my friend the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], I think that is more beet sugar than Michigan produced. In other words, taking the last census of California, with a population of 2,277,000, we produced 116.03 pounds of sugar per capita. We are thriving under the present law, and we do not want to see it changed until this great industry has an opportunity to present its claims before the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator allow me simply to suggest to the Senator from California that if the beet-sugar farmers of California do not get any greater consideration after their hearing before Congress than the cereal raisers got on their hearing, they might as well stay at home, and we might as well settle the matter without them.

Mr. PERKINS. In the pioneer days of California we used to hang people sometimes for stealing horses, but we always gave them an opportunity of being heard. These people do not want to be executed until they have had an opportunity of presenting their case. Certainly, for weeks and months, I think, our friends in the Northwest, from the Dakotas and elsewhere, had an opportunity to present their claims, and two-thirds of the Senate thought they were in error and voted for the reciprocal trade agreement with Canada.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator from Kansas will allow me again, the farmers proved their absolute innocence in the matter, but notwithstanding there was no evidence against them, they were convicted.

Mr. PERKINS. They may hope for Executive clemency hereafter.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, in response to the suggestion of the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], I desire to say that in the last two months I had a number of interviews with gentlemen interested in the beet-sugar production, and not a single one has said to me that he believed this amendment would injure the beet-sugar producer, but he always qualified it with the statement that he did not know what position he would have to take when the legislation was before Congress. It is well known that the opponents of reduction in the sugar duty two years ago appealed to the Senate on the ground that it would injure the beet-sugar producers, and it was alleged then that the Sugar Trust had gotten its hand in on the beet-sugar business, and that the beet-sugar men were responding to a demand made by the powerful Sugar Trust. That was denied on this floor time and again, but it has been admitted since by Mr. Warren, from the Senator's own State, that the Sugar Trust owned an interest in the Michigan Beet Sugar Co.'s plant at the time, and that his action was in response to the Sugar Trust's demand. It has been admitted before the same committee that Mr. Havemeyer controlled a half interest in the sugar factories of Utah, which his estate does to-day, and a contract was entered into and discussed before the committee that of every beet-sugar factory which should be established in the future in Utah, Mr. Havemeyer should have the opportunity of acquiring one-half control.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I suppose I am within my right in making a correction?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that he is wrong. Mr. Havemeyer, or the Sugar Trust, owns a half interest in the Utah-Idaho Sugar Co., and as the company has increased its plant he has taken his regular pro rata of stock. But there is the Lewiston Sugar Co. that Mr. Havemeyer has no controlling interest in. We have the sugar plant at Ogden—Mr. David Eccles is its president—that is not controlled by the Sugar Trust. But in the Utah-Idaho Sugar Co. Mr. Havemeyer did own a controlling interest.

Mr. BRISTOW. And the Utah-Idaho Co. is the large sugar-producing company in Utah and Idaho, is it not? It produces very much more in its various plants than all the rest of the companies do?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. Eccles controls two plants in Utah, one at Ogden and one at Logan. The Lewiston plant is in Cache County, controlled also by Mr. Eccles. I believe most of the sugar produced in Utah is produced by companies that Mr. Havemeyer does not control.

Mr. BRISTOW. But the Senator, I think, is aware of the fact that the larger part of the sugar produced in Idaho and Utah is produced by the company in which the Havemeyers have a half interest.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply rose for the purpose of making a correction. The Senator made a statement that was not correct, and I thought he would like to have me correct it.

I will say further that as far as the sugar plants of Idaho are concerned, I know that a majority of them in Idaho are controlled by Mr. Havemeyer's company but the majority of the factories in the State of Utah are not.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. Of course, I am very glad to have the correction. The statement I made may have been too broad when I said all. I had in mind the Utah-Idaho Co. which is the large and dominating company in that region.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Kansas has given this question great study. I want to say that for once the Senator from Kansas and I are in agreement, I think. But I wanted to ask him to what extent, in his opinion, after his investigation, the market of these sugar-producing States is controlled by those factories which are dominated by the Havemeyer interests, or what we commonly call the Sugar Trust? I mean the market for the raw material.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think that in the States of Michigan and Utah and Idaho what we might term the Havemeyer interests largely dominate the business, and I think that the sugar refiners that cooperate—I believe, possibly, the Federal Refinery is not one of them; I am not clear as to that—dominate the sugar market of the United States very largely.

Mr. REED. You mean for the raw material, the beets that are bought?

Mr. BRISTOW. No; not for the raw material, but the finished material, the refined product.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator did not apprehend my question.

Mr. BRISTOW. As to the raw material, each factory has its own supply. When a beet-sugar factory is established, it must have contracts or guaranties that a certain amount of beets will be produced, in order to keep the factory going. They make long-time contracts; and usually the companies buy lands and have a certain amount of their own production, supplemented by purchases they make from farmers.

Mr. REED. Then I understand——

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not think any company can be said to dominate the market for beets except in its immediate vicinity, because the transportation of the beets any great distance would be impracticable; the cost would be so great.

Mr. REED. I may be unfortunate in the way I am trying to ask the questions. I want to get the Senator's idea as to the extent the Havemeyer interests are able to control the markets in this country for the raw material used in the refineries, and particularly sugar beets.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not think the Havemeyers could control the price of sugar beets.

Mr. REED. If their factory is the only place to sell, if they are the only buyers or dominate the market, would not the man who had to sell have to sell to them?

Mr. BRISTOW. Of course that is true; but the difficulty that the sugar-beet factories have had is to get farmers to produce the beets.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. They have to raise the price as high as they can in order to induce the production. Of course, the control of the market for the beet itself depends absolutely upon the factory in the community where the beet is raised. But there is a standard price fixed in each community, and that varies somewhat, dependent upon the saccharine strength of the beets.

Mr. REED. But——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRISTOW. As soon as I make clear, if I can, my answer to the Senator from Missouri. I will add that the price of sugar beets, the raw material of a sugar-beet factory, can not be handled as the raw material of a sugar refinery, the raw cane sugar, because that is put on the sea and can be delivered anywhere at a small freight rate as compared to its value. But there is so much waste in beets, it being about 85 per cent, that the beets can not be shipped a great distance to a beet-sugar factory without very great expense.

Mr. REED. I do not want to interrupt the Senator and take his time, but if I can clear this up it will at least be of service to myself.

As I understand the situation outlined by the Senator from Kansas in this speech and in a former speech it amounts to this, that the sugar refineries of this country which produce the great bulk of the refined sugar sold in the United States are controlled by what we call the Sugar Trust, and in the opinion of the Senator they control the price largely of the raw sugar which is shipped here from abroad. I understand the Senator to say, in addition to that, that in the three great beet-sugar producing States these same interests control the factories that manufacture sugar from the beets which the farmer must sell, and that they themselves promote beet-sugar production and make long contracts with the raiser of beets.

If I am correct in that, I want to follow it with the further question whether, as a matter of fact, then, the farmer, the agriculturist, is not completely at their mercy, and why it is that a tariff of a protective nature, after all, does not inure to the benefit of these factories or, rather, of the Sugar Trust. I should like to know how we get a benefit from it.

Mr. BRISTOW. In answer to the Senator, I will state that the farmer who raises sugar beets has had no difficulty in selling his beets. The difficulty has been on the side of the beet-sugar factory to induce him to raise a sufficient number of beets. The truth is the beet-sugar industry has been established in States, with the exception of Michigan, that are more or less sparsely settled, and the labor problem has been a very grave one.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to suggest that it is the sugar factory that is at the mercy of the farmer. We had one very large factory that stood practically still for a year because the farmers would not raise beets for them, and they were too far from any field of production to ship them. The farmer does not plant beets until he knows he has a market and knows how much he is going to get for them. The mill, that represents a very large investment, is of necessity absolutely at the mercy of the farmers, and the farmers dictate the conditions upon which the mill shall exist.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is an element of human nature that every man who has anything to sell wants to sell it for as much as he can get. There is no exception to the rule in any vocation of life. Under that rule, in my judgment, the beet-sugar factory has had difficulty in many places in securing enough beets to permit it to run at a profit, which must be what they call a full campaign—all the beets that they can get to run the mill at full capacity. The farmers in some places have combined to fix the price for a small area. They will get together and agree not to raise beets, except at a certain price. The sugar factory has to have the beets or it can not make any money, and it will have to go out of business and close up. So most of the factories now have purchased certain quantities of land so that they can raise a certain quantity of beets to help out. When this controversy comes up it is usually settled by a system of arbitration. Then the company contracts with farmers for a certain figure. If the population is dense and large numbers of people are seeking employment on farms, the beets would be lower in price, because there is a larger surplus of labor and beets can be produced in larger quantities; that is, the market will be glutted.

But, as it is now, the factory has developed beyond the producing capacity in many places, and it has offered all the inducement it can afford to get farmers to raise beets in order to keep the factory going. That is an economic fact which exists in the best beet-producing parts of our country, in Colorado and Utah, and through all the irrigated regions.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not believe the Senator from Missouri understands yet that the sugar refiners have nothing to do with the handling of the product of the beet the same as they do the product of the cane. Beet sugar is made in the factory. The refiners do not touch it. Cane sugar is refined to a certain degree by the centrifugal process and is then sold to the American Refining Co. or the other refining companies of the country and refined. But that is not the case with beet sugar. Sugar from beets is made by one process.

Mr. WARREN. Fully refined?

Mr. SMOOT. Fully refined sugar.

Mr. REED. With the consent of the Senator from Kansas——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield further to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I have not misunderstood that fact. I am not a manufacturer myself. I am not here trying to protect any of my stock in manufactures or any of my private interests. I belong to no associations, ecclesiastical or otherwise, that are interested in the manufacturing business. But what I am trying to get at is this: I understand that one Havemeyer and divers and sundry other gentlemen associated with him control the sugar refineries and fix, because they have practically the sole market, the price that is to be paid in this country for raw sugar shipped from abroad. I understand those same gentlemen have established beet-sugar mills in certain States and that they own a controlling interest in those mills, and that in addition to that they are now buying or leasing large tracts of land, so as to be independent of the farmers.

If that is true, Mr. President, then the only reason which can be assigned for maintaining a tariff on sugar for the purpose of protecting the beet-sugar industry is that we shall protect this Sugar Trust against its own local institutions.

One thing further, and I thank the Senator for yielding this far. If the sugar mills, as distinguished from the refineries, can not get enough beets to run their mills, then it follows as the day follows the night that there is one of two reasons for it; first, being in absolute control of the market, there being no other place to sell beets, they fix the price; second, they fix that price so low that farmers prefer to do nothing or to raise some other crop which is more profitable, because, to conclude what I was going to say, as the Senator says, we are all selfish, and there is not a man on earth who will not raise beets on his farm if he can make more money raising the beets at the price he is offered than he can make raising corn or potatoes or something else.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator does not fully appreciate the situation, in my judgment. First, the Sugar Trust does not control the beet-sugar business. It simply controls it in two or three States—in Michigan and Utah and Idaho.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment, I will then yield. But the truth is that these sugar factories have developed a region of our country that would have remained undeveloped. If the Senator from Missouri is especially interested in this subject and travels throughout the West, I think he would enjoy very much visiting some of the communities where beet-sugar factories have been located, because they have developed very thriving communities where a few years ago there was a desert.

They have added very largely to the wealth and the comfort of the people of those communities, because they are producing out of soil, barren heretofore, a very large amount of marketable product, namely, pure refined sugars. I think it is for the interest of our country that these developments should be encouraged. The Sugar Trust—the Havemeyer interests—did not establish any beet-sugar factories. Havemeyer was always hostile to the establishment and development of the beet-sugar business, because he was a refiner of cane sugar, and the beet-sugar factories produced a sugar that came in direct competition with his product; but when the beet-sugar companies developed and became competitors, then, through a very ingenious system, Havemeyer started out to acquire control of the industry that was established, and he acquired control, as I have stated, in a number of instances; but there are many factories which manufacture the larger part of the sugar production of the United States which are not controlled by the trust. This industry represents a very substantial and desirable development of the resources of our country. My contention is not for a reduction of the tariff which would injure that development, but for a reduction of the tariff that would take from the refiners of cane sugar the advantage which they now have over the domestic producers of beet sugar, and that advantage which they have heretofore had was greatly increased when the reduction was made on Cuban sugar, from which the American consumer received practically no corresponding benefit.

Now, I will yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, for the information of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], I will suggest that, according to the testimony of Atkins and Thomas—and they are members of the Sugar Trust—15 per cent of the refined sugar consumed in the United States is beet sugar, of which the trust owns 3½ per cent.

Mr. REED. That does not agree with the statement of the Senator from Kansas, then.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. PERKINS. With the consent of the Senator from Kansas, bearing on this same subject matter of the beet-sugar industry of the country, with his permission, I ask to have read three telegrams.

Mr. BRISTOW. I have no objection.

Mr. PERKINS. They are samples of several hundred I have received. They indicate that it is the farmers, not the combination of corporate owners or the trusts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California desire to have the telegrams read?

Mr. BRISTOW. I should be glad to have them read after I have concluded, if that will satisfy the Senator from California just as well.

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly. They bear upon the same subject matter of which the Senator from Kansas has been speaking.

Mr. BRISTOW. They may be read after I have concluded. I do not desire to remain standing while the telegrams are being read.

I want to say, in regard to those telegrams, that I have some of them here. They are inspired not by the interests of the farmer and raiser of beets, because this amendment of mine will not affect him in the slightest degree, as he knows, if he is informed; but those telegrams are inspired by the men who control the sugar-refining business of the United States, or the Sugar Trust. The beet-sugar producer and the beet-sugar factory are afraid to meet in the open the hostility of this tremendous financial and industrial organization. The sugar market of the United States has been dominated by this powerful trust. It does not fix the price of the raw sugar which is imported; because that is a world price, a tremendous world production. The American sugar refiners go into the world's market and buy sugar for importation the same as do other refiners, but a duty of $1.90 on the refined product is entirely more than is needed. It gives an unnecessary protection, a protection far in excess of what they are entitled to. The reduction should be made, and the Dutch-standard provision should be taken out.

Right on that point I will answer the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who stated that if the American people wanted the light-brown sugars we used to have, they could get them from Louisiana.

I want to read the testimony taken before the House committee from a Louisiana planter. I would say that I would read the testimony taken two years ago, but I have been unable to find the exact part that I want, so I will read from this year's testimony. It is along the same line, and gives the percentage of the Louisiana production which is sold in the open market. The question is asked by Mr. MADISON, of the committee:

Mr. MADISON. Do you produce a good deal of this kind of sugar in Louisiana?

That is, sugar above 16 Dutch standard.

Mr. WILKINSON. Oh, yes. I went over that before. We produce probably one-third of the production of the State, sugar that is some a little better than that and some perhaps not quite so good, but sugar that goes into consumption.

Mr. MADISON. To whom do you sell this sugar?

Mr. WILKINSON. We sell that to the little towns all over the country. Some of that sugar I have known to be sold as high as Minnesota. One planter west of Baton Rouge told me that. I have known some to go up to Minnesota, to St. Paul, and into Mississippi and Georgia and Alabama and Missouri and Kentucky and Tennessee and Illinois.

Mr. MADISON. Do you have any idea what this sugar would test under the polariscope?

Mr. WILKINSON. I think about 99 or 98.5.

Mr. Colcock, I think it was, of Louisiana, testified two years ago before the Ways and Means Committee of the other House that they sold—if I remember rightly, for I am now speaking from memory—about 100,000 tons of the approximately 300,000 tons of production in the open market for consumption, but 100,000 tons is only about one thirty-third of the consumption of the United States. So it is insignificant.

Mr. HEYBURN. What do they call that sugar?

Mr. BRISTOW. That is centrifugal——

Mr. HEYBURN. C sugar?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not know what they call it now, but formerly it was C sugar. It is now known as centrifugal.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it not true that if the American people wanted this raw sugar at the polariscopic test stated by the Senator from Kansas they could get a million tons of it without any duty at all?

Mr. BRISTOW. Not at all. There are no million tons of sugar above 16 Dutch standard produced in this country that could be had.

Then I want to say in regard to that—the Senator from Utah referred to it—the Sugar Trust practically controls the refining in Louisiana. The American refiners control the production in Porto Rico and Hawaii very largely; they have a contract, as the Senators from Michigan and Utah both know, with the American Hawaiian Steamship Co., which brings the sugar from Hawaii to New York, taking the entire production of very large plantations there. This contract gives the sugar delivered to them in New York at a cent a hundred pounds, I think it is, below the market quotation for the day that it is delivered, the planters thereby receiving a direct and immediate market for their entire production and the trust getting that advantage over the market price because it furnishes that market. So, as a matter of fact, the trust practically controls the production of Hawaii, with the exception of some of the interests of Mr. C. A. Spreckels, I believe, which are quite large there, and he is a refiner who has no interest in the Sugar Trust. The planters have established a refinery, and it is quite a successful industry, too, I believe.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am glad of that.

Mr. BRISTOW. If we had more of them, we would not have this controversy with the trust that has exploited the sugar market of the United States.

Mr. PERKINS. The beet-sugar factories are also refineries, you might say.

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, it is a centrifugal process. I am contending, if the distinguished Senator from California will permit me, that every factory should have the opportunity to sell its product in the American market, without restriction, upon equal terms, for what it is worth, paying the duty that they ought to pay upon its saccharine purity, just as the sugar refiner does. The sugar refinery pays the duty on the saccharine strength of the sugar which it refines. But when the color is above the No. 16 Dutch standard the American consumer is not permitted to buy and pay a duty based on the saccharine strength, but he has to pay as much for a 96° sugar or a 92° sugar, if it is above 16 in color, as he would have to pay for a 100 per cent sugar.

The difference between 100 and 92 is molasses and water. Such a sugar is as good for family use as is the refined sugar. What I am contending for is against legislation that hampers the American market as a selling place for a pure, wholesome food. I can not understand how Senators here who are interested in the beet-sugar development can contend against the taking out of this law a provision that contributes to the benefit of their greatest competitors.

As I said the other day, the German beet-sugar producer is not a menace to the American beet-sugar producer at all. The beet-sugar man, if he talks with you privately, so that none of the emissaries of the trust will hear what he says, will tell you that.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Would it reduce the cost of the German or other imported sugar in this country to change the phraseology of the act?

Mr. BRISTOW. To change the phraseology would not reduce the cost of the refined sugar.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then the reduction would come from the difference in the figures proposed by the Senator's amendment and the existing law.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is exactly right. The reduction in the price of refined sugar would be measured by the reduction of the duty on refined sugar.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would not any change that would result in sugar coming into this country at a lower price affect the beet-sugar grower in the way of competition?

Mr. BRISTOW. I think not. That question has been previously asked me; and I will give the Senator from Idaho the reasons why I think it would not. I am now speaking of beet-sugar producers. The competitor of the beet-sugar producer and the beet-sugar factory is the American refiner. They both make refined or granulated sugar. The American refiner gets the raw material for his refinery from the Tropics; it is the raw cane sugar.

Mr. HEYBURN. It does not apply to beet sugar at all.

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, the American refiner refines the raw sugar and produces refined cane sugar, that sells in competition in the interior of the country with the product of the beet-sugar factory, which is refined beet sugar. The beet-sugar refiner must struggle in competition with the refiner of cane sugar. Anything that cheapens the cost to the refinery of its raw material gives the refinery an advantage in its competition with the beet-sugar producer. So the Cuban duty, when it was reduced 20 per cent, gave the American cane-sugar refiners a 20 per cent advantage over the beet-sugar producers.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield further to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. As I understand now, the Senator proposes to reduce the duty on other sugar than Cuban sugar. Would that not give an additional advantage to cane sugar as against beet sugar?

Mr. BRISTOW. No; I do not propose to reduce the duty on the raw sugar which the cane refinery would buy, because that comes from Cuba. One dollar and thirty-four and one-half cents for 96 sugar, or $1.46 on pure sugar, is the rate from Cuba. This amendment of mine does not touch that duty at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; because that is already below what might be called the average; that is, it is already below the price at which sugar from other countries than Cuba can come in by virtue of the preference to Cuban sugar.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is the protection which the beet-sugar producer has against the cane-sugar refiner of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it not true that that makes it more essential that the beet-sugar producer should not be exposed to other competition, being already exposed to the preferential duty from Cuba? Is it not piling the burden on him just one layer heavier?

Mr. BRISTOW. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that the reduction of the duty on refined sugar will not affect the beet-sugar factory, because its competitor is not the foreign refiner.

Mr. HEYBURN. Its competitor is Cuba.

Mr. BRISTOW. Its competitor is Cuba, through the American refiner.

Mr. HEYBURN. But the foreign refiner would be a competitor if you give the foreign refiner as good rates as has Cuba.

Mr. BRISTOW. But I do not want to do that, and I do not propose to do that.

Mr. HEYBURN. It approaches that.

Mr. BRISTOW. It does not approach it in any degree that would be dangerous.

Mr. HEYBURN. To the extent that the burden of the foreign refiner is lifted, he becomes more nearly a competitor.

Mr. BRISTOW. But, if the Senator will permit me, the German beet-sugar refiner, who is the largest exporter of beet sugar, can not possibly reach this market and seriously menace the American beet-sugar producer with a duty of $1.75.

Mr. HEYBURN. To what extent do they reach this market now?

Mr. BRISTOW. They do not reach it at all, practically.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, we have just Cuba as a competitor?

Mr. BRISTOW. Practically.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, how is this to meet the situation?

Mr. BRISTOW. I want to reduce the price of refined sugar to the American consumer.

Mr. HEYBURN. But until you get down to Cuba's basis how can it affect it? Cuba can produce all the sugar we use.

Mr. BRISTOW. But Cuban sugar goes to the refiner, and the refiner has a monopoly of the purchase because of the phraseology of the law; and light-colored sugars can not go direct to the people.

Mr. HEYBURN. I see that.

Mr. BRISTOW. The American refiner puts the refined sugar on the market, and he therefore prevents the American consumer from getting the advantage of the Cuban reduction of duty.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is this not rather a bill directed at the punishment of the refiners than one calculated either to hold at its present status or to reduce the cost of sugar to the American consumer? It strikes rather at the refiner, does it not?

Mr. BRISTOW. It reduces the protection of the refiner rather than that of the producer.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is really the purpose?

Mr. BRISTOW. It will also reduce the price to the consumer.

Mr. HEYBURN. We do not buy that sugar.

Mr. BRISTOW. We do buy sugar which the cane refiner produces, and he has got to reduce his price or he might have foreign competition.

Mr. HEYBURN. But why do we want to reduce the price of our own domestic cane product when we can not reduce the price of the Cuban sugar, because it is already so far below the average by reason of the preferential that it does not compete with the sugar of any other country?

Mr. BRISTOW. The American cane product is an insignificant quantity of sugar.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was trying to get at the purpose sought to be accomplished by the proposed reduction of the duty. I can readily realize that it might make it a little more difficult for the refiners to continue in business; but how would the American consumer benefit by it when he is not dependent upon the refiner's product? He is dependent, first, upon our own production of cane sugar in the sections where it is produced, and of beet sugar in other sections. On that market he draws so long as there is anything to draw against. Then he draws against the next cheapest market, the Cuban market; and, to such extent as is available, the Hawaiian and the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico; but he does not begin to draw at all against this production to which the Senator's amendment is directed. He does not need to draw against it. The only person that would be affected by the proposed amendment, as I understand, and if I am mistaken, of course I am seeking for light, is the refiner. He would be affected by it, and his burden would be made greater; but——

Mr. BRISTOW. His profit would be made less.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, but he can have no profits if we do not consume his product.

Mr. BRISTOW. We consume all of his product.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well the market consumes it, but——

Mr. BRISTOW. The American people consume it. He does not export much; he exports a little more than is imported, but very little more.

Mr. HEYBURN. We consume sugar from four parts of the world.

Mr. BRISTOW. But the American cane-sugar refiner furnishes us the larger part of the sugar we consume.

Mr. HEYBURN. The American cane producer?

Mr. BRISTOW. Not the American producer, but the cane-sugar refiner.

Mr. HEYBURN. He buys his raw material, or a very large quantity of it, of course, from our own possessions.

Mr. BRISTOW. He buys large quantities, but nothing like half of it—about one-third of it.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; he buys about one-third of what we consume.

Mr. BRISTOW. Less than a third.

Mr. HEYBURN. About one-third of the raw sugar that we consume comes from our own dependencies, and that comes in free of duty.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; it comes in free.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, about another third of it comes from our own production of cane and beet sugar in this country.

Mr. BRISTOW. Not a third; no.

Mr. HEYBURN. Very close to it.

Mr. BRISTOW. About one-fourth.

Mr. HEYBURN. Leaving about a third, or perhaps a little more, to come from Cuba. Now, from what other countries do we draw considerable quantities of sugar?

Mr. BRISTOW. I will give the Senator, if he will permit me, in round numbers, about the quantities. We consumed last year about 250,000 tons of our own cane production; we imported about 555,000 tons from Hawaii, 285,000 tons from Porto Rico, about 84,000 tons from the Philippines, 1,730,000 tons from Cuba, and about 213,000 tons from other countries. Cuba furnishes us about half, or a little more than half, of our consumption.

Mr. HEYBURN. Those figures show that outside of the Cuban production it is divided practically into thirds.

Mr. BRISTOW. No; not into thirds.

Mr. HEYBURN. But I have not been able to see this other stranger coming in with his cargo, the one to whom this duty would apply.

Mr. BRISTOW. He can not get in because the duty is so high that he can not pay it and sell in this market.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, do we want him in?

Mr. BRISTOW. No.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then why change the duty, or why spend out time over it?

Mr. BRISTOW. Because the American sugar refiners are charging more to the American people for the product of their refineries than they ought to charge; they have a monopoly, and I want to reduce the duty so that they will be threatened with competition from abroad when they charge an excessive price, which they can do because of the monopoly they have of the market.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it not a fact that this bill is directed against the refiners for the purpose of disciplining them?

Mr. BRISTOW. Not at all. I think many of them ought to be sent to the penitentiary, but this amendment is not for that purpose. It is for the purpose of giving the American people their sugar at less cost.

Mr. HEYBURN. But we do not want to sell it to them for less than we are selling it. We are large producers in our country, and we do not want to have to sell sugar for less than we are selling it, because if we should do so we would have to pay smaller wages.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not think so.

Mr. HEYBURN. And the farms would be less valuable.

Mr. BRISTOW. Of course, I disagree with the Senator altogether as to that. I think the duties can be reduced on refined sugar much more than I suggest without the slightest harm to the American sugar producer.

Mr. HEYBURN. We have to employ Indians to handle our sugar in recent years, because white men will not work for the wages that can be paid.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am glad the Indians out in Idaho have found a useful employment.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Indians make very efficient workmen, but that is in northern Idaho. There the beets are sent to the Waverly beet-sugar factory, which is in the State of Washington, just over the line, so that the business is in the two States there now. Various conditions—I do not want to take up the Senator's time——

Mr. BRISTOW. Go ahead.

Mr. HEYBURN. Various conditions exist that compel accommodation to them whether or no. The beets are not of the same value in all sections of the country, even in Idaho. The sugar beet does not to any extent whatever depend upon the soil in which it grows. Every bit of saccharine in a sugar beet comes from the atmosphere and is taken in through the leaves; and it is a question of how good a leaf or top you can grow on a sugar beet rather than how good a bottom you can grow on it. The leaf is where it gets its saccharine.

There are sections of the State of Idaho where you can grow magnificent tops upon your sugar beets, and then you have a large fund against which to charge your labor and expenses, and we have other sections of the State in which the tops grow small. It does not do to get down to too close a margin, or else you will have no margin for the different conditions.

Mr. BRISTOW. I want to state in connection with the light-brown sugars that are sold upon the market from Louisiana, that Mr. Colcock two years ago in his testimony made this statement:

> At present we are making, I should say, about 70 per cent of the crop into 96 sugar, fit ohly for refining, not fit to eat.

That is, 70 per cent of the Louisiana production is not fit for the general market, and that goes to the refineries, but sugar above 96, that which is 97, 98, and 99, is fit for the American market, and that is sold direct to the people. All I ask is that other countries may have the right to sell direct a good, wholesome, pure sugar which the American people would buy, by paying a duty which is a fair duty on the article that they offer for sale, and not be barred from that opportunity.

I have consumed much more time than I expected. The Senator from Utah laid great emphasis upon the fact that it was necessary for us to have the Dutch standard in order to prevent some impure sugars, samples of which he presented, being sold to the American people. That [indicating] is a light-brown sugar, and according to his statement, there is about 8 per cent of molasses and moisture in it; but it is just as wholesome as if the molasses and moisture were all taken out. There is not so much saccharine strength in 100 pounds of it as there would be if they were taken out, and it would not sell for as much. It never did sell for as much as did pure refined sugar, but it is just as wholesome, and it would pay a duty on every degree of saccharine strength that it contained. There is not any possible way of defrauding the American people or defrauding the revenue. The people get exactly what they buy. The Senator from Utah has said there is nothing unwholesome in it; and I am contending that they ought to have the opportunity to purchase it, paying the duty on what it is worth, the same as the refiners pay on that which they buy, which is of a darker color.

The Senator from Utah also emphasized the fact that the refiners wanted free sugar, which is true. The cane-sugar refiners are not afraid of any competitors in the refining of sugar. The American sugar refiner can compete with any refiner on earth and put him out of business; and so, if we have free sugar, then the beet-sugar industry would be destroyed. That industry is a competitor of the cane-sugar refinery, because the beet-sugar factories produce a refined sugar. Last year we produced 512,000 tons of it in the United States. Fourteen years ago, when the Dingley law was enacted, we were producing but 45,000 tons. The production of beet sugar in the United States has increased during that 14 years from 45,000 tons to 512,000 tons per annum, and that is a direct competitor to the American cane-sugar refiner. Naturally the cane-sugar refiner is against such a formidable and growing competitor and would like to put him out of business.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. Just a moment. Give us free sugar, and our beet factories can not possibly compete with the sugar producer in Cuba, because the beet-sugar producer buys his raw material, his beets, from American farmers, who live as Americans live and support their families as Americans support their families, while the sugar growers in Cuba employ coolies, formerly from Hindustan, of the lowest type of natives, who live in hovels. I should like to invite some Senator who is contending for free sugar to go to the Tropics, where cane sugar is produced, examine into the conditions of the laborers who produce the cane crops of those tropical regions, and then tell me whether he would like to bring the American producer of beets, the American farmer, in direct competition with that laborer. The result of free sugar would be that the American farmer could not compete and he would be driven out of the beet-producing business. We would have 500,000 tons less sugar here at home than we have now and would be driven into the markets of the world for that enormous amount; the market price would increase, as everybody knows, and we would pay more for sugar than we otherwise would pay.

I am contending not for free sugar; on the contrary, I am fighting against it; but I am declaring here that the duty that we have now is not needed and ought to be reduced, because it imposes too great a burden on the American consumer who purchases sugar. The duty is more than it ought to be. Now I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I thank the Senator from Kansas, but he has brought out exactly what I desired to ask him about. The great growth of the beet-sugar industry, which has increased something like ten or eleven fold, has been the direct result of properly protecting the farmers who were raising beets for beet sugar.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And the investors who put their money in the business.

Mr. WARREN. And the investors as well, of course.

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, yes. There are $100,000,000 now invested in beet-sugar factories in the United States, and they produced last year $50,000,000 worth of sugar.

Mr. WARREN. And I presume the Senator from Kansas will agree with me that there is no reason why we should not go on increasing in the same progression until we can perhaps raise all of the sugar that we use.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think the time will come when we can produce in this country every pound of sugar we consume; but still I am contending just as earnestly for a reduction in the duty to the very minimum that is necessary properly to protect the beet-sugar factories. I desire to say—and I am saying this to protectionists and Republicans—that the enemies of the protective system are not the men in this country who are declaring for free trade. We can go before the great American jury in any campaign, in a controversy between protection and free trade, and win if we keep protection clean from favoritism, graft, corruption, and dishonesty; and unless the protective system is clear of graft and favoritism, and corruption is rooted out of it, the American people will destroy it, even if in doing so they destroy some of their industries. The enemies of the protective system are on this side of the Chamber and not on the other. I wish I could make every protectionist in the United States hear my words, because they are the truth.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I take it the Senator from Kansas does not mean that in the broadest sense. His statement might be understood as meaning that the enemies of protection were all on this side—the Republican side of this Chamber—and that the friends of protection were all on the other, or Democratic, side.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should qualify that statement by saying "the most dangerous enemies."

Mr. WARREN. I felt sure the Senator's remarks were rather broader than he meant them to be.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is true. I should say the most dangerous enemies of protection are on this side—the men who tenaciously insist upon excessive duties, duties that permit trusts and combinations to exploit the market.

Mr. President, I have occupied much more time than I had expected to do. I desire to offer this sugar amendment to some of the tariff bills that come over from the House. I am perfectly willing to offer it to the free list or the cotton bill or to any other tariff measure. I am not particular as to which measure, but I want to offer this amendment to some tariff bill, because I want to do everything I can to put the protective duty on sugar upon an honest basis, so that every friend of protection can stand by it and defend it. It is not on that basis now; and if I fail now, I will keep up the effort at every opportunity as long as I am a Member of this body.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas has concluded, I ask if he will object to having the telegrams which I sent to the desk sometime ago read at this time?

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from California asks that the telegrams which he sent to the desk be read. I am through, and I will yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California asks to have certain telegrams read.

Mr. PERKINS. They are very short and bear directly on the subject under discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read the telegrams.

The Secretary read the telegrams referred to, as follows:

[Night letter.]

SANTA ANA, CAL., July 29–30, 1911.

Senator GEO. C. PERKINS,
Washington, D. C.:

Directors Southern California Sugar Co. request delay all action on sugar schedule until beet-sugar interests have had an opportunity to present their case; sugar-beet growing and attendant manufacturing largest industry in Orange County. The abolition of sugar tariff will destroy them to benefit eastern refiners.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA SUGAR CO.

[Night letter.]

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., July 29, 1911.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We urge you to oppose action until regular session on Bristow amendment to sugar schedule. This matter is of most vital importance to beet-sugar industry. We believe that Congress has not sufficient information on the matter to act with due consideration to its effects on this important industry.

SPRECKELS SUGAR CO.

[Night letter.]

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., July 29, 1911.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Washington, D. C.:

We earnestly urge that action on Senator BRISTOW'S sugar bill be postponed until the next regular session of Congress, and meantime the information gathered by Congress will enable it to intelligently deal with this important subject.

ALAMEDA SUGAR CO.,
UNION SUGAR CO.,
By JOHN L. HOWARD, President.

[Day letter.]

SANTA ANA, Cal., July 29, 1911.

Senator GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Washington, D. C.:

Generally believed here, and is, we understand, admitted by eastern refiners that the removal or lowering of present tariff on sugar would destroy the industry in California. Orange County has four sugar factories in operation, with another to commence within the year. Growing of sugar beets and their manufacture into sugar is now Orange County's chief industry. Sentiment here is practically unanimous for retention of duty.

THE EVENING BLADE.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a telegram sent to me from Garden City, Kans.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the telegram will be printed in the RECORD.

The telegram referred to is as follows:

Senator CURTIS, Washington, D. C.:

Understanding that Senator BRISTOW'S amendment for removing duties is planned to be acted upon to-day, we sincerely hope that no action will be taken on this matter until the regular session.

THE S. SUGAR & LAND CO.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to withdraw the notice which I gave a few days ago respecting an address upon the proposed revision of the metal schedule. I do this because I have concluded that I will not offer it as an amendment to the free-list bill. I am persuaded from all the evidence at hand that there will shortly come from the House of Representatives a bill revising the cotton schedule, and I assume very soon after it comes over it will be laid before the Senate for action. I believe that the amendment which I shall offer, revising the metal schedule, ought to be attached rather to an amendment of the cotton schedule than to the free list, and therefore I intend to defer the amendment until the Senate has under consideration, or is about to have under consideration for disposition, the revision of the cotton schedule. I would much rather submit my views with regard to the subject at a time approximate at least to the day upon which action will be had. I felt that this explanation was due the Senate, inasmuch as I had given notice to speak upon the subject to-day.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, August 1, 1911, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate July 31, 1911.

MEDICAL CORPS, UNITED STATES ARMY.

First Lieut. Edgar D. Craft, Medical Corps, United States Army, for appointment as first lieutenant in said corps, with rank from March 18, 1911.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, author of our existence, the inspiration of every great and good thought, of every high resolve and noble aspiration which leads on to the betterment of our social, political, and religious conditions, empty us, we beseech Thee, of all selfish and ignoble desires, that we may climb higher yet higher day by day, that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done in all our hearts. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BELL of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-nine Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and twenty-nine Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, a number of newspapers during the past two or three weeks have carried stories purporting to come from various Members of the House, and, I am sorry to say, from our side, the Democratic side, in which it is stated that my motion to discharge the Committee on Invalid Pensions from further consideration of the bill which I introduced—H. R. 767—was made in a "sneaky, foxy-like" manner. The story is of some length. It goes ahead and states that my motion did not come within the rules, and that I had to "sneak in" and file my motion. Now, for the time being we will concede it may be, as some Member of the House has said, that I filed my motion in a "sneaky" manner, but when my motion was called for hearing or when the House moved to adjourn over the day on which my motion was to be considered I can not be called a "cotton-foot," for I did not "sneak" into the cloakroom and fail to vote. I stood upon this side of the House and voted my convictions.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the remarks of the gentleman are not a matter of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has proceeded hardly far enough for the Chair to make a ruling upon that point. As I understand, the gentleman from Ohio is endeavoring now to lay the basis for his question of personal privilege.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee at present.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman from Ohio has had read nothing as a basis for his question of personal privilege, nor has he stated anything that forms a basis for a question of personal privilege. If the gentleman has something to read, or that he desires to have read from the desk——

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Oh, the gentleman from Tennessee will find that I have enough.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio stated, up to the present juncture, that certain newspapers had said that his motion to discharge the committee was out of order, and that he "sneaked it in."

Now, that is the sum and substance of what the gentleman has said up to the present time. Whether or not that is the whole of his case the Chair can not determine now, and, technically, the motion is overruled.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, if I am not interrupted, I believe I will be able to convince the House I am a Democrat and proud of it, but I am not proud of all Democrats. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, there are several points of personal privilege which you will observe if you will let me proceed. One is this, that the Toledo News-Bee carried the story that Gen. Burdett, chairman of the national pension committee, had appeared before our committee and had indorsed Gen. SHERWOOD'S dollar-a-day pension bill. Now, Mr. Speaker, this interview was supposed to be given by my colleague from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD], whom I have always admired and whom I have always eulogized throughout his district and throughout my own and other districts. But I want to say to you that this statement is false.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANDERSON] will read that statement, the Chair will know whether the point of order of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] is well taken.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. I will read it, and I will also read a letter of Gen. Burdett, in which he states he did not indorse this bill, showing the statement to be false. It is as follows:

JULY 10, 1911.

Hon. C. C. ANDERSON, M. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your favor of the 8th instant in which, among other things, you write:

"I notice an article carried in several Ohio papers stating that Gen. SHERWOOD claims you indorsed his pension bill (H. R. 1) at a meeting of the Invalid Pensions Committee which was held at Gen. SHERWOOD'S office in the Capitol about six weeks ago. I was present at this meeting and remember one of the committee asking you if you indorsed SHERWOOD'S bill, and you made it very clear that you did not and stated that you thought the Grand Army of the Republic would indorse a bill similar to the Sulloway bill, which is practically the same as mine."

In reply, I beg to say that my appearance before the Committee on Invalid Pensions on the occasion to which you refer, was in my capacity as chairman of the committee on pensions of the National Encampment, Grand Army of the Republic, and that my sole purpose and duty was to present and urge the adoption of the pension measure approved by that body at its last encampment, held at Atlantic City; that whilst acknowledging the generous purposes of other bills and of their authors, including that of Comrade SHERWOOD, I refrained with care from any discussion on their merits. I think perhaps there was a little trespass on this self-imposed rule when, in answer to a question from a member of the committee as to the attitude of the comrades toward other bills (the Sulloway or your own), I said, in substance, that a good many of the comrades would always be found on the side of the latest and largest proposals. It was probably from this remark that you drew the inference "that you (I) thought the Grand Army of the Republic would indorse a bill similar to the Sulloway bill." And, when answering a question (not, I think, naming the Sherwood bill), but inquiring as to the attitude of the Grand Army of the Republic on the question of grading amounts of pensions by length of service, I replied that the proceedings of the national encampments showed opposition to such course of enactment.

I recall with pleasure the very courteous and attentive hearing which the committee gave me on the occasion referred to.

Very truly, yours,

S. S. BURDETT,
Chairman Committee on Pensions,
Grand Army of the Republic.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the question presented by the gentleman is not a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, if the House cares to hear the status of pension legislation at this time, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one hour, in order to explain my side.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, one word upon the point of order. Of course, the statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANDERSON], without reading the article to the effect that it had been said that he had in a sneaking, underhanded way placed the motion upon the calendar, seems to me would present a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. There is no question in the world but that the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is absolutely true. The Chair stated to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANDERSON] that if he had any newspaper article of that kind he might read it, but he did not read it, but read a private letter.

Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] wish to say anything else on the matter?

Mr. CANNON. One query. If the newspaper article is truly stated in effect, I submit to the Chair as to whether that would not be sufficient, without reading the article? I agree it would be better to have the article read.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I have not been permitted to continue. I have not reached the newspapers as yet.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Ohio will suspend for a moment I will put the question. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANDERSON] asks unanimous consent——

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. I withdraw that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HARDWICK. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Ohio has anything in the way of publications that constitute a matter of personal privilege he ought to present them to the House, and the Chair will recognize him for that purpose. He may send them to the Clerk's desk and let the Clerk read them.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. It will take some time to read this article.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

One result of the Sherwood speech may be a congressional investigation of the entire pension question, with particular reference to political and mercenary activity, as charged. Directly in this connection Gen. SHERWOOD hotly heaped up accusations against Representative CARL C. ANDERSON, of the thirteenth Ohio district. ANDERSON is the sponsor for the resurrected Sulloway bill, which would add over $50,000,000 to the pension rolls. It is the bill now supported by Editor McElroy, of the National Tribune, the bill which the Senate has refused even to receive and the measure which President Taft says he will veto if it should ever reach him.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would inquire what newspaper that is from?

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. The Cleveland Plain Dealer.

The SPEAKER. There is not any question of personal privilege in that paragraph, in the judgment of the Chair.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I have here another newspaper, the Cincinnati Enquirer, which I submit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio submits another paper. The House will be in order. The Clerk will read. The Clerk will first state what paper he reads from, and then read the article. There is not any mark in the paper submitted which indicates what statement shall be read.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I am not ashamed to have the entire article read.

Mr. JAMES. There is a reading room here for that sort of business.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is a matter of privilege that the gentleman from Ohio is trying to make clear.

Mr. JAMES. I think he has lost it.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I think this part of the Cleveland Plain Dealer reflects on my honor and my integrity and honesty.

The SPEAKER. Is that the paragraph that was read?

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. No; the one before that. Mr. Speaker, there has been so many rumors of graft in the State of Ohio that this accuses McElroy——

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the graft in the State of Ohio does not involve a question of personal privilege on the part of the gentleman.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. It does when it connects me with it and when you know that old soldiers do not pay for legislation.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, this proposition ought to be reached in an easy way. If a Member of Congress believes that he has a question of personal privilege, he has a right to present it to the House. I think the gentleman from Ohio can state in a brief way what the matter of privilege is, so that the House can determine it, and I suggest that the House do him the courtesy to allow him to state it.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the statement of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I thought I had a copy of the Toledo News-Bee here, but I find that it is missing from my seat. It contains two columns assailing me. I have here also an article in the Indianapolis Star, containing an interview from Congressman BARNHART——

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Ohio has those papers, the Chair will inform him that he must present them as a basis of personal privilege, and the Chair will then hear him, and the House will hear him.

Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio. I will present them in due form to-morrow morning, Mr. Speaker.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations I report back House joint resolution 130 (H. Rept. 92), making appropriations for certain expenses of the House of Representatives incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, with certain Senate amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be nonconcurred in.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution by title.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendments to the resolution be disagreed to and that a conference be asked.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 130, making appropriations for certain expenses of the House of Representatives incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress.

Mr. MANN. What is the request, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, by authority of the committee, reports back the joint resolution with certain Senate amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be disagreed to; and he asks unanimous consent that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I have to object to that in that form.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the Senate amendments as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York what length of time the consideration of this bill will probably take?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not believe it will take much time. There are just a few amendments, and I understand that there is a desire to have a vote on one or two.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the Senate amendments be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to find out from gentlemen on both sides of the House as to whether this will give rise to any extended debate. If it does, I desire to proceed with the consideration of the cotton bill, to get it out of the House at an early day. If it will not take any extended debate, I will yield, as this is a matter of the business of the House. Can the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] inform me about how long this will probably take?

Mr. MANN. There will probably be some little debate on the bill, I do not know how much. I do not think anyone can guess on a thing of that sort. I think when the times comes I shall move to concur in the Senate amendment providing for an extra month's salary for the employees of the House and the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to ask the gentleman how much debate he wants on that proposition.

Mr. MANN. As far as I am concerned, I have no desire for any extended debate, but whether it will lead to debate I do not know.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. With the understanding that there will not be any very long debate I will withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of personal privilege for the purpose of correcting some statements.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] rises to a question of personal privilege and he will state it.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I want to correct some misstatements made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANDERSON] in regard to the attitude of Gen. S. S. Burdett, chairman of the pensions committee of the Grand Army of the Republic.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order that the correction of statements made by other Members is not a matter of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken. The Chair will state that Gen. Burdett's letter to the gentleman from Ohio does not raise any question of personal privilege.

Mr. SHERWOOD. The question of personal privilege is a statement of what transpired in the committee at a public hearing of that committee, not Gen. Burdett's letter at all, and I have the documents here to prove it. I have Gen. Burdett's speech before that committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio that the other gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANDERSON] never got far enough along to raise a question of personal privilege, and therefore there is nothing to answer.

Mr. SHERWOOD. All right.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7343) granting an increase of pension to Matthew Pork, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

There was no objection.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Clerk to report the first Senate amendment to House joint resolution No. 130, making appropriations for certain expenses of the House of Representatives incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress.

The Clerk read as follows:

SENATE.

To reimburse the official reporters of the proceedings and debates of the Senate for expenses incurred during the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, for clerk hire and other extra clerical services, $3,695.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to nonconcur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the House concur in the Senate amendment No. 2 with an amendment as follows:

"To reimburse the official reporters of debates and stenographers of committees of the House of Representatives for moneys actually expended by them for clerical assistance from March 4 to August 4, 1911, on account of the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, $400 each, $4,000."

Mr. FITZGERALD. And to that I reserve the point of order. This item refers exclusively to the Senate. If we include this amendment at this point, we shall then have confused items between the House and the Senate. I believe the Committee on Accounts will take care of the official reporters of the House out of the contingent fund.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Of course all of these Senate amendments come under a general head of the Senate. I suppose that is what the gentleman refers to. But the very next amendment after this one refers both to the Senate and to the House. Now, the amendment offered by my colleague expressly refers to the reporters of the House and the stenographers of committees of the House of Representatives, and is just as proper at this point as the other proposition under the third amendment. The gentleman will find, I think, that the contingent fund of the House will have such very heavy drafts upon it that it is not desirable to put anything on the contingent fund that does not ordinarily come out of it.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, this amendment is submitted on the floor of the House at this time without any estimate. How can we arrive at a correct amount of it? It seems to me that unless the Committee on Appropriations offers it as an amendment we have not sufficient information in regard to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me, the official reporters of the House and the committee stenographers are paid a certain compensation. They employ their own amanuenses and pay them and then are reimbursed each year by Congress. The attention of the committee was called to this situation after the bill left the House. The statement is made that by the middle of August they will have paid out $400 each. There are 6 reporters and 4 stenographers to committees, making 10 in all, amounting to $4,000. I do not believe there is any question but that the money is due and should be paid.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. Who is to judge as to the amount that they should pay for their amanuenses? Who is to judge the amount of compensation to be allowed to these House and committee reporters for the extra work they have to get done?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is not for extra work.

Mr. GARNER. This is the regular salary that has been allowed?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is paid to the people who do the typewriting. When these official reporters leave the floor they dictate from their notes into the machines, and the typewriters transcribe the dictation. This is to reimburse the stenographers for what they pay these typists.

Mr. GARNER. Then, as I understand the gentleman from New York, it has been the custom heretofore to appropriate a certain amount for each reporter for an amanuensis?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. To the extent of about $750?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Seven hundred and fifty dollars. The reporters state now that they will have expended by the middle of August about $400 each. That is what they ask to have reimbursed to them.

Mr. GARNER. Would it not be advisable to carry in the general appropriation bill for these reporters a sufficient sum to pay them in bulk, simply in the way of salary, to employ their own amanuenses?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It all depends on the amount of work that is done during the Congress as to how much will be expended for this purpose.

Mr. GARNER. And the only difference is whether this shall be taken out in this way or paid out of the contingent fund?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the only question. I believe the money should be paid.

Mr. GARNER. Well, we better let it go here, as we have no money in the contingent fund.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the point of order which the gentleman from New York has made is well taken.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the Senate in conference ordinarily insists that whatever pertains to the Senate, necessary for the transaction of its business, shall be paid, and whatever pertains to the House shall be paid, and neither body shall question the other. In practice where it is insisted upon, that is the result. The Senate in this amendment No. 2 has provided for the reimbursement of the official reporters of the Senate for expenses, and so forth, $3,695, and there is nothing in the resolution which carries anything for the reimbursement of the reporters of the House and of the committees. There has been exceedingly strenuous service, especially on the part of the committee reporters, so far during this special session, and it is true, after inquiry, that the reporters have to keep the force of typewriters, skilled for this special kind of work, upon their pay roll to meet any emergency. Some days there is nothing and some days there is something, and the work has to be promptly done. Unless we put an amendment here at this point, the gentleman withdrawing his point of order, the matter would not be in conference as to the House and committee official reporters. The motion to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment which has just been read would place the whole matter in conference. That is the reason I offered the amendment. I think it would be well to agree to the amendment here and dispose of it, and yet I am not here to make any factious opposition. If the Committee on Accounts, represented by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], and also the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. FITZGERALD] are satisfied that this money would be provided from the contingent fund by a resolution of the House, I am perfectly willing to take their judgment in the premises.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, we have no objection to this going into conference.

Mr. CANNON. Then I am ready for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois to concur in amendment No. 2 with an amendment.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay to the officers and employees of the Senate and House borne on the annual and session rolls on the 1st day of July, 1911, including the Capitol police, the official reporters of the Senate and House, and W. A. Smith, Congressional Record clerk, for extra services during the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, a sum equal to one month's pay at the compensation then paid them by law, the same to be immediately available.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to nonconcur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. GARNER. Do not you think we had better have a vote?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I just wish to say this, Mr. Speaker. It adds about $140,000 to the appropriations to be made by the Congress.

Mr. MANN. Where does the gentleman get his figures of $140,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I get them from the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, and they were taken from the Treasury Digest. It adds seventy-one thousand and odd dollars for the House and sixty-nine thousand and odd dollars for the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Yet we had a report from the gentleman himself the other day practically stating that the annual pay rolls of the House per month only amounted to about $52,000. How do you get the $70,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Amounts to what?

Mr. MANN. To $52,000. Where do you get the $72,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; the gentleman is mistaken; I made no such statement. I said the pay rolls of the House per month were from $8,000 to $9,000 at present less than they were the last session of Congress.

Mr. MANN. They never have amounted to $70,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The figures are $71,000 for the House and $69,000 for the Senate, which would make the amount to be appropriated, if this amendment were concurred in, $140,000.

Mr. MANN. The pay rolls of the House never have amounted to $71,000 nor $70,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken; they have.

Mr. MANN. The pay rolls of the House, as reported here the other day—I have the figures in my desk—claimed at that time——

Mr. FITZGERALD. These figures included the Capitol police.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following amendment.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations——

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in Senate amendment No. 3 with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to concur in Senate amendment No. 3 with an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "Sixty-second Congress," on page 2 of the amendment, insert "And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to each Senator and Congressman for extra services of his secretary."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a question in reference to this proposed amendment, and that is, if it has not been customary in this House, both under Republican and Democratic control, to vote this extra month's pay.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The practice has been in vogue for some years. I do not know from personal knowledge whether it has been in vogue in a Democratic House, as this is the first Democratic House I have had the pleasure of serving in; but the practice has existed for a great many years of voting some sum in addition to the regular compensation to the employees of the two Houses.

Mr. AUSTIN. Then I would ask the gentleman if there was any Democratic opposition to this item when it passed in a Republican Congress?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There was some. I started, myself, that way, but was overwhelmed with importunities by those interested in the employees.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offered the motion to concur in the Senate amendment in order to bring the matter before the House. It has not been always customary to pay an extra month's salary at an extraordinary session called for the consideration of tariff legislation, though my recollection is that it was done two years ago. I am not sure whether it was done in 1897 or not. I am under the impression it was not done in 1897, but I do not remember.

It has been the practice of Congress for years to give an extra month's salary at the regular sessions of Congress to its employees. The Members of Congress themselves, as a part of their compensation, draw 40 cents a mile as mileage between their homes and Washington, in order to enable them, presumably, to pay their traveling expenses. The employees of the House, presumably, under the political patronage system which has prevailed for years, are largely brought from the home districts of the Members.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. In just a moment. I am inclined myself to think that there ought to be in some way an additional amount provided for employees of the House in order to enable them to go home and come from home. However that may be, it has become the practice of Congress. This item when I first came to Congress usually went into the appropriation bills in the Senate. It is always subject to a point of order when offered in the House. That point of order has not been made in the House, so far as I recall, in years. Gentlemen on that side of the aisle, who now insist that the extra month's pay shall not be paid to Democratic employees, show a discriminating mind, because they sat silent in their seats when any one of them could have prevented the extra month's pay to Republican employees. Perhaps they value their employees on a lower plane than they did ours, and yet I hope that in course of time, after experience, their employees may develop into as good employees as the Republican employees. And pending that time, as far as I am concerned, having seen this amendment adopted when an objection would stop it, year after year, in a Republican House, without making an objection on my part and without hearing the objection made by anyone else in the House, I am bold enough to say that I permitted the item to go into the bill before, because I thought it was right then, and I shall vote for it now for the same reason. It is just as right now as it was two years ago when that side of the House, without objection, permitted it to go into the bill.

Mr. GARNER and Mr. SISSON rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

Mr. GARNER. Do I understand the gentleman's ground for favoring this appropriation is that the employees may have mileage home? In that connection I want to ask the gentleman if he does not believe it would be more equitable to change the law with reference to the mileage of Congress to that of a basis of expense to their homes and return for each Congress, and that, if it is placed on that ground, the employees should not be placed in the same attitude as the Members of Congress?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. In the very limited time I desire to occupy I do not propose, even at the request of the gentleman from Texas, to give my views on the subject of mileage of Members of Congress or my views on the subject of mileage for employees of the House further than I have already done.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman in reference to his statement that no objection was made at the last session of Congress that I objected to the matter prior to that time, but the amendment was promptly put on in the Senate, and therefore I did not want to go again through the useless motion of objecting to it in the House.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman undertakes to explain a dereliction of duty on his part, but the information does not appeal to me. If the gentleman was right once he should have had the pertinacity to be right twice.

Mr. SISSON. I did not desire to do a vain thing, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SIMS. I think the gentleman will remember that the gentleman from Indiana made a point of order against each and every one of them, and that they all went out during the last session of the last Congress.

Mr. MANN. I do not remember that. I think the gentleman is mistaken. The gentleman made a point of order——

Mr. SIMS. As to the extra month's pay.

Mr. MANN. I will put my memory against the gentleman's. The gentleman made a point of order against a certain extra pay to clerks of committees, because his clerk was not included.

Mr. SIMS. I did not hear that assigned as the reason for the point of order, which was sustained.

Mr. MANN. Oh, it was publicly stated by the gentleman at the time, and those items went back into the bill in the Senate.

Now, the gentlemen understand perfectly well what the situation has been in the past. If the gentlemen propose that the extra month's pay shall not be paid to the Democratic employees of the House because they are not as valuable in the service of the House as were the Republican employees whom they formerly voted to pay, why I am perfectly willing that that shall go into the RECORD and out to the country, and hereafter I am willing to stand with the gentlemen, so long as they keep these less valuable employees of the House. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

But there is one class of employees of the House, Mr. Speaker, that probably are not entitled to this extra month's pay. The committee clerks of the House, outside of one or two, have had practically no work to perform at this session of Congress. Of course they would get this extra month's pay, with the committees idling, refusing to transact business, declining to enter upon hearings, failing to attend to the business which has been committed to them.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. Some excuse might be given for not paying those clerks.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. MANN. Oh, certainly.

Mr. SISSON. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: At the tariff session, called by the President in March, 1909, were not the clerks who were employed under the Republican House paid an extra month, although the committees at that session were not appointed until the close of the session?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it will be a long time before the gentleman from Mississippi will be able to make the proper differentiation. This is considered to be a part of the pay of the old employees of the House. The old employees of the House were here at the time of the extra month's pay, given at the tariff session. These new clerks to committees have never done any work of any kind, at any time. That is the distinction. The others had been working for a long time and serving the House.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. Oh, certainly.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, these clerks to committees could not be appointed, could they, until the chairmen were appointed and the committee themselves appointed? And is it not a fact that the committees were appointed the very last thing in the tariff session of 1909?

Mr. MANN. Then there were no clerks appointed.

Mr. SISSON. But they were paid, nevertheless.

Mr. MANN. Oh, they were held over. The gentleman is not familiar with the facts. All the employees held over except the session clerks, and the session clerks did not receive the extra month's pay.

Mr. SISSON. Then those clerks were hanging around and doing no work, and yet they received the extra month's pay?

Mr. MANN. They were familiar with their work and familiar with the work of the committees.

Mr. GARNER. Has the gentleman heard any complaint on the part of the employees about their not receiving this extra month's salary?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I have heard plenty of complaints. [Laughter.] The gentleman does not have to go far. Of course I understand that the Democratic employees appointed by the gentlemen are afraid to go to the gentlemen for fear their heads will be cut off. [Laughter.] But they have no such fear in coming to us. They come to us and pray for support from our side, that they may have the extra month's pay, in order that they may be able to go home at the close of the session without being compelled to "touch" their Members of Congress for the necessary mileage home. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I am going to give this amendment my support, and I think I would be unfair to myself as a Member of this House, after formerly voting a month's extra pay to the Republican employees, to decline or refuse to do the same thing now for the Democratic employees. And as long as I am a Member of this House I propose to vote for an extra month's pay until we reach that point where we equalize the salaries of the House officers with those of the corresponding officers of the Senate. I was an employee of this House 29 years ago when this very question of a month's extra pay was up, and we were compelled to get around the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Holman; and it was given at that time in this House with a view to equalizing or increasing the pay of the employees of the House in order that it would correspond with the pay then received by the employees of the Senate. Then after we gave them a month's extra pay, or passed the amendment in the House, the Senate, in addition to the higher salaries that they were then paying their employees, added an extra month's pay for the Senate employees.

There is no more just ground or reason why there should be a difference in the pay of corresponding offices and services in the two Houses than why there should be a difference in the pay of Senators and Members of the House. Our salaries are equal to those of the Members of the Senate, and it is an injustice to our employees, and it is a reflection upon our fairness to vote at every session of Congress money out of the Treasury for a higher and larger scale for the salaries of employees of the Senate than we do for the honest, faithful, and deserving employees of our own House.

I submit the following statement as a part of my remarks on the subject:

LEGISLATION ON EXTRA MONTH'S PAY.

This statement shows that extra pay has been appropriated for the employees of the House since the Twenty-eighth Congress, and even before that time extra pay had been paid. Up to 1879 this extra pay was paid in divers ways—sometimes in lump sums of $100 to $300 and more, and at other times 20 per cent of the employees' salaries, and at other times 15 per cent, and sometimes as high as 25 per cent for those whose pay was less than $1,200 per annum. Since 1879 it has been a straight extra month's pay for each employee. The following Congresses voted extra pay:

Congress.	Years.	Party.
Twenty-eighth	1844	Democratic.
Twenty-ninth	1846–47	Do.
Thirtieth	1848–49	Whig.
Thirty-first	1850–51	Democratic.
Thirty-second	1852–53	Do.
Thirty-third	1854–55	Do.
Thirty-fourth	1856–57	Republican.
Thirty-eighth	1864	Do.
Thirty-ninth	1866	Do.
Forty-sixth	1879–1881	Democratic.
Forty-seventh	1882–83	Republican.
Forty-eighth	1884–85	Democratic.
Fiftieth	1889	Do.
Fifty-first	1891	Republican.
Fifty-second	1893	Democratic.
Fifty-third	1893–1895	Do.
Fifty-fifth	1897–98	Republican.
Fifty-sixth	1900–1901	Do.
Fifty-seventh	1902–3	Do.
Fifty-eighth	1904–5	Do.
Fifty-ninth	1906–7	Do.
Sixtieth	1908–9	Do.
Sixty-first	1909–10–11	Do.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I want, first of all, to say, for the information particularly of the Members on this side of the House, that the question which is now before the House raises fairly and squarely the question of whether we are going to keep faith with ourselves, in view of the action at the caucus before the opening of this Congress, when we went on record for strict economy, and even frugality, in the expenditures of the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield just there?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Is there an employee of the House at the present time who has not accepted employment knowing that this Democratic caucus had passed this rule?

Mr. PALMER. I will get to that in a minute. The Democratic Party in this House on the 1st of April, before the Congress opened and before a single man had been appointed to any place in the service of the House, passed a resolution, with practical unanimity, deciding that hereafter this extravagance should be lopped off and that we would not give the extra month's salary to any employee of the House; and so far as we could also, it was the sentiment of that caucus that we would fight the same extravagance in the other Chamber of Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. PALMER. I will yield.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Just for a question. I want to ask the gentleman if the caucus that he refers to passed any resolution specifically naming this month's extra pay?

Mr. PALMER. Yes, it did.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That is not my recollection.

Mr. PALMER. The gentleman is mistaken. I drafted the resolution myself. I offered it in the caucus. I explained it to the caucus and it was adopted almost unanimously by the caucus, and the minutes of the caucus show that the resolution included this very provision against the extra month's pay. Now, Mr. Speaker, that caucus was held before the House convened in extraordinary session, and every man who has gone upon the pay rolls of this House since then has gone there with the full knowledge and understanding that the salary which the law gives him is the salary he would get and which he would accept. [Applause.] And no Democrat who is now upon the rolls in the service of the House has either asked or expects to receive this tip or gratuity from this House.

This practice began about 30 years ago, away back in 1879. I put the full record of these appropriations in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the 11th of May last, and I will not repeat them now. It is sufficient to say at first the appropriation was for a single month's salary in an entire congressional term. Then, on the very plea that is now made by the gentleman from Illinois, that of precedent, the following Congress, which was a Republican Congress, passed the same kind of a provision for each session, so the effect was to give them an extra month's pay in each year.

When a Congress came around which had an extraordinary session in it the same rule was in vogue, so that an employee of the House got 3 months' salary in addition to the 24 months' salary for his two years' term.

This practice was followed also in the Sixty-first Congress. The only defense of the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois now offered is that because it has been done in the past, because we on this side were in the minority and unable to prevent this extravagance, it ought to be done now. If such a rule is to prevail it will be impossible for any succeeding Congress to wipe out extravagance fastened on the Government by an earlier Congress.

The fact is it was attacked on the floor, but we knew that the sentiment in favor of this extravagance of previous Congresses was so strong that we could not succeed in wiping it out. It was almost the first thing we went out after when we took up the question of economy in the management of the House. Mr. Speaker, especially is it true in a special session, at an extraordinary session, that this allowance ought not to be made, because an extraordinary session like this is generally devoted to a particular line of business and a large number of committees and a large number of the officers of the House are practically idle. You may walk the Halls of this Capitol to-day and you will not find more than two or three out of ten employees of the House who have enough to do to keep them busy. It would not be fair, and it would not be just, at the expense of the Government, to make these men a present of one-twelfth of their entire annual salary.

There are other extravagances in operation connected with the House which we did not catch in this plan of ours for economy. I notice, however, that the Senate is carrying them with a little more boldness than they had been carried here in the past, for we were unable to find them, because they were not carried on the rolls under their true names. One of these Senate amendments proposes an addition of $100 as extra compensation for the man who is in charge of the Senate chronometer. Over here in the House, I am informed by several committee chairmen, although I did not know it on the 1st of April, we have at least one man, and perhaps two, drawing $1,200 a year whose sole function and duty is to go about from committee room to committee room and wind the clocks.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, at the close of the last session of Congress there was paid to the employees of the House as extra money $71,056.29. In the Senate there was paid as extra compensation $69,739.30, making a total of $140,795.59.

At the close of the last session of Congress the House voted an extra month's salary to all employees of the House, and then, in addition to that, passed in the deficiency bill, put on in the Senate—I think it went out in the House on a point of order—an extra compensation to a number of employees of this House amounting to as high as $850 an individual, making the compensation for employees of the House something over $8,000 in addition to the month's salary, making a total amount paid in the House of over $80,000.

It is true that this has been paid in the past, but there is no excuse because a thing has been done in the past, when it is wrong, that it should be continued in the future.

The country has asked that we should practice economy in governmental affairs, and we can not go to the other departments of this Government and demand that they shall be economical in the administration of their departments unless we are first economical in the affairs of our own legislative business. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I hope the time will come when the practice of paying the extra compensation shall be stopped. If these employees of the House and Senate are not receiving an adequate salary, we should meet it like men and increase their salaries and not attempt to do it in this roundabout way. [Applause.]

It has been said here that we have not practiced economy and have not saved this large amount of money, as claimed we would do. I desire to say that the figures of the disbursing officer of the House show that there will be saved, if this reform is carried into effect and the extra compensation of the officers of the House and Senate are not allowed—the pay roll will be cut down and the saving will amount, in all, to almost $300,000 per annum.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it has not been possible to hear quite all that the gentleman has said as far away as I sit from him, but I would like to ask the gentleman, if I may, when it is his intention to avail himself of the privilege granted to him some time ago to publish in the RECORD certain tables to which he referred respecting the saving that has been accomplished?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I shall print these tables in the RECORD, so that every Member may see them for himself, in due time.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to have the privilege granted to him some time ago, and the gentleman has not availed himself of the permission I obtained for him, and I also understood that when he got the figures he would submit a copy to me.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I want to state, Mr. Speaker, that I shall submit to the minority leader [Mr. MANN] a copy of these figures, which I told him I would do, before they are printed. I expect to do so. I want to be fair to him.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that it is our duty, fulfilling, as we do, with this demand of the country that we should be economical, to stop here and now paying these extra amounts, and to go on record as saying that we propose in the future, if any employee of the House is not receiving a sufficient sum of money to pay him for his services, to increase his salary to a proper amount in the proper way and not as is attempted to do here by this amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, just a brief word. It was understood when the employees of the House were appointed in this Congress that they were to receive the compensation fixed by law. They were all very glad to obtain the places. For the present fiscal year the Congress appropriated $1,026,000,000. It authorized $40,000,000 additional for contracts and $32,000,000 additional was paid out to redeem national-bank notes, although not estimated in the estimates of permanent appropriations, bringing the total appropriations and authorizations for the present fiscal year up to the enormous sum of $1,098,000,000. If the Democratic Congress is to economize and to reduce expenditures, it can not afford to accept the position that because in previous Congresses certain items were allowed they should be appropriated again. In order to impress not only on the Members of the House itself, but upon everybody connected with the Government that our professions of economy were sincere, I believe this amendment should not be agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I just want to get some information. I am with the gentleman on this proposition, but I want to ask if the gentleman thinks that the House ought to consent to the appropriation of a month's extra pay for the Senate employees when it is proposed to strike out our own employees?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the motion made by myself is to nonconcur in the Senate amendment which proposes to give a month's extra compensation to the employees of the Senate and of the House. So far as I am concerned, if the House will support me, this joint resolution will never become a law if it carries this provision for the employees either of the Senate or of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

During the last 10 or 12 years during my service in the House the compensation of the great majority of the employees has been substantially increased, and an investigation discloses that wherever an employee is upon the pay rolls of either body of the two Houses it seems to be the invariable practice to give him some gratuity whenever he performs any service. I believe the practice should be abolished, and, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] has pointed out, the result of the work recommended so far by the House will be to save in the operation of the two Houses of Congress in the neighborhood of $200,000 a year. My good friend, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], complained that the committees of the House are not doing any business. The other day he objected to a subcommittee of one of the committees sitting, or one of the committees acting through a subcommittee, because, apparently, it was doing too much work to satisfy gentlemen upon that side of the House.

Mr. MANN. What I objected to was appointing a small subcommittee of a small committee to do the business, and the committee not doing any business.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is immaterial, so long as the minority was represented, whether it was large or small; but it seems to me that the gentleman complains one day because a committee is divided into subcommittees, and is therefore able to do more work than ordinarily it would be able to do by sitting in full membership, and now he complains because the committees are not doing any work at all. But I wish to assure the gentleman from Illinois and those who are associated with him that I believe that before this Congress has ended the country will be satisfied that all the committees of this House have rendered splendid and efficient service in the interest of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I desire a minute or two.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, this amendment of the Senate applies to both Senate and House employees. It is a considerable sum of money in the event it is enacted. I listened with much interest to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] and also with much interest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER], and also with much interest to the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that if you would include all that was authorized by contract and all that was appropriated, I believe he stated it would be in the neighborhood of eleven hundred million dollars for the public services for the current fiscal year. Appropriations are one thing; expenditures are another. I think in all probability for the current fiscal year there will be expended something in the neighborhood of $900,000,000. I am not speaking with exact accuracy. It is a great sum to expend. If I recollect aright, there are $150,000,000 for the Navy; $100,000,000 for the Army, and the sundry civil bill carries $150,000,000, if I recall aright; but I am only speaking in round numbers. For pensions there are $150,000,000. Those are great sums. I think ours is the most expensive Government on the face of the earth, and very properly so. The scale of compensation, the manner of living, are all upon a different grade from the expenditures elsewhere in the world. Why, we spend for education in the United States in the aggregate substantially one-half of all that is spent for education on this round earth. I have been sometimes amused to hear the eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] and my friend and colleague from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] talk about economy. I am sometimes amused again to see the House haggle and quarrel about a little expenditure to the employees of the House, as though they were going to amount to much, and I have seen every session of Congress since I have been a Member provisions go through for hundreds of millions without any economist from Illinois or Pennsylvania saying a word. Perhaps it is good enough for home consumption, gentlemen, but it will not amount materially in affecting appropriations or the expenditures in pursuance thereof for the whole country.

Now, the gentleman says these employees accepted the places. Why, good heavens, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania and my colleague from Illinois, if you had advertised for volunteers you could have gotten services for one-half, if not for one-third, of the amount. The question is, Is this too much? If so, do not give it. If it is not enough, it ought to be given. It has been given substantially for 30 years, and I am not sure but what the employee thought he would get it. But, after all——

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. One moment. But after all, you are in the majority. Have it your own way, but I just wanted to make this statement, that I do not believe, sizing up the business of this extra session and the business of the coming session that the gentleman from Pennsylvania and my honorable colleague from Illinois are going to receive popular approval alone upon this item and this expenditure. I now yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. AUSTIN. I just simply wanted to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the official record shows that they began voting this extra month's pay in 1844 and continued it both under Republican and Democratic administrations.

Mr. CANNON. That is still back further—1844. That was, I believe, under the reign of James K. Polk and a Democratic Congress.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RANDELL]?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I thought the gentleman from Illinois had finished.

Mr. CANNON. I have finished.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the pending section and amendments close in five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks that debate on the pending section and amendments close in five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman mean on this paragraph?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Senate amendment and the pending motion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOWLER. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the debate on this section and the pending motion close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RANDELL] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, as a Democrat it does not occur to my mind that any matter should be considered here except to follow the behest of the Democratic caucus. I take it that any party man should be bound by the action of the caucus, and if we desire to change the rule, we should go into the caucus to do it. I am not terrified by the statement of the gentleman on the other side that the public will not approve our action. It seems to me that this policy of extra compensation, which has been adopted by previous Republican Congresses, is not the way that we should pay our employees. They should get a proper salary and be paid according to law, and it seems to me it comes with bad grace from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to lecture this side of the House for pursuing this course of economy because we did not succeed in preventing the continued and increasing extravagances of the Republican Party which grew under his iron hand when he was Speaker of this House.

Mr. Speaker, when the time comes for this body to consider the appropriation bills for the Army, for the Navy, and for every other department of this Government, I say to the gentleman it will then be proper to consider what is best, what is economical, and what is our duty in respect to those appropriations. I now state that every Democrat should vote in accordance with the action of the caucus and continue to manage the affairs of this House with wisdom and economy. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] is recognized for the remaining two minutes.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I understand, and did understand at the beginning of this session of Congress, that there was a disposition on the majority side to economize. I thought that had been made plain to the gentlemen on the other side of this House. It does not come with very good grace from my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to come here and demand of the Deomcrats that they follow his unwritten rule and try to legislate 13 months into the year, because of the fact that it has been clearly understood at the beginning, and was understood at the election last fall, that the Democratic Party would not stand for a billion-dollar appropriation for each year for the next two years to come. That we were pledged to the people of this country to that kind of economy which would conform to the principles of right and not to the principles which have been laid down by the unwritten law which my colleague from Illinois has tried to invoke and to inject into this question. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. Debate is closed on the section, and the vote is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, to concur in the Senate amendment No. 3.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 110.

The SPEAKER. One hundred and ten Members have voted in the negative, so that the motion to concur in the Senate amendment is lost.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the doors will be closed, and——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Chair to count. Evidently, there is a quorum present.

Mr. MANN. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. SHERLEY. A great many Members did not vote upon the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear what the gentleman from Kentucky said.

Mr. SHERLEY. I said a great many of the Members did not vote upon the question, and therefore the vote does not indicate whether there is or is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. There are two clauses to the rule applicable in this case; one providing for a case where a quorum fails to vote on any question, which is the case here, and the other where a quorum is not present. The request is made under that clause. The Chair will count. Gentlemen will take their seats. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy Members are present—not a quorum. The doors will be closed, and the Clerk will call the roll. The vote will be on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to concur in the Senate amendment. As many as favor it will say "yea" when their names are called, and those opposed will say "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 6, nays 181, answered "present" 23, not voting 177, as follows:

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire if the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. HAMILTON, has voted?

The SPEAKER. He has not.

Mr. JAMES. I voted in the negative. I have a general pair with the gentleman from Michigan. I desire to withdraw my vote and to answer "present."

Mr. GREGG of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no," but I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. DRAPER. I wish to change my vote from "no" to "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The House refuses to concur in Senate amendment No. 3, which is equivalent to a nonconcurrence. There being a quorum present, the Doorkeeper will open the doors, and all further proceedings under the call will be dispensed with.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to nonconcur in the remainder of the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to nonconcur in the remaining Senate amendments. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House ask for a conference with the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. BARTLETT, and Mr. CANNON.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted—
To Mr. HARDY, on account of sickness.
To Mr. GORDON, on account of ill health.

Unanimous consent was asked for leave of absence for Mr. SMALL, for 10 days from July 31, on account of important business.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to object to all requests for leave of absence on account of important public business. The most important public business that I know of for a Member of Congress is to be here during the next 10 days or two weeks.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois object?

Mr. MANN. I do not object to requests for absence on account of ill health, whether real or fancied, but I object to any request for leave of absence on account of important business, unless the nature of the public business is disclosed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] for leave of absence on account of important public business.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I am just about to present a request for leave of absence for the remainder of this session after next Saturday, on account of important public business. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes in which to address the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I should like to present a request for leave of absence from Saturday next, for the remainder of this session, because I have been appointed by the President to perform a certain mission abroad.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order to move that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] be given leave of absence, and that their requests be granted?

The SPEAKER. Of course it is.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I make that motion.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. With great pleasure.

Mr. CANNON. Can not the gentleman get the business on the other side postponed? [Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the matter go over, to be presented to the House later, and I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the cotton schedule, H. R. 12812.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman from Alabama allow my motion to be put first?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman insists; but I will say to both gentlemen from Missouri that it is evident that it is very difficult to get a quorum. I agree entirely with the gentleman from Illinois that the most important thing for a Member of Congress to do at this time is to stay here and attend to the business and wind up the business. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my motion.

THE COTTON SCHEDULE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri withdraws his motion, and the gentleman from Alabama moves that the House go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12812) to reduce the duties on the manufactures of cotton.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to; accordingly, the committee resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. CULLOP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bill (H. R. 12812) to reduce the duties on the manufactures of cotton.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to enter into any detailed discussion of this bill at the present time. I desire simply at this time to present for printing in the RECORD a letter to myself from Mr. G. Gunby Jordan, a prominent cotton manufacturer in my State, upon the subject of cotton manufactures, with certain suggestions. While I may not be entirely in accord with the suggestions he makes as to the tariff, yet I desire to have the letter published in the RECORD. They are the statement of facts from a gentleman fully qualified by reason of his experience and intelligence to give information on the subject of cotton manufacturing in the South. Later on I shall take the liberty to further extend my remarks. The following is the letter referred to:

COLUMBUS, GA., July 10, 1911.

Hon. CHARLES L. BARTLETT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I cheerfully embrace the opportunity to write upon the subject outlined in your letter.

Being a manufacturer, and conversant with, to some extent, the difficulties under which the textile interests are struggling, and the heavy outlay necessary to equip and start a mill in the United States, I am in favor of a substantial duty on imported cotton-mill products. It is true the United States is the most important factor in the growing of cotton and the export of this agricultural product in its raw state is greater in value than any other export, raw or manufactured, and cotton contributes more to give this country a balance in trade, yet domestic conditions prevent our mills from competing successfully with foreign mills, and the obstacles have multiplied so rapidly that we are confronted with grave doubts whether cotton manufacturing can be successfully conducted in the future in the United States unless there is a decided reduction in the items going to make up the cotton mill and its equipment and supplies, or unless duties on imported cotton products are increased from the present proportion.

The Yearbook of the Department of Agriculture, 1910, says:

"In the exports of 1910 the principal item was cotton with value of $450,447,243; oil and oil-cake meal, $19,251,012; total, $469,698,255.

"Other exports came next in the following order: Packing-house products, $135,959,373; grain and grain products, $133,320,418; tobacco, $38,115,386."

You will see that I have included oil and oil-cake meal under the head of cotton, as it is properly a product of cotton.

It seems absolutely astonishing that the greatest product of the United States should be the basis of England's most important industry, and though prosperity should attend cotton manufacturing in this country, the industry has faced the most depressed conditions since the fall of 1907—four years of disappointment and loss. Many of these mills that have been equipped are now idle; practically all of them have had to heroically curtail. The industry has reached a crisis suggesting exhaustive inquiry into the causes of the distressing conditions and the prompt enforcement of the statutes in regulating certain forces operating to the serious detriment of the success of the cotton mills.

While the capital invested in cotton manufacturing vastly exceeds the investments in industries supplying the mills their equipments, still it is quite apparent up to the present time, possibly through lack of proper organization on the part of the mills and a willingness to abide by conditions, the builders of cotton-mill machinery and cotton-mill supplies and their influence has dominated the mills to a very large extent.

These influences permeate the entire cotton-mill industry to such an extent as to make it difficult to find exponents of any cause which does not directly benefit those who control the situation, even though this control has been misapplied and misdirected.

These burdens, particularly in the matter of high cost of machinery, are probably the most serious which American mills must contend with. Practically the direct effect of the high cost of machinery makes it necessary to employ almost double the capital needed in establishing foreign mills, and American mills must earn from 60 to 80 per cent more per spindle in order to secure a fair return on the investment over European mills.

While the American cotton manufacturer is absorbed in an effort to eke out a scant dividend for his stockholders on the excessive capital required to establish and operate his mill, he seems oblivious to the fact that beginning with the cotton planter—now possibly the most independent farmer on earth—ably assisted by conscienceless speculators under the cloak of cotton exchanges, and every interest supplying his demands, are requiring toll, maintaining price agreements, trade combinations, are the beneficiaries of high duties, and in many instances have reduced the quality of articles furnished.

Unfortunately these interests have large holdings in many mills; they own more stock in mills than any other class of investors; their representatives are on the board of directors, and their agents circulate among the mills and keep posted on every change of condition.

Primarily very many cotton mills have been established—especially in the South—on the wrong principle; it has been rather a patriotic move on the part of a few progressive, public-spirited men, who imagined that a cotton mill would be a valuable adjunct for the local bank to exploit—to increase the population of the city—so that at census taking they might have a little cheap glory and that the retail trade might benefit by the cash pay rolls on Saturday, and that the real-estate holders would get the benefit of a sale of adjacent property; and so these mills were established by a community of interests, who began by getting a donation of land, retaining all the adjacent property for a possible advance; the brickmaker takes stock and so does the lumberman, possibly the coal dealer, and the local bank and its directors, and so a mill is gotten together, so far as relates to the building and possibly the power; then the machine builder is anxious to sell machinery at high prices, so he comes in as shareholder for a certain extent of the cost of machinery, and sells the balance on time so as to insure the building being filled up; then comes the pinch, and possibly the commission merchant may fall heir to this property. And it is true that the machinery and supply houses have very much to do with its operation in selecting the commission merchants.

The builders of machinery, the supply houses, the dyestuff importers, and others have protégés in a large number of mills, and managers, superintendents, and lesser operative men, directly or indirectly, controlling the mills, are nominated, selected, and supported by these interests as their requirements seem to suggest.

I am informed that nearly all of the large consolidations of mills and important movement or large mill to be established has identified with it some factor in the cotton-mill machinery industry. In fact, I have heard of widely advertised cotton-mill meetings, called for the purpose of formulating resolutions relating to the tariff on cotton goods where the machinery builders displayed much nervousness, which resulted in the leading attendants upon the meetings being protégés of cotton-machinery manufacturers, who had practically been caused to attend the meeting for the purpose of preventing any mention made of the tariff on cotton machinery. In fact, in about 15 or more years past, having kept up with the gatherings of cotton-mill men, I fail to remember any effort to reduce the duty on cotton-mill machinery. It is a little mortifying to say so, but the associations of cotton manufacturers have been of limited value to this immense interest, except in a technical way. The increase of the sale of cotton-mill products, especially in extending the trade to foreign lands, has made little headway.

The cotton-mill industry utterly lacks in organization. Its millions of looms and spindles are scattered from Maine to Mexico and from Plymouth to the Golden Gate. So far effective organization seems to be impractical, and it is the duty of the Federal Government to inquire promptly not only into the excessive prosperity of any industry, but with equal vigilance to inquire into the distress of others. What should be America's greatest industry totters on the verge of insolvency at the moment. The causes should be determined and, if possible, corrected.

High cost of raw material and labor of operation in this country could both be successfully withstood if earning capacity can be kept within reasonable proportion with capital invested in plants and employed in operating them. American mills, if they can not successfully compete with foreign ones, must confine this industry to domestic requirements.

As to the items going into the cost of the mills proper and the cost of manufacture, approximately 50 per cent of the cost of the average mill is represented in textile machinery alone, exclusive of engines, boilers, transmission and auxiliary mechanical equipment. Textile machinery is protected with a 45 per cent duty, and the builders of such machinery are barely underselling the foreign machine builders, and then only when necessary, which is not frequent, owing to conditions narrated above. From the best information I can gather, the American textile machine builders demand, in normal times, a profit of 20 per cent and 10 per cent for fixed charges above the cost of manufacture. By improved processes, superior labor, and changes in design they have steadily reduced their cost of manufacture, giving actually less value, and not only increased their prices on machinery proper, but the prices of repair parts, which the mills must purchase from them to a very considerable extent

During normal and inflated times the leading builders of cotton-mill machinery appear to have successfully maintained uniformity of price, and, we believe, have used uniform price books, containing practically all the articles of agreement. In any event, there seems to be a great community of interest in their dealings, for one law firm, it seems, handles all of their legal matters, and I have found in buying machinery that the competition is rather amusing, if not totally lacking; it is public property that in very recent times there has been a combination of these interests, and wherever there was any friction or lack of harmony, it has been made entirely harmless by the process of absorption. I remember that during a very depressed period a few years ago, a syndicate of cotton-mill machinery builders bought at a rather extravagant price the entire stock of another machine shop or two, and have operated these purchased plants through their attorney, acting as president. I remember that one of these was building picker machinery at the time, and as soon as it purchased, the combination ceased to build this, and I know of no competitor now, except one, a branch of an English concern, which also seems to be complaisant and amenable to this syndicate.

One of the most expensive items used by cotton mills is card clothing, which is protected by a heavy duty. Recent developments seem to indicate that the "cotton-machinery syndicates" have become interested in the plant of Ashworth Bros., Fall River, Mass., and whereas for several years the several builders of cotton-mill machinery have used large quantities of superior English clothing, they are now insisting on the mills allowing them to furnish the cheaper Ashworth clothing, and when imported clothing is insisted upon a higher price is asked.

Probably no more effective means of obtaining abnormal prices for the product of cotton-mill machinery builders is in evidence than through the manipulation of patents, principally through the Draper Co., of Hopedale, Mass. This is a sort of clearing house, at least for some patents on cotton-mill machinery. For many years the prices paid by mills for spinning and twisting machinery included heavy royalties on spindles, which were paid into the Sawyer Spindle Co., a department of the Draper Co.

I have heard it stated that the various builders furnishing such spindles under these patents received a rebate on the amounts paid, and contracts with foreign builders of machinery for the use of spindle patents prevented the importation of foreign-built machines using such spindles. The expiration of the patents on spindles in common use in the mills had no effect on the price of spinning machinery, and about that time the price of twisting machinery advanced.

The Draper Co. have been most ably assisted by the machine builders to prolong royalties on patented articles by insisting on the popularization of patented articles to prevent the importation of foreign machinery.

The automatic-loom situation is controlled by the Draper Co. through patents, and so far its brains and wealth have prevented any serious competition.

The automatic loom is a practical necessity in this age.

Mr. William Firth, Mr. E. A. Leigh, Mr. Stephen Lowe, and other Boston machinery importers would be competent to testify as to the prices of foreign-built machinery and the method employed by American textile-machinery builders.

All of the above is simply to point out one of the serious elements contributing to the excessive cost of American mills, and I will now undertake to explain some of the effects:

COST OF MACHINERY.

As you will see in the foregoing, the cost of cotton-mill machinery is about 50 per cent of the cost of the plant. The duty on this is 45 per cent, and builders expect a profit of 25 to 30 per cent. The cost of building the mill depends somewhat upon local conditions and mainly upon the product to be manufactured. The textile machinery proper for a 10,000-spindle sheeting mill in this territory will vary from $10 to $15 per spindle, depending upon the weight of the goods and the kind of looms used. Freight cost is quite an important item, and boxing charges and erection figure to a certain extent. The total cost of a 10,000-spindle sheeting mill complete will vary from $25 to $32 per spindle, dependent upon the items referred to previously, as well as the character of auxiliary machinery and equipment. A yarn mill usually costs more than a plain-cloth mill, owing to the expensive machinery necessary to put the yarn into marketable form, if one is to get the best results. So it is practically impossible to build any kind or size of a mill for less than about $20 per spindle, and the average mill built in the South in recent years has cost from $25 to $30 per spindle.

Mills to make colored goods cost from $32 to $40 per spindle, while mills for duck, cordage, and other heavy goods cost from $35 to $50 per spindle.

An examination into the testimony of some of the experts of the Department of Commerce and Labor, who have been abroad examining into the cotton-goods situation, discloses—

And, primarily, let it be remembered that 95 per cent of the American cotton mills are built by what is known as "slow-burning mill construction."

William Whittam, jr., special agent, says: "Lancashire mills are built from a combination of steel, iron, brick, and concrete, known as fireproof construction."

"A mule spinning mill on, say, 50s carded, which formerly cost $5.20 per spindle, now costs $7.30 per spindle. The capital stock of a 100,000-spindle mill was fixed at $500,000."

Now, using the cheaper mill construction in vogue in America, no one would attempt to build a mill here on 50s carded mule spun yarn for less than $20 per spindle, and an American mill having 100,000 spindles would surely capitalize from two and one-half to three million dollars. It is true that an English mill is superior to American mills, but they are not so complete as to auxiliary equipment; for instance, land, tenement houses, and such are not included in the cost of building a mill. So, comparing them more accurately, English mills appear to cost, complete, about $14 per spindle, as against, say, $25 to $27 in America.

W. A. Graham Clark, special agent, in writing as to the cost of mills in Germany, and referring to a mill of 30,000 spindles on 33s warp and 84s filling, states that the cost of construction, without the ground itself, will range from $11.90 to $14.28 per spindle, complete.

Taking the average of, say, $13.09 per spindle, this amount would ordinarily be made up as follows:

Spinning machinery	$5.95
Cans, belting, etc	1.19
Steam engines, lighting and heating equipment	2.142
Buildings and sheds	2.856
Miscellaneous	.952
Total cost per spindle	13.09

Such a mill in this country certainly could not be built for less than $25 per spindle.

Clark gives the cost of building a mill in India at $15.38 per spindle. He gives schedule of English cotton-mill machinery prices, for instance, revolving top flat cards (probably 45 inches), $414 c. i. f. Bombay, 10 per cent off for cash. The American price at the same time was $735 f. o. b. New England points.

Clark, in writing in regard to cotton-mill machinery in Japan, states: "Of the $818,586 worth for 1905, there was shipped from the United States only $14,613 of cotton spinning and $22,512 of cotton weaving machinery.

"There is a prejudice among Japanese mill managers against American textile machinery. They assert that it is higher in price, lighter in construction, and takes more repairs."

Clark, in writing in Mexico about the price of 45-inch revolving flat cards, gives: "Five cards at Liverpool, $2,635; packing, $330; freight, duty, erecting etc., $1,167; total, $4,132, or $826 per card ready to start in mill."

The cost of a 45-inch revolving flat card f. o. b. New England points in 1910 would be $685; practically no packing required; freight to common southern points, $40; erecting in mill, common and expert labor, $15; total, $740.

You will note that the price of the card delivered in Liverpool was $527. American prices on these cards vary from about $685 to $735 from normal to inflated conditions.

The American machine builders deliver machinery f. o. b. New England mills and make no charge for erecting machinery in such mills. Mills in the South, on the contrary, pay the freight and $4 per day per man while erecting the machinery, which amounts to about 75 cents per spindle in the cost of building mills in the South.

CHEMICALS.

In reference to chemicals and dyestuffs: On these there are heavy duties, and it seems to be admitted that particularly the dyestuffs, anilines, and coal-tar products properly belong to Germany, and, aside from needed tariff for revenue, these items should be placed on the free list or some reciprocity agreement reached which would operate to the advantage of cotton mills.

American manufacturers have had ample opportunity to develop dyestuff industry, and the few attempts which have been made are mainly failures.

It seems that American labor is disinclined to this class of disagreeable work, and we have not yet progressed far enough in technical affairs to have that vast army of practical chemists which will work for small wages, coupled with the hope of a bonus when a discovery is made of something commercially valuable, which Germany has such a great advantage of us in, and in which Switzerland, France, and even England are superior. Hence the removal of the duty on dyestuffs and chemicals would be a helping contribution to American mills. This, accompanied by a good, reasonable reduction of the duty on textile machinery, would go far toward correcting the great troubles now manifest.

American mills are finding it supreme difficult to compete with foreign mills for the reasons given above on the cheaper grades of goods sold to China and other oriental markets, and hence they are forced to make finished products, requiring dyestuffs for colored goods and chemicals for bleaching and finishing in order to try to dispose of their goods in the domestic market. Mills formerly making goods for exports have changed to colored and bleached goods. So we can reasonably believe that a large increase in the import of chemicals and dyestuffs will occur in the future.

In the matter of findings and supplies consumed by cotton mills, which enter largely in the cost of producing goods, will say that it would be a difficult matter to enumerate the large number of articles used by the average mills. There are a great number of them. A mere mention will suggest, even to the laymen, what these mills contend with—lubricating oils, starch, paper, leather belting, lumber, wire goods, steel, iron, burlap, jute and sisal rope, bobbins, shuttles, spools, and a host of other articles.

It would be superfluous to elaborate upon the increased cost of such items. Let us individualize and take leather belting:

The price of this article has greatly increased, and we regret to say that the quality has generally decreased. The packing-house interests control the hides, and the leading manufacturers of leather belting have so complete a gentlemen's understanding that they can detect the brand of belting referred to by the price quoted on it.

In a general way, it is sufficient to say that in the cost of manufactured cotton goods all the items have steadily increased and the cost of raw cotton has almost doubled. Prices of goods have not responded, the export trade has dwindled, domestic consumption has been curtailed, buyers are taking only immediate demands, and the mills carrying double burden of stocks of high-priced cotton and practically all the goods that it manufactures, and for its owners it receives practically no profit. Financial interests, alarmed by the numerous failures among cotton mills, are restricting their lines of credits and stockholders have sacrificed their shares, in many instances, where no dividends were received. Inability to use stock as collateral and a general uneasiness has disturbed investment in this quarter. During all of this terrible depression, which has so long existed, while no material advances in wages have been made in order to retain help to maintain organization, mills have been compelled to remunerate help beyond the returns from their work, and, being forced to operate at a loss to retain their labor, the labor cost has been found to be materially higher and so these enforced reduced hours of work have, in turn, caused many operators to seek work in other industries where employment is more certain and steady, and thus it appears that, though the mills on an average are operating at probably 60 per cent capacity, there is an actual scarcity of labor for causes above alluded to.

In reference to prices beyond those sent you, I would respectfully refer you to the Textile World Record, of Boston. Mr. Frank Nagle, the publisher, has been giving copies of charts for several years, and he would be the best authority that I know of to give you reliable information in this regard.

Pardon me for digressing, but when one recalls many facts which have come under observation and experience detracting from the possibility of success in cotton manufacture, and especially in the United States, one can but be astonished at the realization of the situation. This tremendous industry, the rightful heritage of the Nation and in which the South should participate largely, has allowed the price of its establishment and maintenance to be almost doubled when compared to competing countries by interests insignificant in comparative importance. Furthermore, it has allowed conditions to grow up about it which impairs its success, and all without any evidence of resistance on the part of the imposed-on manufacturers or appeal to authorities which guarantee it a fair opportunity.

The interests largely responsible for the burden of American mills have amassed much wealth. This, in turn, has enabled them to become important competitors of the very consumers of their own product by owning interests in rival mills. This influence is so extended as to dominate to a degree the textile industry, and in the exercise of their influence they have departed from legitimate lines and are regularly adding more to the burden of the mills. The high tariff protecting the machinery builders could be so adjusted at least as to cause them to operate along legitimate lines, and this, in turn, would give new impetus to that industry by making improvements and reducing cost, and I doubt not give them equal business for what they now have, and it would be entirely possible, then, to sell some of the machinery abroad, meeting foreign competition, which has been done only to a very limited extent in the recent past, simply because there was a large demand at higher prices, this being secured by the tariff.

America is now demanding a very large variety of machinery for fancy goods, laces, trimmings, and special fabrics, which is made on machinery manufactured abroad almost solely. So far American textile-machine builders will not manufacture such machinery, being content with the kinds that they are building. At the same time the duty applies to all textile machinery, and the party with small capital and desiring to manufacture the above-named specialties can not afford to pay the duty on imported machinery. Europeans manufacture machines that Americans do not, and such machinery was needed here to make goods to compete with imported goods on the domestic market. As we will have to confine ourselves more and more to domestic trade, if the conditions that exist continue, it seems that it would be proper to encourage the manufacturers of these things which now we import, because the duty on imported machinery is too high. In other words, why keep out foreign machinery for the benefit of a limited number of machine builders, when they will adjust themselves to new conditions if they have to, and cheaper machinery will require less profit to make fair returns on investments and in the end do good to the greatest number of people?

Cheaper machinery will place this country nearer on a parity with foreign competitors and enable us to better compete with them in the struggle for foreign trade. Cotton is our greatest money crop, but England makes more out of it than we do. Is there anything we get from England that we make more out of than England?

American cotton is adding more to the wealth of England than the founders of the Nation ever expected to avoid contributing in taxes.

I am taking the liberty of attaching to this a very sensible circular concerning mill depression.

Respectfully,

G. GUNBY JORDAN.

MILL DEPRESSION—SEEKING EFFICIENCY—CROPS—BUSINESS—THE MARKET.

For the week beginning with July 3, 17,000,000 spindles out of a total of 28,000,000 in the United States had stopped turning. This cotton-manufacturing business is perhaps the most despondent of any class in the country, and its depression has been growing for nearly two years. The man at the other end, the consumer, refusing to buy except at the lowest price takes the place in the cotton trade of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the railroad business forbidding rates to be raised. The laborer, for instance, who buys overalls will not pay over 50 cents a piece for them—has not paid more for a long time. These overalls are made of the 2.40-weight denim. It takes 40 yards of denim to make a dozen overalls. The mills sell this at

10 cents a yard	$4.00
It costs to manufacture	1.30
	5.30
The manufacturer sells to the dealer for	5.50

If the retailer sells to the laborer at 50 cents, he gets $6 for his dozen; but this 50 cents profit is not net, because insurance, freight, store expense, etc., almost, if not entirely, eat up the 50 cents.

And the mill comes out with an equally close margin on its 10 cents per yard. At that figure, with the cotton price as it is now, there is absolutely no profit. Some mills have cut to 9½, but it is only to get out of the goods they have and close down. We have seen the following from one of the mills to its traveling man:

"At this writing we have before us a telegram from a cotton man, offering strict middling at 15 1/16. If you can tell us how any mill can make a first-class 2.40 denim such as we are producing out of cotton at this price and sell it for 9½ cents without showing a loss that spells ruination, we would like to hear from you."

The country's cotton-mill operations are curtailed about 60 per cent. The business that is done, except in a few specialties, is without a dollar of profit. Money and labor wash back and forth, but there are no earnings. The worst of it is that the look ahead is not cheering. Stocks may be reduced by shutdowns, and these certainly are drastic, because at no time ever before in this business has there been so much machinery idle. But low prices for cotton in the future—the big cotton crop which seems to be coming will not help, because goods prices will themselves be lowered and the mills still be deprived of the margin of profit.

Freight rates on cotton piece goods from New York to Shanghai, 50 cents per 100 pounds if they are shipped in bales; if they are shipped in cases, 30 shillings per 40 cubic feet.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I understand that on this side we are 4 hours and 15 minutes ahead in the consumption of time, and I will ask the gentleman from New York if he will now even up the time to some extent?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I believe that all serious, thoughtful American citizens who are interested in the development and prosperity of their country are fast reaching the conclusion that political parties should no longer make a political football of the tariff, which affects every manufacturing plant and every wage earner in the Republic. We should remove it from the sole consideration of a Congress composed of a membership of two-thirds of lawyers. The present bill and report is signed by 14 lawyers, 10 of whom never served a day on the Ways and Means Committee before this special session was called.

How many of the lawyers in this legislative body ever had a day's practical experience in the management of a manufacturing plant? How many of the men who are seeking by this proposed ruinous legislation to change our laws that affect the wage earners of America ever spent an hour in a cotton factory, except to pass through it and look upon its matchless machinery or listen to the music made by its operation?

Are we not fast reaching that point where the American people of capital will hesitate, if not refuse, to invest their hard-earned dollars in manufacturing plants, where legislation is to be manipulated and carried forward, not in the interest and for the protection of the investment or the wage earners, but in the interest of the political fortunes of a party?

This wonderful region of the Southland, stretching from the Potomac to the far-off Rio Grande, no longer believes in a tariff for revenue only; it believes in the American protective tariff system, under which this country has become the richest and most powerful on the face of the earth. [Applause on the Republican side.] And I predict that if our southern Members do not cease their hostility to the manufacturing interests of the South many of them will soon be retired to private life. We were purely an agricultural section prior to the Civil War. Cotton was king. The labor of the South was slave labor, but with the passage of the American protective tariff laws, especially beginning with the Dingley Act, we have gone into our mountains of coal and iron ore, we have invaded the broad fields of marble, we have entered our matchless forests of undeveloped hardwood, and we are now annually producing more from our manufacturing plants than we are from our farms by $90,000,000. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. AUSTIN. I will yield.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman if, under the statement he has made, the southern farmer ought not to have some consideration at the hands of the southern Representative, rather than the manufacturer?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; I will stand for the southern farmer, and when I plead here for the southern cotton manufacturer, with more than 850 mills, employing 200,000 operatives, I am standing for a local cash market for the produce of the southern farmer. [Applause.] And in this connection I will further add that the high price the southern farmer receives for his cotton as a result of the establishment of these southern mills proves conclusively that the farmers of the South are vitally interested in the measure now under consideration.

You can not injure or strike down the southern cotton mills without doing the greatest possible injury to every cotton planter in the South. It seems idle to discuss a bill that has absolutely no hope of becoming a law. I know that a political caucus made up of 150 lawyers on a bill reported by 14 lawyers will pass this body without a single amendment, and you may be so fortunate in the other end of the Capitol as to make a combination there as in the case of the woolen schedule; but there is in the White House a President with wisdom and patriotism and backbone enough to prevent you from destroying American interests and American manufacturing plants and reducing the wages of the American workingmen. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HEFLIN). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman thinks that this bill has no chance of becoming a law?

Mr. AUSTIN. Absolutely none; and I glory in the fact that we have a President who firmly believes no tariff bill should receive his approval until a Tariff Board thoroughly studies and considers and reports upon the question of the difference in the cost of production here and abroad. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARRETT. Yes. Has the gentleman that statement in writing? [Laughter.]

Mr. AUSTIN. No; but being the gentleman's colleague from the volunteer State of Tennessee, I hope he will take my verbal statement for it.

Mr. GARRETT. Well, I will take any statement the gentleman would make, and therefore I ask if the President has made that statement?

Mr. AUSTIN. If the gentleman has any doubts about what I say, let him and his colleagues on that side send one of their pop-gun tariff bills to the other end of the Avenue and see what becomes of it.

Mr. GARRETT. Of course that is a very courteous way of answering my question——

Mr. AUSTIN. I think it is pretty generally understood; it was so published in the local press; it is talked in the cloakrooms and published throughout the United States that the President will do his full duty when one of these tariff bills, prepared without thorough consideration and in the absence of information that we ought to have, reaches him, if it ever does.

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; and it has also been stated, of course, in the newspapers that the President had not made that statement.

Mr. AUSTIN. Well, try him out on the proposition.

Mr. GARRETT. Well, that is precisely what is going to be done.

Mr. AUSTIN. I am certainly glad to hear it. I would be delighted to see your bills go to the White House and be vetoed by that great President, so that we may make an issue in this country of whether we will maintain the American protective tariff system or pass your tariff-for-revenue bills, which do not mean protection for our manufacturers and the wage earners. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Had our friends on the other side of this Chamber passed the reciprocity bill, provided an increased pension for the hundreds of thousands of deserving heroes who saved the Republic, and who are passing away at the rate of 100 per day, and enacted a law for the restriction of undesirable foreign immigration, they would have swept this country and the opening of campaign headquarters would have been unnecessary. This is especially true if you would have placed at the head of your ticket that great man who presides with dignity and impartiality over this body as your candidate. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Tennessee have reference now to the present occupant of the chair, the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]?

Mr. AUSTIN. Oh, I intended to put up the present occupant of the chair as the running mate to the gentleman from Missouri, Speaker CLARK. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, every effort made on the part of the majority of this House in the way of tearing up and unsettling the business conditions of this country in passing tariff bills in the absence of reports from the Tariff Commission means loss of the good will and confidence on the part of the country, placed with the Democratic Party at the last November election.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I will let the gentleman from Illinois discuss all of these questions with his colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I must hurry one. I must decline to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee declines to yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, this country has never been as prosperous as it has during the last 12 months ending with June 30, under the operations of the much-abused Payne-Aldrich tariff law. The year closing on the 30th of June showed a surplus of $47,240,466.23 in the National Treasury, $1,800,000,000 of cash in the vaults of the Treasury, and over $2,057,000,000 in exports. The amount of money now in the Treasury of the United States is the largest sum ever held there under any administration, and the comptroller's reports show $1,478,140,975 reserves in 7,277 national banks, being $121,870,815 more than required by law. Our exports last year exceeded the previous year by $313,000,000.

The largest amount of exports known in the history of our land, and yet, with practically all mills running, with our business growing by leaps and bounds, here we have the opposition party, through a caucus, attempting to tear asunder the schedules of the tariff, disturb, halt, and injure business. What is the purpose of this bill? Do we need any more revenue for the National Treasury when we have a surplus of more than $47,000,000? The only effect that this bill will bring about in this country is this: It will increase the sale of foreign-made goods in America. So the Democratic Party is committed in this bill to an increase of the imports or sales in this country of cotton goods made by our competitors in Europe and Japan. There are 850 cotton mills in the South, and every Member on that side from Dixie who votes for this bill votes to take from the cotton manufacturers of the South in annual sales, in my judgment, $100,000,000, if not $200,000,000, worth of cotton goods. What does this bill propose to do? To reduce the present duties from 48 to 21 per cent, lower than they were under the Wilson tariff bill, that closed down hundreds of cotton mills and turned loose in the streets a great army of American wage earners, living at the soup houses conducted by public charity. What were our cotton exports last year? Why are many of the southern cotton mills to-day idle or running on reduced time? We exported last year in American cotton goods to the value of $33,397,097. What is the value of foreign cotton goods imported from abroad last year? Sixty-seven million nine hundred and forty-eight thousand five hundred and ninety-three dollars. We imported more than we exported, $35,551,496 worth, and here comes the opposition party, composed of a majority of the Representatives from the Southern States, that are manufacturing more than half the American output of cotton goods, and they propose to increase the amount of goods that we buy from foreign countries. I would be untrue to the people of the South—the people I love—to the land of my birth, if I did not enter my solemn protest against this unwise, unjust, and unfair legislation. Why, Mr. Chairman, in 1906 we sold to the Chinese people alone $29,814,000 worth of American-made cotton goods, largely made in southern mills. How many dollars' worth did we sell last year? Five million eight hundred and forty-seven thousand dollars. We lost in our cotton trade in this one country alone in the Orient $23,967,000. How did we lose it? Why, we lost that trade because that wonderful people of Japan are now our competitors in the manufacture and sale of cotton goods in the Orient, and their mills are the best equipped made in the English workshops, and their labor the cheapest on the face of this earth—10 cents for boys and girls, 15 cents for women, and 22 cents for men per day.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. In a moment. They have not only driven the southern cotton mills from their best eastern market, but they have actually driven the English manufacturers of cotton goods from many portions of the Chinese Empire. The labor scale of wages in England is lower than here and far lower in Japan than in England or Germany or France or Belgium.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. The gentleman has spoken of the great interest that he has in the southern farmer and the southern cotton grower. Is it not a fact that most of this cotton that is manufactured in China and Japan comes from the Southern States?

Mr. AUSTIN. Why, certainly; we sell to the Japanese a portion of their supply of raw cotton and then they make it into the finished article, and not only take from our southern mills their far eastern market, but even invade the Pacific States. I stated a few minutes ago that in 1906 we were selling in China more than $29,000,000 worth of cotton goods made in the southern cotton mills, and that since the Japanese people have gone into the manufacture of cotton goods they have driven us from that market until our sales have fallen from $29,000,000 to $5,000,000 a year.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. One more question, and that is, Is not it true that though the cotton manufacturers are deprived of the benefit, the farmers do get the benefit of it? Is not that true?

Mr. AUSTIN. Oh, no. You shut down a cotton mill in a southern town or run it on half time and its operatives do not purchase as many goods from the merchant or as much produce from the farmer.

Mr. KENDALL. If the gentleman will permit, is not the most important fact in connection with what you have stated this, that in losing our market in China for manufactured cotton we have deprived the American workman of the opportunity to earn wages in the manufacture of that commodity?

Mr. AUSTIN. Most assuredly.

Now, gentlemen, let me call your attention to another matter. Take this report submitted by the Ways and Means Committee and notice how the importations or sale of cotton goods from Japan in America have increased in the last two years.

I want to say that the importation on the Pacific coast of Japanese-made cotton goods increased from $10,470 in 1890 to $71,066 in 1900, and last year they went to $292,951, and if this bill should become a law there is not a cotton mill in a single Southern State that will ever sell a yard of calico on the Pacific coast or in the far western States in competition with calico made in the mills of Japan.

Mr. GARRETT. Will it be agreeable for the gentleman to yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Gladly.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman laid down a proposition awhile ago, and, I understand, took his ground purely on the Republican platform in the difference of the cost of production here and abroad.

Mr. AUSTIN. With a reasonable profit for the man who invests his money and takes his chances.

Mr. GARRETT. I meant really to give the advantage of cutting out the reasonable profit.

Mr. AUSTIN. No sane man will engage in the manufacturing business without it.

Mr. GARRETT. I do not think so myself. Now, let me ask the gentleman that if we were making up a tariff bill based on that, what basis of production would the gentleman use?

Mr. AUSTIN. I would do this: I am so intense an American——

Mr. GARRETT. You would take the lowest?

Mr. AUSTIN. I would manufacture everything in America that could be made here and never buy a dollar's worth of anything from a foreign workshop and made by a foreign mechanic when I had one at home to trade with. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARRETT. That is a thoroughly logical answer. If I were a protectionist, I would do that. But the gentleman awhile ago planted himself on a different proposition, that is, of making up a tariff bill based on the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, and I simply wanted to ask the gentleman what he would take as the basis of cost of production abroad. Would he take Japan, England, or Germany?

Mr. AUSTIN. I will answer the gentleman if he will content himself. I would not take, as you have done, a single expert. I would prefer what the President of the United States prefers, and what the Republican Party prefers, and what the manufacturers of this country prefer, namely, a Tariff Board composed of able men, such as the present one, with three Republicans and two Democrats, and I would put them to work. They are at work now, and if that side will possess its soul in patience and not be in such a hurry to do something whether it is wise or unwise, it would get all of that information in December.

Now, inasmuch as I have been interrupted so much, please let me go along.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman really, then, does not care to answer the question I asked?

Mr. AUSTIN. I think I have answered it.

Mr. GARRETT. Might I not put it again in order to give the gentleman another guess?

Mr. AUSTIN. Go on. If it will please my colleague, I will take pleasure in making him happy.

Mr. GARRETT. What would the gentleman take as the basis in the cost of production here and abroad? Would the gentleman take the highest known or the lowest known cost? Would he go into and investigate the various manufactories abroad and take into consideration the ability of the superintendents, the ability of labor, and all that, or just what would the gentleman do?

Mr. AUSTIN. Is the gentleman through?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. If the gentleman will sit down now, I will answer him. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARRETT. Of course, if I can be answered by the gentleman by sitting down, I will sit down. [Laughter.]

Mr. AUSTIN. I am very much like my colleague. What both of us absolutely know about a complete tariff bill and how in every manner it affects every industry in a multitude of ways would fill an immense volume; so that if I were responsible for the enactment of tariff legislation I would turn over the investigation of those subjects to a board of able, impartial men, who had the interests of this country always in mind, and not the interests of a foreign country, and I would fix the duties so high that the foreign manufacturers could not come here and deprive the Tennessee manufacturers of the American market. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARRETT. May I get up now? [Laughter.]

Mr. AUSTIN. I prefer finishing my speech now. If that answer is not satisfactory to the gentleman I can not make it so.

Mr. FOWLER rose.

Mr. AUSTIN. Now, Mr. FOWLER, I am not going to yield to you, so that you need not get up. [Laughter.] I yielded to my colleague because he is a Tennesseean. I never say "No" to a gentleman from that State.

Mr. BOWMAN. Before the gentleman leaves that point, as to the present law and the sentiment of the cotton manufacturers of the South, I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows what effect the consideration of the cotton schedule is now having on the coal mines of the South, and also upon the manufacturers who are making cotton machinery?

Mr. AUSTIN. It not only has its effect on the maker of cotton-mill machinery, the farmer, and on the merchant, and on the railroad company that transports the fuel and raw material and the finished product, but it also has its effect, of course, on every miner and mine operator that has to supply the fuel to run the plants at their full capacity.

Mr. BOWMAN. Does the gentleman know that the mines in the South are running only one or two days in a week, largely because they can not get orders from these cotton mills in the South?

Mr. AUSTIN. Many of them are running on short time. If Congress would adjourn and leave the tariff question alone and permit business men to go forward, there would be an era of prosperity all over the land that would be a marvel to every person in America, as well as the people across the sea.

Now, let me see what effect this will have on the South.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman one question, and one question only.

Mr. AUSTIN. Put your question, and I will answer.

Mr. FOWLER. I would like to ask the gentleman if a former Congress did not appoint a commission for the purpose of investigating the cost of wood pulp in this country and in Canada, and whether it did not make a report that the cost in Canada was about $2 a ton less than in this country? And I want to know further if the Tariff Commission has not made an investigation of the same subject and if it has not made a report on it as costing $4 a ton more here than in Canada? And, if so, I want to ask the gentleman how reliable the reports of the Tariff Board are going to be?

Mr. AUSTIN. I want to say to my good-natured friend from Illinois that I am endeavoring to discuss this cotton schedule; but the man in this House of all men who understands the wood-pulp and paper business as no man in the world understands it is the gentleman's colleague just across the aisle, Mr. MANN, and I respectfully refer the gentleman to him for an answer to his question. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is an organization in the Southern States known as the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association. It has a committee on tariff legislation. R. M. Miller, jr., of Charlotte, N. C., is its chairman. If there are any Members present now from these various States I would esteem it as a favor if they would indicate the politics of these gentlemen who compose the committee as we go along.

Mr. PAGE. If the gentleman will allow me, I will fix the politics of the first. He is a Republican. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Well, I talked with one of the gentleman's colleagues from North Carolina this morning, and he told me he thought Mr. Miller was a Democrat, because he knew he had voted for him every time he was a candidate for Congress. The next member of that committee is A. H. Bahnson, from Virginia. Is there anybody here from Virginia? If not, they are missing a mighty good speech. [Laughter.] The next is D. Y. Cooper, of North Carolina. What is he, Mr. PAGE?

Mr. PAGE. He is a Democrat.

Mr. AUSTIN. The next is Stuart W. Cramer, of North Carolina. Does the gentleman know his politics?

Mr. PAGE. I am inclined to think he is a Republican.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will pardon me, I am inclined to think it does not make any difference what their politics now may be. They will all be Republicans after this bill passes, if this should pass. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. AUSTIN. The next is James D. Hammett, of South Carolina. Then come J. H. Morgan, of South Carolina; Charles D. Tuller, of Georgia; Scott Maxwell, of Alabama; T. L. Wainwright, of Mississippi; A. W. McLellan, of Louisiana; T. C. Saunders, of Texas; Col. L. D. Tyson, of Tennessee, whom I know to be a true and tried Democrat; and, lastly, Paul T. Marrs, of Kentucky.

This organization, representing 850 southern cotton mills, with an output in valuation of about $300,000,000, and giving employment to 200,000 people who are aiding in the support of 1,000,000 people, asked Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee of this House, all 14 of whom are lawyers, to give them a day in court and a hearing, in order that they might present their side of this important question affecting their present, their future, their families, their invested millions, and their great army of deserving employees; but not a day, an hour, or a minute was given to them in the way of a personal hearing. Name 850 men or organizations doing more for the development, growth, and prosperity of the South than the men who represent the cotton-manufacturing interests of the States south of the Potomac River. They were not given a day, and yet they assured the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee that conditions had changed since the hearing before the Republican Ways and Means Committee of the Sixty-first Congress.

I telegraphed Mr. Miller, the chairman of that committee, to know what effect this bill would have on the southern cotton mills, and here is his reply:

CHARLOTTE, N. C., July 31.

Hon. R. W. AUSTIN,
Washington, D. C.:

In reply to your message, the best that I can figure, to meet the reduction in the proposed tariff on cotton yarns and cloth, it will require a cut of somewhere between 25 and 50 per cent in wages of our mill operatives.

R. A. MILLER, Jr.

If there were 850 cotton-mill men here in convention, or if they were making laws in this House, what would you think of their fairness if they framed up a bill affecting every one of the 150 lawyers on that side of this Chamber, including the 14 lawyers on the Ways and Means Committee, without giving you a hearing, if the measure of legislation that they were going to enact meant everything to you in the practice of your profession? Would you not rebel at the idea of 850 men unacquainted with your profession and its needs passing laws vitally affecting you and yours without giving you a moment to be heard? Yet that is what you are doing here. You have raised your hands against the interests of the cotton-mill men of this land, and in order to carry out a political advantage, as you imagine, you are going to attempt to crucify them and their interests and the people that they employ.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I would prefer getting a little further along just now. Later on, perhaps, I can yield.

Mr. GARRETT. I would be very glad to ask the gentleman a question now, if he will yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. If the gentleman will really consult my convenience and pleasure about it, I would prefer yielding a little later on.

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. Last year we produced in this country—in the Southern States—11,965,962 bales of cotton. We produced 60 per cent of the entire world's output of cotton, and we are manufacturing to-day one-third. What else are we doing? We are shipping cotton across the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans to England, Germany, Japan, and other foreign countries, where it is made up into the finished article, rushed back to America and sold after paying a tariff duty of 48 per cent, which, I believe, is the average in the Payne-Aldrich bill, and we bought last year of those goods, upon which we paid the freight both ways and for which we left our money in foreign lands, to be paid to foreign working people, $67,000,000. If I had my way, I would not send a dollar of American money to any foreign country if there was a cotton mill in Tennessee or North Carolina that could supply me. [Applause.]

Two-thirds of our cotton crop is sold abroad. We should by legislation in this country build up the cotton industry until we used practically our entire cotton crop and supplied the world with cotton goods. Here is Great Britain. Its exports in cottons last year were $558,269,108. Although we produced 60 per cent of the raw material of the world, our exports of cotton manufactured goods last year were only $33,397,097. Germany, which does not produce a bale of cotton, and must look to us or some other foreign country for her mill supplies, exported $95,524,870.

Take Japan. At one time we supplied that country. Their cotton exports last year amounted to $29,260,000—almost equal to that of our own.

Read the statistics contained in this report and what is the story? Our exports have fallen off in four or five years one-half; we only increased them to any extent to Chile, Canada, and the Philippine Islands; and yet our greatest increase, $1,800,000 in the Philippine Islands, and you want to turn those islands loose so that we would have no trade advantage there. Then Japan, with her cheap cotton goods, would take that market away from us almost in a day. Why, the cotton manufacturers of Lancashire, England, had a monopoly a few years ago in the cotton yarns in certain parts of China. Japan was not in the market, but to-day they have actually driven our strongest and most successful European competitor out of that market.

Now, gentlemen, look at this Southland of ours. None of us fail to feel an interest in everything that attaches to and affects its material growth and development. If we are to keep these 850 mills busy, if we are to continue to develop, to expand our manufacturing interests in cotton lines, then we must reserve the entire American market—the best market in all this world—for the American cotton mills and operatives, and we must invade the foreign market with our own merchant vessels—put to good use the great Panama Canal when completed. We are far from getting what we are entitled to in South America, for we should own the markets of that continent. We have been practically driven out of China, and now will Japan next force us to give up Mexico and the South American countries bordering on the Pacific? You do not even attempt to secure anything in the way of new markets for our cotton manufacturers in exchange for reducing the tariff duties and permitting the increase in the sale of foreign cotton goods here. You get absolutely nothing in return.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I want to ask the gentleman if he attributes the loss of trade in China, such as it is, to the lack of a protective tariff in the United States, and if he does, will he tell us how the tariff on the manufactures in this country, on imports, would help the market in China for American manufacturers?

Mr. AUSTIN. I will ask the gentleman how he expects to help us at home or abroad by reducing the tariff duties 27 per cent and flooding our country with the cheap, pauper-made goods of Europe and Japan?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I will answer in this way. We have at present a prohibitive tariff, and the bill suggested by the committee and pending before the House is, in our opinion, a revenue bill, or if a tariff, not prohibitive. I do not understand how the question of a tariff on imports to this country can be used in any way to affect the trade in China.

Mr. AUSTIN. The gentleman talks about the revenue features of this bill and protective duties. I understood the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. UNDERWOOD of Alabama, to state that there was no protection in this bill.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. The gentleman stated that it was a bill with protection only incidentally.

Mr. AUSTIN. I will answer the gentleman if he will permit me to do it in my own way.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Yes; I want to know how a tariff on importations into this country will open up the markets of China?

Mr. AUSTIN. Now, here are over 90,000,000 of people, the most extravagant, the most wasteful, the greatest consumers in the world. All admit it is the best market in the world. I would frame a tariff bill that would keep forever this market for the American cotton-mill men. You bring a bill in here that takes a part of this market away from our mills and turns it over to our foreign competitors. The chairman of your committee, in reporting the bill, estimates it will increase the sale of foreign cotton goods in this country $13,000,000 per annum, and able and experienced cotton-mill men say these sales will be nearer $100,000,000 than $13,000,000. We can only maintain our mills by preserving our market for our own people. I doubt whether the time will ever come when we can successfully compete in China with the cheap Japanese labor unless the Democratic Party should come into complete power—which Heaven forbid—and puts such bills as this through, and then we could only have a part of any market by putting our standard of wages down, down, down to the level of that of the cheap labor of Japan.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I could not resist the coming Senator from the blue-grass State of Kentucky. [Laughter.]

Mr. JAMES. I am much obliged to the gentleman. The question I desire to ask is, if his statement is one by which he would regulate the affairs of the Government—that is, that the tariff should be so high that it will keep out all importations—where would we get the revenue sufficient to run the Government?

Mr. AUSTIN. I would stand here for the same thing that the gentleman stands for—an internal-revenue and an income tax.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I am in accord with the gentleman's idea of an income tax, but that would not raise the revenue sufficient to run the Government—where would we get the revenue necessary to defray the expenses of the Government?

Mr. AUSTIN. I would find a way that would not ruin the great manufacturing industries of the country or reduce the wages of our laboring people. [Applause on the Republican side.] If there are not enough wise and patriotic statesmen in Congress to bring about that kind of a result, they ought to resign and go home.

Mr. JAMES. If the position of the gentleman is correct—that no goods ought to be imported into this country—why cavil about the rate or the duty? Why not pass a law providing that nothing shall be imported here at all?

Mr. AUSTIN. I would cast a thousand votes, if necessary, to make the duties high enough on articles we can successfully produce here that would give our mills and workingmen a chance to supply every want of the American consumer. America is good enough for me, and my choice and preference is for American goods, made in American workshops by American laboring men. I would rather pay something more for goods than to send the money out of my country to build up foreign lands and pay foreign labor at the expense of our own.

Mr. JAMES. Then the gentleman would rewrite the Republican platform, which declares that the tariff shall be the difference between the cost of production here and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to the manufacturer. The gentleman would write in its stead a provision that no goods shall be imported into the United States at all.

Mr. AUSTIN. None that can be produced here. Yes, I would write that kind of a platform.

Mr. JAMES. Well, the Republican platform ought to be rewritten then.

Mr. AUSTIN. I am mighty glad to know that the gentleman from Kentucky reads the Republican platform. There is hope for him yet.

Mr. Chairman, while discussing the tariff there has been some criticism on the floor of this House about the creation of the Tariff Board. I want to say, in justice to the gentleman who heads the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, that he never did a wiser or a more patriotic thing for his country than when he recorded his vote in favor of a Tariff Board or commission.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield right there? I appreciate the compliment that he has paid to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means; but why have a Tariff Board, why have that commission, to ascertain the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, if the gentleman's position is right that nothing ought to be imported here at all?

Mr. AUSTIN. I have to deal with the untried and unterrified Democracy on these questions, hence it is not wholly up to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. A little while ago the gentleman referred to the absence of hearings. I want to ask the gentleman if there has been any change in conditions within the last two years with respect to the cotton industry?

Mr. AUSTIN. All I know is that the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association, made up of the leading cotton manufacturers of the country, stated in a letter over their signatures to Mr. UNDERWOOD that there had been.

Mr. GARRETT. Does not the gentleman know, and does he not believe, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] stated here when that bill came in that there had been held a most elaborate and comprehensive hearing on every schedule that had ever been had?

Mr. AUSTIN. Why, certainly. The Republican Party never attempts to enact legislation affecting the invested capital of this country and the wages of our great army of producers without giving them all a day in court and a hearing.

Mr. GARRETT. Precisely so, and that is why I understood that the President of the United States denounced the wool schedule as being indefensible, because the Republican Party had investigated it. Now, let me ask the gentleman, What is the change within the last two years?

Mr. AUSTIN. Well, as I want to go on with my speech, I will just pass this publication of the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association over to the gentleman for his examination.

Mr. PAYNE. O Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Tennessee ought to answer all of these questions. It is the only evidence of any attempt on that side of the House to get any information. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARRETT. This publication makes no statement of change.

Mr. AUSTIN. There is a statement in that publication, issued, as I said, by the leading manufacturers of the South, that there had been a great change in the condition of the cotton manufactures of this country since the public hearings of two or three years ago, and they gave that as a reason why they wanted a personal hearing, which was denied them.

Mr. GARRETT. Does not the gentleman know that the Committee on Ways and Means gave notice to the gentlemen who wrote asking a hearing that if there was anything new to present that had not been presented to the Payne committee two years ago that they would hear them?

Mr. AUSTIN. In response to that I will publish the correspondence as a part of my remarks.

Mr. GARRETT. Could the gentleman give the gist of it now?

Mr. AUSTIN. I should prefer to occupy my time with something else, but I will put it in the RECORD as an appendix to my speech. I started to say something in reference not only as to how the Japanese had driven us out of the markets of the Orient but how they are beginning to sell pig iron in this country. The southern mills are no longer shipping pig iron in large quantities to the Pacific coast. Why? Because they are purchasing Chinese pig iron made 800 miles in the interior of China on the Yangtse River, where they employ Chinamen at a dollar a week in American money working 12 hours a day. This pig iron is brought to our shores in Japanese vessels.

Mr. HILL. And if the gentleman will pardon me a moment, a gentleman called at my room night before last and told me that within 200 miles of this Capital he had just completed an order made of Chinese pig iron amounting to several thousand tons.

Mr. AUSTIN. Now, the Japanese are driving us from the Orient, they have invaded the Pacific coast with their cotton goods, and now they are meeting us with cheap Chinese pig iron. Our duty on pig iron is $2.50 per ton. They ship it 8,000 to 10,000 miles to our Pacific coast towns, pay this duty, and sell it at a profit. Last year a cargo of Chinese pig iron made in the interior of China was boated down the river, transferred to a Japanese vessel, which sailed down the Pacific around South America, up the Atlantic Ocean—14,000 miles—landed in New York or Brooklyn, paid our duty of $2.50 a ton, and they sold it for $2.50 or $3 a ton cheaper than Mr. UNDERWOOD's constituents can make pig iron and deliver it to Brooklyn consumers. It costs $10 a ton to make pig iron in the district I represent. It costs $4.50 a ton to ship it to Brooklyn. This Chinese pig iron was sold in Brooklyn for $12.50, yet a manufacturer stood on that side of the House and told us that there is practically no difference in wages or earning capacity, and so forth, in this country and in foreign lands.

Can we make pig iron in this country by paying our labor a dollar a week? Can we make cotton goods in the cotton mills of the South and pay our girls and boys 10 cents a day and grown men and women 20 to 25 cents a day? No. I have lived abroad. Did you ever go into a foreign land, not on a flying trip or a tour? Have you been in the sections of their great cities where the work people live and noticed the sad and unhappy condition of the laboring people? I have. God knows it was one of the saddest days of my life when I took a stroll in a section of a great foreign manufacturing city where the laboring people live, and yet I heard a man on that side of the House the other day appeal for a tariff system in this country similar to that of Great Britain. I could not realize the greatness and glory of our Republic until I had lived abroad and witnessed the unhappy and unfortunate condition of their working people. I saw more crippled and deformed, hungry children in one day there than I have seen in all my life in this country. I saw the bones in their little legs as crooked as a rope of sand and little bodies thin, pale, and emaciated, all for the want of something to eat. They found on examination that thousands of these children entered the public schools in the morning without having a bite to eat before leaving home. One winter, with the snow flying and cold, chilly winds sweeping through the streets of that city, I saw gray-headed women, 65 to 70 years of age, walking the streets hungry—bareheaded and barefooted—sad pictures of want, misery, and unhappiness, in a land where they have had on their books for many years a "tariff for revenue only," such as our friends on the other side of the Chamber are attempting to put through this House.

There never could be a greater or more effective school to teach men the lessons of tariff legislation than to go and remain in foreign lands long enough to study the actual condition of the laboring people. If you would do this, I would risk my salvation that there is no man on that side of the Chamber who would ever cast a vote to place the American working people on the same level as that of the foreign wage earner.

Ninety-two per cent of the laborers in the cotton mills of Massachusetts are of foreign birth—came here for better wages. Ninety-eight per cent of those in the southern mills are native Americans. Anyone who thinks that with short hours of labor, working with the same tools and the same machinery, there is something in the American atmosphere that gives our workingman more muscle, more capacity, than the man beyond the seas is mistaken. Why is it that they make merchant vessels and warships cheaper than we do? It is largely a matter of labor. Why does not the American workingman in the American shipyards do twice or three times as much as the strong-armed Scotchman on the banks of the Clyde? Why is it? Why, gentlemen, they pay carpenters in Great Britain $1.25 and never higher than $1.75 a day. They pay bricklayers and plasterers about the same.

I advised a Scotch carpenter to come to America, and he wrote that he earned more wages here at his trade in one week than he earned in four weeks in Great Britain.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 20 minutes more.

Mr. AUSTIN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is as generous as he is handsome. [Laughter.]

I induced three plumbers to go to San Francisco. They found employment in 2 days, and they wrote back that they made more wages in 6 days in America than they made in 25 days in Great Britain, and they said:

> We are living an entire month on what we made the first week, and our profits or savings are our other three weeks' wages.

I met at a meeting in Glasgow, where we celebrated the opening of the Jamestown Exposition, a Scotch mother, who said:

> I have four boys in America, and they are working at Newport News, in Virginia, in the shipyards.

She said:

> Mr. AUSTIN, they are all prosperous and send me back a certain portion of their wages every month. They make more there in a week than they received here in a month.

We had three American students in the shipbuilding department of the Glasgow University—one from Georgia, one from Pennsylvania, and one from the State of Washington. During the vacation one of these students secured a place as an apprentice in a shipbuilding yard in order to get practical experience. His wages as an apprentice were a shilling, or 24 cents and a fraction, a week. Apprentices' wages are 75 cents a day in the railroad shops of my town. He worked alongside of a Scotch mechanic who had served a five years' apprenticeship, and who had worked for this firm seven years. That Scotch mechanic was receiving as a skilled mechanic $7 a week during the long days of summer and $6 during the short days of winter. He said, "I am supporting myself, wife, and 11 children on those wages." The same mechanic at Newport News receives $25 a week. And yet, in the debate on the woolen schedule, we were told here that there was practically no difference in the standard of wages and earning capacity and output, and so forth, of American and foreign workingmen.

I went into one of the largest hotels in Europe. In that country not only do the men work at low wages, but every member of the family must work—women and children. The little girls deliver the morning papers in the great cities. They deliver the milk and baker's supplies. They all work. There stood behind the counter of that hotel, the third largest in a city with almost a million population, a young girl who was clerk. She kept the books, assigned the guests to the rooms, and she told me her hours of labor were from 8.30 in the morning until midnight. She said, "When we have a public function or a banquet in this hotel I retire at 2 o'clock in the morning." Her wages were $150 a year.

In my town, the best town in America—Knoxville, Tenn.—with 80,000 people, the leading hotel there has two men doing the work that this one girl does across the ocean, and they pay these two men more for a month's work than that girl is paid for 12 months' work. And yet Members tell us that conditions are such that we can compete in the markets of the world with the poorer-paid and half-starved workingmen in Europe and the Orient. It is not true. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will my friend from Tennessee allow me to make a contribution to his chapter of experiences?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. AUSTIN. With pleasure.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Last year I came to a little town in the central part of Germany and found an advertisement in one of the papers to this effect: "Wanted, a carpenter; wages, 29 pfennigs an hour." That is German pfennigs, one-quarter of an American cent. Twenty-nine pfennigs an hour! That means 7¼ cents an hour; while our carpenters are on strike now in several large cities of the country, demanding 60 cents an hour, which is nearly eight times as much as that advertisement. And that advertisement must have offered exceptionally large wages in order to secure a man quickly; at least, that was my supposition.

Then I went into a metal factory there, and learned that the metal workers employed there were receiving from 8 to 10 marks a week, which is from $2 to $2.50, while American laboring men employed in the same industry are receiving for the same work, but working fewer hours, from ten to fifteen dollars a week.

Mr. AUSTIN. I thank the gentleman from Missouri. Now, I will yield to the genial Member from New York [Mr. REDFIELD].

Mr. REDFIELD. I am particularly interested in what my valued friend from Tennessee said about the shipyard at Newport News. I am particularly glad that he mentioned the high wages that are paid at Newport News, because the general manager of the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. told me within two years that he could build war ships there as cheaply as any yard in Europe. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. AUSTIN. He said he could; but the fact is they are not building ships at Newport News or anywhere else in America as cheaply as they are in Europe and Japan. The Democratic Members of this House have for years attempted to put through bills admitting free entry of ships built abroad, giving as a reason that the cost of construction was so much less in foreign countries than in America. I believe it was the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] who said in a recent tariff speech that we could make goods as cheaply in this country as in foreign lands, and yet the Japanese have driven our cotton manufacturers out of China and taken from us in that country alone orders for cotton goods amounting to $24,000,000 or $25,000,000 per annum.

Mr. REDFIELD. And yet our exports of cotton manufactured goods increased 20 per cent last year.

Mr. AUSTIN. Our exports of cotton manufactured goods last year fell below our cotton exports for the year 1906 $19,546,936. Our exports last year over the year before were only $518,531, and $1,800,000 increase in our exports last year resulted in the Republican tariff law passed by the Sixty-first Congress for the Philippine Islands. Not counting the increase of sales in the Philippine Islands, which belong to our country, the records show that our exports to foreign countries last year fell below those of the previous year by $800,000, and hence the gentleman from New York is in error in stating that they showed an increase of 20 per cent.

Now, I was visited during a year and four months as our consul at Glasgow, Scotland, by 114 stranded American citizens. I gave an order to the clerks to admit every man who desired to see me. They said, "You do not mean stranded Americans—hoboes and cattlemen?" I said, "Yes; they are the very men I want to see. They are in a foreign land, in distress, and they want to see their representative. If they do not see him, they will think they have a mean country and a very poor consul." So I came into personal contact with 114, and by patience, work, and the expenditure of personal funds I succeeded in getting every one of them back to God's country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The story of every one of these men, some of whom were students—and one of whom was a negro cattleman from North Carolina—was that they could not procure an hour's work in that country. And it was literally true.

President Abraham Lincoln said—and his statement has been quoted here in debate—that he did not know anything about the tariff. When we look back at that great figure in our history, how large does he loom up before us as a wise statesman and as a devoted patriot. In his trying days in handling the great and complicated affairs of this country, in its greatest crisis, he admitted that he knew nothing about the tariff. I doubt if we could find a man on that side of the Chamber who would make such an admission to-day. The great Lincoln said he knew nothing about the tariff, but he did know that if we bought steel rails in Europe, we had the rails and they had the money, but that if we bought American steel rails, we had the rails and we had the money. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Let me tell you the most striking evidence of the fact that wages are better here; that conditions for the laboring people are more desirable here than elsewhere; that opportunities are more boundless; that there is more happiness and prosperity and contentment beneath our starry flag than in all other countries. The evidence is that they are flocking here from every known land and clime at the rate of a million a year. [Applause.] Is there any immigration to Great Britain, whose cities are teeming with idle working people, where, in order to keep them from starving they must vote pensions out of the national treasury? Are the artisans, the mechanics, and the laboring men facing toward Great Britain, where they have a tariff for revenue only? No; America is attracting the sons of men all around the globe. Let us continue to keep our fair land for the American workingman and make his standard higher, his condition better, his happiness more extended and secure than that of the people of any other land. This ought to be the inspiring object and aim of every man who sits in this House of Representatives. Oh, let us forget partisanship and remember our common country, its destiny, its future, and the happiness of all its people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

APPENDIX.

LETTER OF SUBMITTAL.

CHARLOTTE, N. C., July 18, 1911.

SIR: For the information of all concerned, the official correspondence of the tariff committee, following the presentment of its brief to Chairman O. W. UNDERWOOD, of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, is herewith submitted.

Many letters acknowledging receipt of our tariff bulletins, Nos. 1 and 2, from Senators and Congressmen are not included, although the form of our letter transmitting bulletins to them is given.

Respectfully,

STUART W. CRAMER.

To Mr. R. M. MILLER, Jr., Chairman.

CHAIRMAN MILLER'S CORRESPONDENCE WITH MR. UNDERWOOD.

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 10, 1911.

Mr. R. M. MILLER, Jr.,
Chairman Tariff Committee, Charlotte, N. C.

DEAR SIR: I acknowledge receipt of the brief which you have submitted to this committee on behalf of the joint tariff committee of the Arkwright Club, the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association, and of the National Association of Cotton Manufacturers, urging that a revision of Schedule I be not undertaken at this time, and requesting in the event that this schedule is taken up that your committee be granted a hearing.

In reply, I have to assure you that your brief, as well as your request, will be brought to the attention of this committee and the same will have consideration at the proper time.

Very truly, yours,

O. W. UNDERWOOD, Chairman.

[Telegram.]

CHARLOTTE, N. C., June 30, 1911.

Hon. O. W. UNDERWOOD,
Chairman Ways and Means Committee, Washington, D. C.:

Please do not overlook the fact that our committee is hoping for the hearing about which you wrote me on the 10th instant. We can appear at any time you say on three or four days' notice by wire, as some of our members live far south. As we have been holding ourselves in readiness to go, awaiting your advices for two to three weeks, we would now esteem it a great favor if you could indicate by telegram, collect, about when you would like us to appear.

R. M. MILLER, Jr., Chairman.

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 1, 1911.

Mr. R. M. MILLER, Jr.,
Charlotte, N. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Your night telegram reached me yesterday.

It will be some time next week before there is another meeting of the Ways and Means Committee. I will then let you know at what time it will be advisable for your committee to come to Washington.

Yours, truly,

O. W. UNDERWOOD, Chairman.

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 6, 1911.

Mr. R. M. MILLER, Jr.,
Charlotte, N. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee had its first meeting on the cotton schedule this morning. After looking over the facts before us and the briefs, they concluded not to go into general hearings on the subject.

I am in receipt of the brief you have already filed with the committee, and it will receive careful attention. Should you desire to place further facts before us, I will be glad to receive them personally, or by letter, as you desire. We will probably be at work on the cotton schedule for the next 10 days before reaching any final conclusion in reference to the matter.

Yours, very truly, O. W. UNDERWOOD, Chairman.

CHARLOTTE, N. C., July 8, 1911.

Hon. O. W. UNDERWOOD,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I beg to own the receipt of your favor of the 6th and to express my regret, personally and on behalf of our committee, at the decision of the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee not to allow any general hearings on the cotton schedule. I shall acquaint my committee at once of your decision.

The industry we represent is of such vast importance to our country—the invested interest involved is so large—the thousands of wage earners are so dependent—that the results might prove disastrous to us, and the decision of our Representatives not to hear us in defense of our industry seems unfortunate and very much to be regretted.

Yours, very truly,

R. M. MILLER, Jr., Chairman.

CHARLOTTE, N. C., July 10, 1911.

Hon. O. W. UNDERWOOD,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Referring further to your favor of 6th instant, we have recently prepared a couple of tariff bulletins, one of which has already been presented to you and the other is ready for your committee.

While thanking you for the opportunity to discuss the matter with you personally, we prefer to accept your alternative offer to receive what we have to say by letter. We feel that it is to the interest of all parties concerned to let it become a matter of record.

We therefore hand you our tariff bulletin No. 2 and an extra copy of tariff bulletin No. 1, copies of which we will to-morrow mail to the other members of your committee. As we have not had time to discuss your letter among ourselves, we awaiting the hearing, and each of us planning to speak for himself, it will of necessity take some little further time to decide what more we wish to say as a committee. We will therefore supplement this with other communications from time to time, and beg to remain,

Yours, very truly,

R. M. MILLER, Jr., Chairman.

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 11, 1911.

R. M. MILLER, Jr.,
Chairman Tariff Committee, Charlotte, N. C.

DEAR SIR: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 10th instant, transmitting one copy each of your tariff bulletins Nos. 1 and 2, which will receive the careful attention and consideration of myself and of the Ways and Means Committee.

Very truly, yours,

O. W. UNDERWOOD, Chairman.

THE TARIFF COMMITTEE'S REPLY TO CHAIRMAN UNDERWOOD.

Resolutions adopted by the tariff committee of the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association at its meeting in Charlotte, N. C., Tuesday, July 18, 1911, called by the chairman to consider communications from Chairman UNDERWOOD relating to a revision of the tariff on cotton manufactures:

"Resolved, That this committee indorses the communications of its chairman to Chairman UNDERWOOD and to other Congressmen and Senators.

"That the chairman is instructed to reply further to Chairman UNDERWOOD as per the appended letter.

"That this committee indorses tariff bulletins Nos. 1 and 2, and instructs that bulletin No. 3 be issued comprising the official correspondence with Mr. UNDERWOOD and a copy of these resolutions.

"And that all three tariff bulletins be sent to the President of the United States, to the Vice President, to all Members of the Senate and House of Representatives, to the press, and to all cotton mills in the United States."

CHARLOTTE, N. C., July 18, 1911.

Mr. O. W. UNDERWOOD,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: As instructed by the tariff committee of the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association, which met here in Charlotte to-day, I have the honor to reply further to your favor of the 6th instant, stating our position on proposed legislation relating to Schedule I, cotton manufactures, as follows:

(1) We are opposed to any revision that will increase the percentage of importations to total United States cotton manufactures that now exists.

In figuring percentages of importations to manufactures we call attention to the fact that importations under the cotton-manufactures schedule were 17¼ per cent of the total cotton manufactures for the year 1910, including laces and other such luxuries that are not as yet made in great quantity in this country, although it is interesting to note that the manufacture of laces in the United States increased in value from $3,500,000 in 1900 to nearly $10,000,000 in 1910.

We believe that any way it may be considered that the present importations are sufficient to protect the consumer by regulating prices, for there is no monopoly or restraint of trade, but, on the contrary, the keenest competition among cotton manufacturers of the United States.

We do not believe that anything more regulative of prices can be secured, however much importations may be increased, for American manufacturers are already down to cost, and without radical cutting of wages, which is not believed could or should be effected, the chief result of legislating more foreign goods into this country would be only to transfer that work to foreigners, for the importers do not usually undersell a local market, except enough to bring in their goods.

We believe that the cotton schedule bears its share of the customs revenue for the support of the Government and that there is no call for increasing the amount collected under it.

(2) We are opposed to revision without adequate data.

(3) We offer our assistance in obtaining such data.

(4) We are in favor of such revision as will protect all classifications under the schedule primarily in proportion to their labor costs, and are especially in favor of simplification of the schedule.

(5) We are opposed to any revision that does not take into account differences in other conditions as well as labor costs, particularly on account of southern mill conditions.

(6) We are opposed to reductions of duty on machinery and other items entering into the cost of mills, except such as will keep them on a parity with our own industry as to labor and other costs at home and abroad. We do not want our property depreciated, nor do we want broadly to injure other industries to help our own. Let each case rest on its merits and benefit equally.

(7) We are opposed to personal hearings; too often it has been alleged that unfair advantage has been taken that way in making the tariffs of the past.

(8) We are in favor of publicity and record, and of the freest and most open discussion and consideration of everything relating to tariff making.

(9) We demand that the data upon which revision is based be made public and a matter of record, except with such concealment of names that good faith dictates with those furnishing data. If publicity is good for other things, and we believe it is, it certainly is desirable in such a vitally important matter as the tariff.

We also demand a definite statement as to just what it is intended by its makers that the revision shall accomplish:

(a) What measure of protection is it intended to afford to American cotton manufacturers—equality in labor cost only, equality in cost of production, or what?

(b) How much relative increase or decrease is intended in importations, which means how much more or less competition is it intended to impose upon us?

(c) If more competition, how are we expected to meet it?

(d) If we are expected to cut labor, how is that labor to be compensated for the reduction, and what can it definitely expect in lesser cost of living to offset the cut?

(e) What amount of revenue is the new tariff on cotton manufactures expected to yield?

(f) What reduction is expected, if any, in the cost of articles of cotton manufacture to the consumer at retail stores?

We ask consideration of the above in the spirit in which it is offered. We intend no reflection; we merely ask to have our way pointed out by those who make the way.

We beg to have it borne in mind that our industry directly concerns 2,000,000 people, and indirectly many more; that we are not simply manufacturers and employees asking protection for our property and our labor, but that we are consumers and that we are citizens, most of whom voted for the party proposing this revision and who expected not only that any revisions would be made with as much prudence as would be exercised in private business matters, but also that they would be conducted with all the publicity that was generally promised among other reforms.

We beg to remain, respectfully, yours,

R. M. MILLER, Jr., Chairman.

FORM OF LETTER SENT TO ALL SENATORS AND CONGRESSMEN.

CHARLOTTE, N. C., July 11, 1911.

DEAR SIR: We earnestly invite your attention to the two inclosed pamphlets, entitled "Tariff Bulletins, Nos. 1 and 2."

They were hastily prepared by the tariff committee of the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association in anticipation of a hearing before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, at which time it was intended that they should be presented with the individual statements of our members.

We have just been advised, however, by Chairman UNDERWOOD that the Democratic members of his committee have concluded not to hold any general hearings, and that we must either present our views to him personally or by correspondence. We chose the latter alternative and forwarded copies of these bulletins to him.

We feel that the interests of stockholders, officers, employees, and their families, numbering nearly 2,000,000, and the interests of so many more indirectly concerned will be better served by open discussion rather than by personal conferences, even with our friends.

Without comment, we wish also to submit these bulletins to you and others, with the request that you give to our case whatever consideration that in your judgment it merits.

We take the liberty of requesting that you preserve these bulletins, as they are but the first of a series that we contemplate issuing, as we are all deeply concerned in this matter and mean to do all in our power during the next few years to remove from politics the welfare of this great industry, by full and free discussion of the tariff question and of all others so vitally affecting it.

Yours, very truly, R. M. MILLER, Jr., Chairman.

A FEW SAMPLE QUESTIONS.

To members of the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association:

Why should the cotton industry be selected for tariff revision among the first, when its products have advanced least of all the great commodities during the past 10 years?

How many members of the Ways and Means Committee would risk a decision based upon the actual knowledge they now possess with which to revise the cotton schedule were it private business and in which were concerned their all, whether it be property or employment?

Is it any more unreasonable that all the facts upon which to base a revision of the cotton tariff be published than that a court makes public record of the testimony upon which it bases its findings in dealing with property or the employment rights of citizens?

"Those thousands of pages of hearings taken two years ago?" Would that kind of testimony be considered competent in any court? Is that adequate investigation? And was its sufficiency and kind admitted then by the minority, the present majority? Are they prepared to now indorse it, even when it is two years out of date?

Is the cotton industry really suffering? Is it really depressed as never before in its history? No one disputes that, but some legislators tell us that the present depression in cotton manufacturing is due to overproduction—too much supply, too little demand. How will letting in more foreign-made goods help that condition? Will it enable us to manufacture at a profit? Will it give regular employment to our operatives who now suffer on account of shutdowns and curtailment? If not, who will benefit by it? Will it not be the foreign manufacturers and the foreign operatives?

Is the situation going to be saved by the expected bumper cotton crop? It may be for a while, if cotton goes down and goods do not follow it; but would it not be temporary if many workers leave the mills and go back to the farms, more cotton crops becoming bumper crops and the old level of low-priced cotton reached? But again, who will profit? Will the farmer by having the price of his staple crop revised downward? Will the merchant by having the purchasing power of so many of his customers revised downward? Will not those operatives who remain in the mills and accept the revision downward in their wages want to know why it should be deemed legislatively necessary, when, as a class, the manufacturers themselves have operated for the past two years with no profit, and many at a loss, without cutting wages?

COMMITTEE.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, on last Saturday afternoon this House was entertained for an hour with the discussion of a pension bill by the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. SHERWOOD]. I take it that that gentleman would not have taken that hour, nor would I take this time now to talk of pension legislation, if the Democratic majority would allow any other time for the discussion of pension legislation or would allow any time whatever for definite action thereon.

On last Saturday afternoon the honored chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, Mr. SHERWOOD, of Ohio, addressed the House; and in passing let me say there is no man desirous of paying higher honor to the chairman of that committee than I am. I recognize his signal ability and his splendid record in civil life and in the military affairs of this Government. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, I do not rise to discuss the merits of the several pension bills introduced, but I do rise to emphasize my belief and my desire that some pension legislation should be had in behalf of the old soldiers at this session of Congress.

During the address of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] he made a number of statements, some of which I would like to quote at this time.

Referring to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, he said:

The next meeting of the committee was on the 5th of May, a regular, called meeting, of which every member of the committee was notified by letter.

And a few lines further on he said:

After a general debate, in which every member of the committee was free to participate, a formal vote was taken, resulting in 2 votes for the Adair bill, 1 for the Sulloway bill, 1 for the Anderson bill, and 7 for the dollar-a-day bill, known as House bill No. 1. Thus the dollar-a-day bill became the duly approved bill of the Invalid Pensions Committee.

I desire to call the attention of the Democratic majority at this time to the fact that that action was taken by the Committee on Invalid Pensions almost three months ago. The chairman himself said the committee met May 5 and agreed to report House bill No. 1, and yet three months have passed without anything being done. Eighty-six days have gone by since the committee was first ready with its report. No action has been taken, and the report has not been permitted to see the light of any legislative day.

Further on he says:

By authority of the House caucus (only one dissenting vote) the pension bill known as House bill No. 1 will be reported from the Invalid Pensions Committee and placed on the calendar before the end of this session.

This will be done, probably, very near the end of this session, and perhaps with the very particular purpose of avoiding any pension legislation during this session of Congress.

I would also call the attention of this House to the fact that there are more than 3,000 soldiers of the Civil War passing away each month; that every 30 days there are more than thirty hundred of these old soldiers that are placed beyond earthly relief. In the 87 days during which the majority has kept this House from acting on any pension bill, about 9,000 veterans have departed this life, without having had the comforts this extra relief would have furnished. If you wait, as you are preparing to do, until next session of Congress to pass this bill, one year will have passed after this promised relief was agreed upon, and thirty-five to forty thousand men, heroes every one, will have gone to "fame's eternal camping ground," but without the promised and expected extra care. There are approximately 550,000 men on the Civil War pension rolls, the honor rolls of our country, and every day's delay in promised pension legislation—which your Committee on Invalid Pensions is ready to report—means the withholding of so much additional comfort from 550,000 old but brave and deserving men for their declining days.

Gentlemen, there is nothing to me in the argument that the Senate will not do one thing or another. It is the responsibility that this House has that I am concerned in. I want to do my manifest duty and I ask you to do yours. If you mean what you have said then let this bill be brought forth now that it may be acted upon. I believe this House should do everything it can to bring about at this session such pension legislation as has been promised—such legislation as should be passed for the relief of the soldiers of the sixties. When the House shall have passed a bill the responsibility is with the Senate; until then the responsibility is almost wholly yours. Gentlemen, in the name of every man that ever wore his country's uniform, in the name of every man who desires justice done I appeal to you for legislative action at this session. Pension legislation should be had now. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the statements made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, when he attempted to plead a justification for the presentation of H. R. 12812.

While his statements attacking the existing law won the plaudits of his partisan adherents, his auditors were so mystified by the puzzling figures with which he endeavored to enforce his arguments I fear that very few, if any, of them would be able to repeat the conclusions he adduced, without having the official copy of his remarks before them.

The district which honors me with its confidence contains more than one-fourth of the cotton spindles in the United States, and the city of Fall River, Mass., where I reside, has more than one-seventh of the nearly 28,000,000 cotton spindles in the country.

One hundred years ago the first cotton mill was erected there, and from June 19 to June 24 the hundredth anniversary of the erection of the first cotton mill was there celebrated.

There are 111 cotton mills in that city to-day, containing, to be exact, 3,936,944 spindles. There were, in 1910, in the United States 1,713 cotton mills, containing 27,978,732 spindles, 910 of which are in the Northern States, 803 in the Southern States, 706 in New England, and, as before stated, 111 in Fall River, Mass. Consequently any legislation affecting this great industry must be far-reaching in its results to the 270,000 persons whom I have the honor to represent on this floor.

My father and mother were married in Natchez, Miss. I am a native of the State of Illinois, but I have lived in Fall River since 1844. My father was induced to locate there because it was believed by his friends and relatives that it was destined to be a great cotton manufacturing center and it is the largest cotton manufacturing city in the country to-day.

It then had a population of about 8,000 and now it has a population of 120,000. There are 34,000 operatives employed in the mills of Fall River, Mass., and over 30,000 employed in New Bedford, Mass., each of whom are vitally interested in the continuous operation and prosperous condition of the mills in which they are employed, and I hardly think they would applaud the sentiments so flippantly expressed by the gentleman from Alabama when he disposed of some of the questions propounded to him, by the promise that while there might be a depression in the cotton industry at this time, there was an intimation of sunshine and promise in the days which are to come when normal conditions are to be reached.

These operatives are not calling for a reduction of duties on cotton goods in order to furnish more employment for the mill operatives in Great Britain, Continental Europe, India, Japan, or China; and no amount of argument put forth by gentlemen on the other side of the aisle regarding the cheapness with which goods can be produced abroad and sent to the markets of the United States will prove effective with them for they realize that the greater amount of goods manufactured abroad and passing through the customhouses of this country means so much less employment to them and so much less purchasing power to them to provide the necessities and comforts of life produced by the farmer or the artisans and mechanics in other lines of industry.

I am competent to speak upon broad lines on this subject, for I do not own a single share of stock in a single cotton mill. The glowing statements of the enormous profits in the cotton industry sounded like fairy tales to me.

The price of print cloths, 64 by 64, which are largely manufactured in the city where I reside, are quoted at 3§ cents per yard; market dull.

The highest price of print cloth during the year 1910 was 4¼ cents per yard, and the lowest price was 3¾ cents per yard, and the price of cotton per pound varied from 14.95 cents per pound to 15.90 cents per pound during that period. The margin for profit, I believe, would be hard to discover, even with the most improved Democratic magnifying glasses.

That there have been profits in the manufacture of cotton goods it would be folly to deny, and I certainly hope there may be prosperous times to be enjoyed in the future. But we have been told by the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle that the tariff does not create prosperity, but that the prosperity which has been enjoyed since the passage of the Dingley Tariff Act was not the result of legislation, but the prosperity was due to the enormous crops and the purchasing power of the farmer made it possible for the country to enjoy a large measure of business success during the past 12 years. We have the promise of a great cotton crop. Wheat, corn, oats, and barley and other products of the soil promise good results, but the people are not demanding cotton goods to cover their nakedness, and the spindles do not continually hum, and in many cases would be entirely silent but for the fact that the number of cotton operatives are not in excess of the ordinary demand, and the manufacturer is compelled to keep his plant running in order that his operatives may not become too widely scattered in case there should be a future demand for the goods, which at this time are being stored for the future market because they can not be sold to-day.

It is very evident to me that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means is not a cotton-mill owner, and possibly few, if any, of his associates are who helped to formulate this bill, which is so framed as to provide work for those in other lands, in order that the beauties of a tariff for revenue may be exemplified. These gentlemen have no other than a theoretical idea of the great cotton-manufacturing industry, which, I may add, requires skill, patience, and ability to guide it safely over the financial shoals and panics which frequently confront those who devote their lives to the upbuilding of communities and to the securing of reasonable and proper return for the moneys invested by stockholders who confide in the judgment and experience of managers of mill corporations.

Mr. Chairman, when I consider the glowing promises of my friend from Alabama as to the future prospects for the cotton-manufacturing industry of America, and his suggestion that the consumers would receive benefits to the value of more than $200,000,000 by the enactment of the pending bill, not to-day or to-morrow, but in the dim and distant future, when the wages and methods of living produce the normal conditions which exist in the countries beyond the ocean blue, from which our forefathers came to seek the better conditions afforded by the great country to which they swore allegiance and fidelity, there comes to my mind a sign which once adorned the place of business of one of my constituents. He was a son of the Emerald Isle, who left the land of his fathers and settled in the city where I reside. The sign reads as follows: "Something for nothing to-morrow at Michael Rafferty's."

That is a more distinctive promise than that made by my colleague from Alabama, and furthermore it is not clouded by the abundance of platitudes or the conglomeration of figures with which the latter gentleman regaled this body when he presented his conclusions on the pending bill.

I recall the fact that in the presidential election of 1852 the Democratic Party won a notable victory at the polls. Franklin Pierce, of New Hampshire, was elected President, and the Democratic Party was in full control of the administration.

I assume that the conditions were normal during the period of four years from March 4, 1853, to March 4, 1857.

I presume that but few Members of this body can recall the conditions which existed in this country in the year 1856, excepting when their memories are enlightened by historical research.

I doubt not my colleague from Illinois, ex-Speaker CANNON, realized those conditions more vividly than even I did by experience. I was then a youth, looking out hopefully upon the business world, ambitious to become one of the business men in the community. In October of that year I sought employment in a store. My hours were from 7 o'clock in the morning until 6 o'clock at night two days in the week and until 9 o'clock at night three days in the week and 10.30 o'clock at night on Saturdays. My wages were $1 per week. I lived with my parents.

That was the prevailing wages for beginners in the business world, and conditions were normal. Whether these normal conditions are the conditions which our friend from Alabama promises we shall enjoy, I know not; but I recall that as the result of the presidential election in November of that year James Buchanan became President of the United States and we had a full-fledged Democratic administration, a calamity that did not again occur in its entirety until the presidential election of 1892, after which time, for a period of four years, the Democratic Party controlled the executive and legislative branches of the Government. Early in 1857 there was a money panic the like of which I can not recall to my memory. All industry was paralyzed, especially the cotton industry, and for nine long months not a single spindle in Fall River, Mass., furnished employment to any of the operatives of the city. The prevailing wages for unskilled laborers was 50 and 60 cents per day, and employment was so limited that the city was compelled to furnish employment upon public works and payments were made by orders on storekeepers, through the poor department, because of the scarcity of money, and soup houses were established to feed the starving population.

The merchant by whom I was employed failed in business, and I was thrown out of employment and became a farmer, working upon an acre of land belonging to my father, and was unable to obtain employment for wages again until 1858, when I again engaged in another line of business, but at the prevailing rate of wages under normal conditions which continued to exist under the administration of President Buchanan, viz, $1 per week. I sincerely hope that while we are awaiting the resumption of normal conditions, which we are promised by our Democratic leader will only arrive in the dim and distant future, the date of which he does not even predict, no young man will be compelled to accept the scale or standard of wages which existed from 1856 to 1858.

I will not recall the troubles, trials, and disappointments of the Democratic administration from 1857 to 1861.

With the advent of the Republican Party in power in 1861 the protective tariff was enacted, and it has been largely effective since that date.

Mr. Chairman, I have never known of such a scale of wages prevailing as marked the period from March 4, 1857, to March 4, 1861, or of such a long period of lack of employment as marked the history of that memorable Democratic administration.

Mr. Chairman, for the first time since 1861 the cotton manufacturing industry has been singled out for attack by the Democratic majority in the Sixty-second Congress.

There is no other industry in the country which can show as small a margin of profit in a general sense as the cotton industry. That there have been phenomenal cases where conditions in the purchase of raw material, ability in management of the plant, and fortunate conditions have prevailed in disposing of the product at limited periods where the business has been profitable, but those conditions have been the exception and not the inflexible rule. Foreign competition will make the conditions in the United States disastrous to the ordinary manufacturer and injurious to the more successful and prosperous manufacturer.

It has frequently been the experience of the cotton operative that long-continued depression and disastrous conditions to the manufacturer result in a reduction in the wage scale, for that is an element of cost that is most easily attackable when competition becomes so keen that profits are eliminated.

The competition is, and has been, so keen for a long period in the cotton industry in our own country that prices of cloth and yarn, except in particular and especial lines, show but a small margin of profit, and nearly all the cotton mills in New England are running short time because of continued tariff agitation and unscientific methods used in preparing the pending bill and the failure to hold any hearings thereon.

When the Wilson tariff law was enacted the Committee on Ways and Means gave patient hearings to manufacturers and operatives, and they gladly accepted information from a committee sent from the city where I reside, which enabled them to report a tariff schedule which properly and sufficiently protected the manufacturer and operative in this important industry, and the industry prospered under that portion of the Wilson tariff law. If the Democratic Party had displayed the same wisdom and care in the preparation of other schedules of the Wilson bill, they would have come much nearer toward retaining the confidence of the country.

In addition to the errors shown in many schedules of the Wilson bill, their vagaries on the currency question brought to them overwhelming defeat in the election of 1896, and from that date until the election of 1910 the country has expressed a lack of confidence in its ability to solve the problems of government which arise through the changing conditions which confront the people of this country to a greater extent than any other or all other nations of the earth are called upon to endure.

The Dingley tariff law in its relation to the cotton schedules was the same as were the cotton schedules contained in the Wilson law, and at no time in the history of the cotton industry has there been such continued success and prosperity in that industry as marked the period to which I have alluded.

The cotton-goods schedules prepared by the Committee on Ways and Means of this House in the Payne Tariff Act were practically unchanged when that bill was sent from this body to the north end of the Capitol.

In another body it was deemed wise to make many important changes in the bill to meet the changing conditions in the industry and to provide for checkmating and reducing the competition from the fine cotton-goods industry in foreign countries. I listened to the debates that took place at that time, and certainly from samples of goods shown and facts given as to the construction of the law by appraisers and decisions of the courts there appeared to me to be ample reason for a more specific and definite tariff to be determined in order that the fine goods industry in this country might receive more ample and definite protection from the competition of the manufacturers from abroad.

Amendments were offered and were finally considered in a conference between the committees of the two Houses, and the Payne-Aldrich Act was enacted into law.

The principal objections to the cotton schedules of that measure came from the interests of the importers, wholesalers, and the large department stores of the country. The newspapers, on account of dissatisfaction arising from the wood-pulp and print-paper schedules, very largely joined hands with the importing interests in attacks upon the bill. The importers are an important aggregation of business men in New York and other large business centers. They have no interest or sympathy with those who toil for their daily bread, nor are they engaged in promoting or encouraging the manufacturing industries of the United States, because they find their most profitable occupation to discredit the tariff laws of the United States and also to make it easier to bring into our seaports the products of other countries where the wages paid the employees are smaller and the cost of maintenance and fixed charges of the manufacturing plants are less than those of similar establishments in the United States.

These men are alert, sharp, and naturally they endeavor to provide for their own households, and they do not give consideration to American interest preferentially over the interests of the foreigner, and therefore they become powerful allies with the free traders, tariff reformers, and incidentally they naturally gravitate to the Democratic Party in its present efforts to destroy the tariff wall which has for so long a period defended the interests of American industries and American labor. I have read the earnest appeals of the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association, whose headquarters are at Charlotte, N. C., addressed to the chairman and members of the Committee on Ways and Means asking that they would give heed to their demand that the cotton schedule should not be subject to a radical revision without granting to these important factors in the development of the southern cotton industry an opportunity to appear before the committee and present facts for their consideration. If I am correctly informed this request was denied.

One of the most prominent and successful manufacturers in the district which I have the honor to represent is Mr. Walter H. Langshaw, president and agent of the Dartmouth & Bristol Mills, of New Bedford, Mass., who expressed some criticisms of the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act, and it was quite natural that Chairman UNDERWOOD, of the Committee on Ways and Means, should look to him for aid and assistance in destroying the effectiveness of that act.

Mr. Langshaw wrote to Mr. UNDERWOOD expressing his inability to aid in preparing the schedules of the pending bill, because of the complex nature of the work and lack of time to properly prepare for such an important undertaking. Mr. Langshaw further expresses his regret that men connected with the dry goods committee, comprised largely of importers, had been engaged for the purpose of assisting in making a new cotton schedule, and he informs Mr. UNDERWOOD that he would not wish to be identified with men whose interests lie so diametrically opposed to those of investors in this country, and whose statements are the best evidence of their ignorance on the subject. As for a revision by politicians, Mr. Langshaw states he has no patience with that. Mr. Langshaw also further adds that he esteems the time too limited at the present session of Congress to do the work justice, and he further states that he does not want, either directly or indirectly, to be identified with such bungling as has been done in the past or with any action for which political expediency is a dominating factor. This plain language from a successful manufacturer ought to be carefully considered.

I also quote the following interview with Mr. John Hobin, secretary of the Textile Council of the City of New Bedford, Mass., as taken from the New Bedford Evening Standard of July 26, 1911:

OPERATIVES INTERESTED—FEAR RADICAL REDUCTION IN TARIFF ON COTTONS—NOT OPPOSED, HOWEVER, TO SLIGHT LOWERING OF RATES TO LEVEL OF THE DINGLEY BILL—INCREASES NOT ASKED FOR HAVE PROVED DETRIMENTAL TO THE MILL WORKERS.

That the textile operatives of this city and of other cotton manufacturing centers strenuously object to the proposed radical reductions in the cotton schedule, although they insist that some reductions should be made, is the opinion of John Hobin, secretary of the textile council of this city. While cotton manufacturers, converters, finishers, importers, and politicians are quarreling over what should be done with the cotton schedule—which was presumably framed to protect the wage earner in American cotton mills—this expression of opinion from a prominent official of the labor men themselves ought to have interest:

"When the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill was under discussion," Mr. Hobin said yesterday, "the textile unions joined with the manufacturers in a petition that the cotton schedules be retained at the existing level. That was all they wanted, and, through the delegation that the United Textile Workers sent down to Washington, all they asked. They certainly did not want the duties pushed up higher, as was done. So they are consistent when they ask that the cotton schedules be reduced.

"We feel that the raising of the duties is as injurious to the wage earner as would be a serious reduction in them. By the undue elevation of the duties, the converters and retailers have been permitted to charge prices for the cloth so high as to place them comparatively out of reach of a large part of the consumers. We believe that the retention of the present abnormally high duties can not fail to produce such high prices for cloth as to limit the market and force curtailment in the industry.

"But, on the other hand," Mr. Hobin continued, "we protest against the reduction of duties to the extent proposed by the Democrats. In saying this I am not raising a party issue nor talking from a political standpoint. I believe that the textile operatives as a whole feel the same way, irrespective of politics. We are very much afraid that the party in power at Washington is going to injure us as seriously by reductions in the tariff as the other party did by undue elevations of it.

"Personally, I favor very much President Taft's scheme of submitting this matter to a Tariff Commission. The cotton schedule ought to be capable of scientific adjustment, and in my opinion this is the best solution of the problem."

The depressed condition of the cotton industry must be apparent to anyone who makes only a cursory examination at any cotton-manufacturing center. I will not weary this committee with many statements on this subject. I will, however, state that nearly every mill throughout New England has been curtailing their products for many months because of inability to dispose of the same.

The owner of seven of the largest and most modern mills in my own city, who can produce print cloths at the lowest actual cost of any manufacturer and who is himself a large buyer in the open market in order that he may procure a sufficient supply for the use of his own cloth-printing establishment and who has never heretofore felt compelled to run his cotton mills upon short time, announced about two months ago that owing to the purchase of immense supply of print cloths at prices below even his cost of manufacture his seven mills would work but half time until further notice.

The effect of this action I will not attempt to describe, but if any member of this body thinks that the action of the Democratic caucus in indorsing the pending bill is an efficient remedy for the depression in the cotton industry a frank expression of opinion to that effect would certainly be illuminating.

The pending bill proposes to benefit the consumer by creating greater competition for the American manufacturer by reducing the tariff on imports to such an extent that the American manufacturer will be compelled to lower his cost of production to enable him to meet this new element of competition. As previously stated, there were, in 1910, 1,713 cotton mills, all constructed at high cost of labor, material, and machinery; very much higher in cost than our foreign competitors are called upon to pay. These mills are too costly and are built of too heavy material to be removed from their present locations, even if more favorable locations could be obtained, and these facts ought to receive consideration when new elements of competition are to be suddenly forced upon the investor by the proposed radical reduction of the tariff.

The proposed revision of the tariff affects every one of these 1,713 cotton mills in the United States and every one of the vast number of operatives in the different mills in many States of the Union, but it more directly and unfavorably affects the finer grades of yarns and finer qualites of cotton cloth than any other product of the industry, for the importations have been in the past, and will continue to be in the future, on the finer qualities of production, and the amount of the importations will, in the judgment of every manufacturer and operative whose views I have seen quoted, exceed by manyfold the estimate quoted by the chairman of the committee in presenting the proposed bill.

New Bedford, Mass., is the center of the fine-yarn and fine-goods industry in the United States, and although Fall River, Mass., exceeds it in number of cotton spindles, it ranks second in the production of fine yarns and fine goods. These two great cotton centers will be called upon to bear the greater burden which the reduction of the tariff proposed in this bill will impose upon any community in the United States. I protest against this proposed iniquitous legislation in the name of and in behalf of every man, woman, and child in the district which I have the honor to represent on this floor.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does not the gentleman think that the industry would be benefited very materially if the tariff of 45 per cent on cotton-mill machinery was reduced?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I am not going to discuss that question.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not a fact that 50 per cent of the cost of the erection of a cotton mill is the expense of the cotton-mill machinery?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I am not going to discuss that. If the gentleman wants to go down to the level of other countries, he can drop the price of machinery and cloth and every other industry in this country.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not desire to drop the prices, but I do not desire, by legislation, to add to the improper price of the article, whether it is manufactured or not.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I am glad to have the gentleman's views. I know what they were beforehand.

During the year 1909 more than $10,000,000 additional capital was invested in the fine yarn and fine goods industry in the city of New Bedford, and more than $6,000,000 was invested in that city during the year 1910. More than 16 mills in number were added to the number that the city formerly contained. They use the finer grades of sea-island and Egyptian cotton and the better grades of American cotton, and their product is very largely of the quality heretofore imported. The reduction of the tariff proposed in this bill will cause a much greater quantity of similar products to pass the customhouses and enter into active and severe competition with the individuals who have massed their contributions in taking stock in the various corporations which have been organized to promote and extend this important industry.

During the past 10 years the city of New Bedford increased in population 54.6 per cent and now contains more than 100,000 people.

No adequate reason for the vicious attack made upon the principal industry of this thriving community by the proposed bill has been advanced, nor is there any valid reason why the special industry located in the district which I have the honor to represent should be called upon to meet the great burden proposed to be inflicted upon it by the radical conditions contained in the bill presented in this House, and which it is proposed to enact into law as far as this House can, by a decree of the caucus of the Democratic Party, produce that result, without granting a hearing to either the owners of the mills or the operatives who earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brows.

Before the special session of the Congress had been called after the adjournment of the last session of the Sixty-first Congress, during conversation which took place between myself and a leading cotton manufacturer of fine goods of my own city, he related to me an interesting fact, which I desire to bring to the attention of the members of this committee.

He stated a short time previously he had made up a grade of goods that he thought he could find a ready market for at the price of 8¼ cents per yard. He placed the samples in the hands of his New York brokers, but owing to the depressed condition of the cotton industry no buyer could be found. He therefore placed the samples with a Boston broker, who received an offer of 8¼ cents per yard. This offer was finally accepted.

After filling the first order and the same being duplicated and further demand seeming in prospect, the manufacturer stated that he journeyed to Boston and visited the large department store which had purchased the goods and sauntered around the great establishment until he arrived in that portion of the store where the goods were being sold to the consumer, and he found that the customers were buying these goods which he had sold at 8¼ cents at 25 cents per yard.

Mr. Chairman, if the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle desire to benefit the consumer by the legislation which they enact, it is very clear to my mind, as I doubt not it is to yours and to the minds of those who listen to me to-day, that the point of attack should not be at the customhouse, but at some point to be determined by careful study and deliberation of the conditions which prevail between the manufacturer and the ultimate consumer. As this cotton schedule was not taken up for consideration by the Committee on Ways and Means until July 6, 1911, and the bill was presented in this House July 28, 1911, this fact clearly shows that practically no consideration was given to this important schedule.

The great advance and growth of the cotton-manufacturing industry in the Southern States is but a natural and welcome feature of the prosperity of the Nation itself. The northern manufacturer welcomes this new factor in the Nation's life. They recognize that the more modern factories and the former abundance of native help were advantages which, added to the close proximity to the raw material, were important factors in the competitive line of production to which they were compelled to adapt themselves.

The South has produced very largely the coarser grades of yarn and cloth. With the lapse of time and the benefit of experience and improvements in methods and machinery, the southern manufacturer at this time is seeking to produce the finer grades of yarn and cloth; but this condition arouses no feeling of indignation or dissatisfaction with their northern competitors.

The competition of the foreign manufacturer, who is not bound by American regulations, American standards of living, American wages, nor hampered by the larger capital required to construct and maintain his plant, is the competition to which neither the northern nor southern manufacturer have heretofore been subjected; and by the granting of reductions at the customhouse to the foreign manufacturers, who have long sought the American market—the best market in the world—the provisions of the pending bill will make it a great deal easier for them to flood the American market with the products of their capital and labor to the detriment of American industries and American labor.

The Commonwealth of Massachusetts, realizing that education has been one of the greatest factors in its advancement to the higher standards of excellence since the Pilgrim Fathers nearly 300 years ago landed on Plymouth Rock, several years ago entered upon the policy of establishing textile schools, in order that the rising generation might be the better equipped with the requisite knowledge in the production of higher grades of textile manufacturing. Builders of modern, improved machinery contributed liberally to each of three textile schools established in that Commonwealth. The State appropriated the money necessary for their construction, and the city of Lowell, where my colleague, Representative BUTLER AMES, resides, and the cities of Fall River and New Bedford, in the congressional district which I have the honor to represent, cooperated with the State in providing money for their maintenance in order to provide for the free education of its people.

The purpose of this higher education was to equip with experimental knowledge the rising generations, in order that they might produce the higher grades of textile manufacture in America, instead of buying the same abroad. No foreign manufacturer contributes to this enterprise, but by the provisions of the pending bill the foreign manufacturer finds encouragement at American customhouses to neutralize the efforts of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to improve its methods of textile manufactures and advance the interests of its citizens. I am one of the trustees of the textile school in Fall River and was the first signer of the petition for its establishment.

In the matter of hours of labor in the cotton manufacturing establishments Massachusetts takes the foremost rank. They were the first to enact the 10-hour law. By acts of legislation since that time they have reduced the hours of labor to 58 hours and to 56 hours, and the Legislature of Massachusetts, at its session for 1911, which ended on Friday, the 28th instant, enacted the 54-hour law for cotton operatives, and it will go into effect January 1, 1912.

Massachusetts has now a Democratic governor, but the Republican Party has always had a majority in its legislature since the party was formed in 1854, a period of 57 years.

Massachusetts is a manufacturing State. She produces none of the raw materials which her artisans, mechanics, and operatives by their labor, skill, and intelligence prepare for the use of the American people. She does not want the pending bill enacted into law, and I, as a Representative from that State, ask that more deliberate and careful consideration be given to the bill now pending in the committee.

In all probability it will not be enacted into law at this special session. At the present time the United States Government experts are gathering information as to cost of cotton goods in the district which I represent. The manufacturers are aiding them by having their books and establishments open to inspection. These experts, I am informed, will have information to present as to costs and conditions abroad, so that no harm could possibly come by delaying action upon this important schedule until the next regular session, and then much more definite and reliable information will be available.

If I were to be governed wholly by political considerations, I would gladly welcome the passage of the pending bill. But, Mr. Chairman, viewing the proposition upon the broader lines which should govern a subject of such great importance I sincerely hope the bill may not be enacted into law. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, availing myself of the privilege to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I append hereto an article written by F. W. Coburn in the Boston Transcript, in review of the British Government's inquiry regarding wages and cost of living in American cities:

WAGES, OURS AND BRITAIN'S—A REVIEW OF THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT'S INQUIRY—THE EXHAUSTIVE MANNER IN WHICH THEIR INVESTIGATORS WENT INTO OUR EXCELLENT CONDITIONS—LIVING FOUND MORE COSTLY HERE, BUT WAGES MUCH HIGHER STILL—WHAT THE EXAMINERS SAW IN BOSTON—SOME STRIKING LESSONS TO US, AS WELL AS TO ENGLAND, IN THE FIGURES THEY PRESENT.

The British board of trade's inquiry into the cost of living in American towns, the document which, with its frank admission of the better estate of American workmen, at least one Tory organ has declared to have dealt a death blow to free trade, has just reached these shores. Press dispatches this past fortnight have told of excitement caused in the tight little island by its findings. John Bull has long hugged the delusion that while 'Arry and Hobbs were paid smaller wages than those received by working people in Brother Jonathan's realm, the situations, at least, were essentially evened up by the much higher cost of living in "the States."

Now comes the relentless statistician of the labor department of the board of trade to prove, after an exhaustive study of 28 cities of the United States, that the English workman who emigrates and successfully reestablishes himself in an American community gets wages that are about 130 per cent better than he had received, while his expenditures for food and rent are advanced only by about 52 per cent. He makes by removing his Lares and Penates.

At the risk of sounding a Home Market Club homily, let us undertake a fragmentary exposition of this vast and truly British document of more than 500 pages. A big book and, to a certain extent, a big bore. Anglo-Saxon accuracy as regards detail is stuffed into the very title. It is a "Report of an Enquiry by the Board of Trade into Working Class Rents, Housing, and Retail Prices, Together with the Rates of Wages in Certain Occupations in the Principal Industrial Towns of the United States of America, with an Introductory memorandum and a comparison of conditions in the United States and the United Kingdom. Presented to Parliament by command of His Majesty."

This monumental inquiry one learns was begun in February, 1909. It investigated 28 cities, all but two of them lying east of the Mississippi. These American towns were as follows:

New York.

New England towns: Boston, Brockton, Fall River, Lawrence, Lowell, Providence.

Other eastern towns: Baltimore, Newark, Paterson, Philadelphia.

Central towns: Cincinnati, Cleveland, Detroit, Louisville, Muncie, Pittsburg.

Middle West towns: Chicago, Duluth, Milwaukee, Minneapolis-St. Paul, St. Louis.

Southern towns: Atlanta, Augusta, Birmingham, Memphis, New Orleans, Savannah.

The collectors of information apparently gathered all those statistical marvels that have made the Massachusetts commission's report on the high cost of living one of the extraordinary masterpieces of the new century, and then went these energetic compilers some better. The Briton who reads carefully in the report what is said about Boston knows things which not one Bostonian in twenty carries in memory. Lawrence and Lowell and Brockton are minutely described, down to the differences in their three-deckers and the relative number of cigar and cigarette stubs in the gutters. Technically, the inquiries included "the collection of statistical data as regards wages and hours of labor, rents, prices, and family expenditures on food."

It is the generalizing summaries, of course, which have disturbed British complacency. The results of the international comparison show that the ratio of the weekly wages for certain occupations in the United States and England and Wales, respectively, at the dates of the two inquiries was 243 to 100 in the building trades, 213 to 100 in the engineering trades, 246 to 100 in the printing trades, and 232 to 100 in all the trades altogether. Allowing for a slight advance in wages in England and Wales between the dates of the two inquiries, the combined ratio would be 230 to 100.

Not only do American workmen receive much higher wages, the British investigators are obliged to admit, they work shorter hours. The weekly hours of labor of this side were found to be 11 per cent shorter in the building trades, 7 per cent shorter in the printing trades, and 6 per cent longer in the engineering trade, the combined ratio showing up as 96 to 100 in this country's favor.

As regards rent, it was found that the American workman pays a little more than twice as much as the English workman for the same sort of housing. The actual ratio is 207 to 100. The difference between the two countries is much less marked in the retail prices of food, exhibiting a ratio of 138 to 100.

Almost interminable family budget studies lead to the conclusion, which might have been expected a priori, that "the consumption of meat is much larger in the United States, and the consumption of vegetables is also larger. The budgets indicate in general that the dietary of American working-class families is more liberal and more varied than that of corresponding families in the United Kingdom.

The use of a New York statistical base gives some interesting results when the reports of comparative study of wages and costs in American towns are considered. Englishmen and others now learn that if the Gothamite wage index for skilled workmen in the building trades is 100 the compensation received by similarly skilled craftsmen at Boston is marked 91; at Brockton, 88; Fall River, 83; Lawrence, 76; Lowell, 77; and Providence, 79. Augusta, Ga., with 73, shows the lowest index mark for skilled labor of this class.

The rent indices, naturally, indicate a generally higher scale of prices for workingmen's domiciles in the metropolis. St. Louis, at 101, is the only municipality whose rent index surpasses that of Greater New York. The descending scale runs: Pittsburg, 94; Memphis, 93; Cincinnati, 93; Brockton, 83; Boston, 82; and so on down to Munice, at 44. Food prices, on the other hand, are comparatively low in the metropolis. They were found to be highest in Atlanta, at 109. Brockton, 106; Boston, 105; Lawrence, 105; Lowell, 102; and Fall River, 101, are all places in which it is relatively expensive to buy eatables. Below New York, on the other hand, come Providence and several cities of the Middle States and Middle West.

The English investigators learned that where food and rent indices are combined only one American city, Atlanta, is more expensive for the wage earner to live in than New York. Brockton and Pittsburg are at precisely the same level. Boston stands at 99, Lawrence at 95, Fall River 90, Lowell 90, and Providence 88. Many similar informational figures are given concerning our cities.

That underfeeding is a vice of British industrial communities is very generally known. Miss Margaret Bondfield, the shopgirl orator, who was in Boston last summer, specially commented on the better diet of American working families and deplored the almost universal use of the frying pan among needy Britishers.

BRITISH AND YANKEE FOOD BILLS.

Among the interesting comparisons in a great mass of family budget statistics is one which shows the average food bill per capita in different classes of families of the two nations. Twenty-five shillings a week is taken as the lowest limit of a weekly family income in England. Each individual in such a family eats food in seven days that is valued at 2s. 9¾d. In an English family whose weekly income is 40s., the food bill per capita runs to 4s. 7¾d. This is less than the expenditure for food in an American family with a weekly income under £2, where the per capita average will be 4s. 10¾d. It is reckoned that a weekly family income of between two and three pounds in this country implies an average food bill per capita of 5s. 11¾d., and that in the household of the well-paid laborer, who gets £8 a week and over, the food expenditures will average 9s. 2¾d. per person.

Sojourners in Great Britain outside the laboring class, find it economical to buy clothing in London. Whether for the wage earner there is any great advantage in the English over the American dry-goods emporium is more doubtful. Mr. Asquith's document says: "The item of clothing raises wider and more difficult questions of comparison, and particulars that have been obtained go to show that while higher prices have, as a rule, to be paid in the United States than in the United Kingdom for woolen and worsted fabrics of similar quality, a very large domestic supply of articles of wearing apparel of most descriptions is available there of standard sizes that are, for the most part, on sale at prices either not much higher or not higher than in this country, although often less durable. It is evident, however, that the practice of buying clothes that are expected and intended to last for a single season only, and not for two or more, is much more common than in this country. In this respect an analogy may be traced to a national characteristic, noticeable not only in respect to clothing, but also as regards houses in their inferior durability, and as regards machinery in the greater rapidity with which it is either worn out or discarded. In all these directions there appears to be a half-conscious discernment of what is regarded as economy 'in spending' which, while savoring sometimes of extravagance, tends at the same time as regards machinery to secure the maximum of at least temporary efficiency and as regards clothing, as also of food, the maximum freshness and satisfaction."

Comparison of the national habits of expenditure for the little luxuries that are, in most families, regarded as necessities is made in several passages of the report. It is alleged, for instance, of American homes that "in connection with the consumption of beverages other than coffee, tea, and alcoholic drinks the great quantity of iced drinks of various descriptions may be mentioned, and ice itself, mainly for the preservation of foods, is a weekly item of expenditure in the summer months in practically every household, while an ice box is a common possession and an ice-cream freezer by no means rare in working-class homes. While, therefore, ice ranks as a small, distinctive charge on income, it affords one of the numerous illustrations of an expenditure that, regarded as necessary, secures at the same time its own return in comfort and satisfaction. Much tobacco is consumed, and the number of cigar ends thrown away, which no one takes the trouble to pick up, is one of the trifles that is noticeable."

Statistical expositions of the well-known fact that, although Americans are great spenders they are also great savers, are apparently beyond the limits of the British board of trade report. The circumstance is mentioned, however, in a concluding comparison of the standards of living in the two countries. In working-class conditions, it is stated, "more money is spent as a matter of course in the latter country, and to some extent, as has been suggested, this higher expenditure, apart from any differences in price or rent levels, is almost, if not quite, obligatory, but on the other hand in various material ways greater satisfaction and more comforts are secured. Thus the habit of spending is more active than in this country, and while the national characteristic of a greater extravagance and even of a greater wastefulness sometimes emerges, the correlative fact must be also noticed that for those who desire it and exercise the necessary strength of will and foresight saving is also easier because of the larger income at disposal."

BRITISH PRAISE FOR BOSTON.

The thoroughness with which the facts and figures about each of the cities studied have been collated is well-nigh appalling. About Boston the report gives 17 solid pages, starting with its settlement in 1630 and ending, chronologically speaking, with the year 1915, when, according to general belief, this is to be a nearly ideal town. The current agitations about the port of Boston, the schoolhouse and housing problems, the plans of the Metropolitan Improvements Commission and the Metropolitan Improvement League, the rate of speed of the elevated trains, the ends and aims of the Boston-1915 movement, and many other projects of the uplifters receive brief though sympathetic mention, the only serious oversight, perhaps, being the failure to mention Mayor Fitzgerald, the new zoo, or the new aquarium.

The discussion of housing and rent in Boston is duly voluminous—perhaps one might say almost as interminable as a series now running in an admirable weekly publication. One of the conclusions is that "a few attempts off the lines of ordinary commercial enterprise have been made to meet the housing requirements of the working classes in Boston, but recent enterprise in this direction has been unimportant. The chief significance of the attempts that have been made in the past consist not so much in the superior character of the accommodation now offered as in the recognition of the social importance of the housing question and in the endeavor made to raise the standard of the normal relationship between the landlord and tenant, and by so doing to make each interpret more widely the nature of his responsibilities."

In the discussion of Boston retail prices the effectiveness and attractiveness of the large department stores is commended, though it is maintained that these have less effect upon the general marketing of foodstuffs than the so-called "multiple shops" or "chain stores." Of the latter class it is said: "This type of shop is of comparatively recent growth, and the particular firm referred to has sprung up during the last 14 years." Prevalent appeal to the desire of the average Bostonian to get something for nothing is hit off in the statement that trading stamps are a good deal used, with a view to securing and retaining custom, but they are probably a device that will not prove lasting.

A bouquet easily recognizable is this: "Cooperative stores are not found, but the principle of industrial copartnership is in successful operation in one of the best-known drapery establishments, and is now attracting favorable attention."

The studies of Brockton, Lawrence, Lowell, Providence, and other cities are almost equally thoroughgoing with that of Boston. Nearly 150 pages toward the end of the report are given over to statistical tables, amplifying all that was found in the individual investigations of the cities, and including appendixes concerning wages, agreements, and arbitration provisions, apprenticeship regulations, factory benefit funds, mutual provident funds and associated charities, building and lodging-house regulations, workingmen's building societies, house agreements, laws and regulations relative to the preparation and sale of food, a crusade against tuberculosis in New York, racial classification of immigrants, the employment of negroes in unskilled trade, the national negro business league, and unemployment in the United States.

This volume is only one of a series of the same kind. Reports on the cost of living have been issued by the board of trade for the United Kingdom in 1908, for Germany in the same year, for France in 1909, and for Belgium in 1910. Clearly, if the British workingman does not know just how badly off he is, it will not be the Government's fault.

[1] When mill now in course of construction is in operation. [2] Yarn. [3] In mills located in New Bedford.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. UTTER].

Mr. UTTER. Mr. Chairman, there is an oriental legend that, it seems to me, the American Congress at a time like this might well listen to, and perhaps from its moral find something that will help it. The legend runs like this: A father had three sons, and when the time came for the boys to start out in the world to make their own way he gave unto each of them a peculiar gift. He gave to one an all-seeing eye, an eye by which its possessor could see everywhere, everything, at all times. To another he gave a carpet which would carry instantly, on the owner's wish, whoever owned it to any place that he might desire. To the third he gave a cure-all that was warranted to cure all the ills to which flesh is heir. The boys chanced to come together one time, when he with the all-seeing eye discovered that the father was sick. With the carpet which the second boy had the three hastened to the father's bedside, and with the cure-all they saved their father's life. When the story is told in the Orient, the question always asked is: "Which saved the father's life?" And no man can tell.

It seems to me that when the American Congress, composed of Representatives from various sections, yet all meeting here as Americans and not as sectionalists, comes to consider a question of the importance that this one is admitted to be, a question that is fundamental to our common concern, it has a duty to ask of itself whether it is right to strike even a single factor that is powerful in the saving of the common good with so little thought as has been given to this proposition.

It requires no particularly patriotic spirit for a man to recognize some of the things that it means to be an American citizen. It is no idle thing for a man to be an American citizen, it is no empty opportunity. With the opportunity, however, comes responsibility, and any man who finds in citizenship only the opportunity which it affords loses the true American idea, because opportunity always brings responsibility, and more especially to those who assemble in a place like this. One thing has astonished me not a little in the time that I have been here, and that is to see how almost universally we run back to the thought of what our public action may possibly mean to us personally, when the thing we ought to bear in mind is the effect that the action is to have, not upon ourselves personally, which is a small matter, but the effect of the action on the Government as a whole, which is an important matter. We stand here as Americans, and, Mr. Chairman, think what it means at the present time! We have a country that is in the forefront of the nations of the world. It makes no difference whether it is the North or the South or the East or the West, it is all American. What has put us where we are? Not simply the vigor and the strength that comes from the North. Not simply the vigor and the strength that comes from the South, the East, or the West. Wherever there is strength and vigor there is American progress, whether it is in one section or another. Therefore we should consider these great questions with a purpose single to American progress.

Did you ever think of this, and some of you must have, because it has been so plain that you must have noticed it, that there is no nation on God's footstool to-day that has the degree of general education that we have? Do you know that of all the money that is contributed from public sources toward public-school systems in the whole world more than four-tenths comes from the American people? Do you recognize that we have a national credit to-day that is the equal, if not the superior, of that of any other country on earth? If we should take the figures at the time of the recent sale of Panama bonds, we would find that we could claim the first credit of any nation in the world. Do you realize that through this country, from north to south, our savings banks are the wonder of the rest of the world? We have savings banks, wherever we go, that furnish the funds for all of these industries; and whose money is it? It is not the money of the rich man, not the money of the large holder, for the figures show that in such banks the deposits run very rarely over three or four hundred dollars to the individual, and the highest aveage in any State is only a little over $500. It is common money, it is the money of the people, and from wherever we may chance to come we have a duty, in considering a matter of this importance, to consider what this great financial resource means for us as a people.

No man, it seems to me, ought to claim that all of this has come from the protective tariff. I am a protectionist from the top of my head to the soles of my feet, but I would not claim that all of this prosperity is the result of the protective tariff alone. We have had immense resources; we have had immense gifts from nature; and we have had what counts for more than anything else, and which we so many times forget—the inspiration of the American ideal of what life should be. Men, therefore, have not been considered as machines.

I saw not long ago that some chemist in Harvard University had undertaken to demonstrate by a test tube the amount of food on which a man could live, and the answer made—and a complete answer it was, too—was that men are not test tubes; they are human beings. And so the American ideal presses us forward. We are not test tubes or machines, but there is an ideal back of our life, an ideal of which American manhood is a product.

Now, I assert, notwithstanding the fact that I do not claim that all this prosperity has come from the protective tariff—I can not shut my eyes to the fact—that during the last 50 years, when this progress has been so marked and great, that the protective tariff has prevailed in this country, and feel that it has worked for the advantage of the North, the South, the East, and the West. It has not been for the advantage of one State or one section. It has been for the advantage of the country as a whole. And therefore, when we come to a question like that which is now presented to the American Congress, a question striking at one of the very fundamentals of this common prosperity, is it not wise that we should stop and look and think what such a blow may mean?

The question that has before and is now presenting itself to this special session is fundamental. We have been told repeatedly by those in authority that the changes that are now proposed in the tariff law are fundamental changes; that they involve not simply changes in rates, but a change of principle. They are not simply to cut down or to raise; they are to strike at the fundamental principle from the very start. That I may sustain myself in that assertion, I would like to read to you for just a few minutes a few extracts from speeches that have been made by leading Democrats during this session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, on May 2, 1911, as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 793, said:

Our position is that the taxes levied at the customhouse are for the sole purpose of producing revenue to support the Government of the United States, and that we are not justified in levying taxes for any other purpose.

Mr. ADAMSON, of Georgia, on April 25, 1911, as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 568, said:

A Democratic tariff system, constructed upon proper Democratic principles, would contain no rate higher than was adjudged to be the best revenue-producing rate, and the range would be from that down to nothing.

Mr. CANTRILL, of Kentucky, on April 28, 1911, as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 696, said:

Levy no tax save for revenue only.

Mr. BARTLETT, of Georgia, on May 16, 1911, as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 1232, said:

The principles which guide me, Mr. Chairman, in my determination are briefly as follows: * * * That no duty be imposed on any article above the lowest rate which will yield the largest amount of revenue.

Mr. HARDWICK, of Georgia, on May 16, 1911, as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 1245, said:

My construction of the time-worn battle cry of our party, "A tariff for revenue only," may not be the conventional one, but it is, I believe, the one that sound statesmanship suggests. As I interpret that phrase, "only" is not an adverb of purpose but is an adverb of effect, and duties should be laid not only for the sole purpose of obtaining revenue, but so as to have no other effect except to raise revenue.

Mr. HULL, of Tennessee, on June 10, 1911, as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 1895, said:

The sole purpose of Democrats in imposing duties on imports is to secure necessary revenue for the Government.

After reading these extracts it is only fair to say that these gentlemen are carrying out the policy which they believe to be the policy of their party, and that they are carrying it out in the true faith of their ideas. But what excuse can you make, what excuse are you making, to the public for bringing in this bill at this time? It has been said on this floor that the majority is doing it at the command of the American people; but it seems to me that any man who will read the newspapers of last year will discover that the command was not to change a fundamental policy. What command there was received was only to change certain conditions which could be affected but little by the tariff. The condition vital to the people at that time more than anything else was the high cost of living, and that high cost was not the result of the tariff. The condition that aroused the feeling was not a desire for a change of principle, but only a change in certain schedule rates.

Ah, gentlemen, as I look at your position I think of one event in ancient history. Away back in early Jewish days, we are told, there was a young man whose name was Absalom. He longed for rule and for control. Day after day he stood by the gates of the city and said to every man who passed, "Put me in power and I will give you the right in every case, no matter what you may imagine the wrong to be." But I would like to warn you. The end of that young man was that his hair was caught in the branches of a tree while he was riding on a mule, and he lost his life. [Laughter.]

As I said before, I stand as a protectionist, and, being a protectionist, of course you would not expect me to favor a bill that contained anything but protection principles. I am a protectionist because of what I have seen and observed, because I believe that the protective policy has built us up as a people, and because I have noticed that whenever that policy has been abandoned during the last 50 years there have come periods of want. And no man can deny it. It is not a theory, but an actual, living fact, that every man who reads knows, and every man who lived during those unfortunate times knows. Yet, while I am opposed to the pending bill on principle, and refuse absolutely to vote for it because of that, I have some things I want to say that I think at this particular time the gentlemen who sit on the opposite side of the aisle, as well as those on this side, should consider, and having considered, not favor a bill of this kind.

In the first place, this bill is ill timed. There is no public call for a bill of this sort—a bill that strikes at the foundation of one of the chief industries of the country. There has been no call coming up from the people; there has been no evidence of existing trouble. No man ever made the accusation that in the cotton industry there was a trust. Some men may have said that in the thread line there is a trust, but I am not sure that even the great thread corporation is a trust, but rather that it is a world-wide industry controlled by one firm. But so far as the cotton industry in general is concerned, it has an open field. In my own State there are 106 mills, according to the last census report, showing that in that State surely there is no combine. Rhode Island is interested in this great industry because of the people who are employed in it, not simply because of the manufacturers, and Rhode Islanders are depending on the stability the American Congress can give to an industry like that. Too many times we talk about the American manufacturer as though he were the whole thing. Rhode Island's 106 mills employ 656 salaried men and clerks, and have some 29,000 persons employed as wage earners in the industry, who, with four to a family, would represent a total of nearly 119,000 people dependent upon that industry alone. If there has been no call for this legislation, if there has been no demand for it, if there has been no general demand for it, why should it be advanced at this time?

In the second place, this bill has been ill prepared. Anybody who reads it knows that is the fact. You can not frame a bill of this sort with justice to the interests involved without giving it more attention than has been given to this one by the Ways and Means Committee. Has there ever been a time before when a matter of this importance has been brought before the American Congress without giving the people who are largely interested an opportunity to express their opinions or when their request to be heard has been denied? I remember that something was said this afternoon about a committee representing the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association, with headquarters at Charlotte, N. C., being told that they might present a statement to the Ways and Means Committee. I would like to read a copy of the letter sent in reply to their request:

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 6, 1911.

Mr. R. M. MILLER, JR., Charlotte, N. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee had its first meeting on the cotton schedule this morning. After looking over the facts before us and the briefs, they concluded not to go into general hearings on the subject.

I am in receipt of the brief you have already filed with the committee, and it will receive careful attention. Should you desire to place further facts before us, I will be glad to receive them personally, or by letter, as you desire. We will probably be at work on the cotton schedule for the next 10 days before reaching any final conclusion in reference to the matter.

Yours, very truly, O. W. UNDERWOOD, Chairman.

But it was not always so. It was not always recognized, even by the gentleman who signed that letter, that ignorance might be bliss in a matter like this. There was a time when he, too, was willing to confess that men who framed a bill of this kind needed accurate knowledge. Let me read to you what appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 30, 1911, page 1752. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] said:

I have tried to render faithful service to my country and my party on that committee [the Committee on Ways and Means]; and I say to you candidly that there is no proposition that I have ever had to face that has confronted me with more difficulties than to attempt properly to adjust the tariff rates in conformity to the principles of my party without having sufficient information on which I could base my judgment.

After an interruption he continued:

Now—

Referring to the legislation authorizing the appointment of a Tariff Board—there is no doubt that the sole purpose of this legislation is for a board to be appointed to gather facts, not to reach conclusions, and to lay those facts before this House; not facts that the board wants to lay before this House, but facts that this House shall order the Tariff Board to bring before it. You know, and every Democrat here knows, that one of the greatest difficulties we have had to face is, that when the Ways and Means Committee goes into session to ascertain the facts upon which they can write a tariff bill, the only men that are sufficiently interested to come before us and give us the facts are the protected industries of the United States. And yet to-day you would vote to continue that condition, to continue to place us absolutely in the hands of the protected interests of this country for the information on which we are to write a tariff bill, and refuse to give us the board that will be composed of men who, by law, are authorized and directed to investigate under our direction and to ascertain facts on which we can base an honest tariff legislation.

Now, that is the issue. My friend from Tennessee—

Because it was the gentleman from Tennessee who interrupted him—wants to know why we should want information in reference to a bill written for revenue, and revenue only. Why, my friend, of all the bills that require information, the man who is writing a tariff bill for revenue needs information the most.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Then Mr. SIMS, of Tennessee, broke in:

Mr. SIMS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I said the difference in wages abroad and here, so as to ascertain what rates were to be levied to equalize.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is only one of the incidents. If you are writing a bill for protection, you can put it higher and higher—high enough to keep out competition—and you have a good bill for protection.

Then Mr. CLAYTON, of Alabama, spoke:

Mr. CLAYTON. If the gentleman will pardon me, if you want it for the support of the Government, can you not keep writing it lower and lower, so as to lessen the tax on the people?

To that question Mr. UNDERWOOD replied:

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is true if you could afford to play hide and seek with the Treasury of the United States, but it is our duty, my fellow Democrats, not only to write a tariff bill solely for revenue, but also to write one that is capable of raising sufficient revenue to run this Government, and we must know what we are doing, and not guess at it.

It strikes me, Mr. Chairman, that in the framing of this bill there has been a deal of "guessing." When you take a bill of this kind, and admit that the first time the Ways and Means Committee met to consider it was on July 6—a fact admitted over the signature of the committee's chairman—you must admit one of two things: Either that you are "guessing" at what you are doing, or that you are accepting the figures and conclusions of somebody other than yourselves. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It was said here this afternoon that of the 14 Democratic members of this Committee on Ways and Means 10 are new to that committee. What right had they to say that because the committee had hearings two years ago they were therefore sufficiently equipped with information? It is only to beg the question and to acknowledge to this American Congress that they are untrue to their promises of faithful service and untrue to the American people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, in the third place, there is a peculiarity about this bill which I think should bar it from serious consideration, and that is the peculiarity whereby it provides for a change from specific and ad valorem duties to purely ad valorem duties, a method that has been approved by no Secretary of the Treasury except Robert J. Walker. We have proven by experience that with a combination of ad valorem and specific duties we are able in a fair measure to regulate tariff duties.

But we can never control these duties, so long as human nature remains as it is to-day, by the ad valorem system only. That is the unanimous testimony of all men who have had charge of collections, and the testimony of all men who have watched the tariff laws in operation. Just so long as human nature is open to temptations to undervaluations, just so long you will have trouble with that system. It has been the history of the past and it will be the history of the future.

Let us see what some people in the past, who have had experience on this matter, have said. James D. Power, a special agent of the Treasury, at the time the Mills bill was under consideration, made this statement:

Ad valorem rates of duty afford temptations and opportunities for fraud which can not be guarded against, even by the most rigid rules and vigilant watchfulness. The assessment of values under this system is based upon expert knowledge of values, the most uncertain and arbitrary method that could be devised. Under the ad valorem system fraud has prospered and demoralized the importing trade, which has passed from the hands of American citizens into the control of men who have taken advantage of our high import duties to enrich themselves at the expense of the revenue and the ruined trade of American wholesale firms. Fraud of this nature is difficult to detect and more difficult still to establish. In the absence of documentary proof it resolves itself into a mere difference of opinion between experts; and the owner of the suspected goods can at all times procure experts who will maintain the correctness of his invoice prices, or he may select an easier and more convincing and efficacious line of defense by procuring affidavits from his buyer or partner abroad to the effect that the invoice cost was the actual price paid for the goods.

And now listen. In the debate on the Mills bill on this floor William McKinley said:

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one leading feature of this bill, which is not by any means the most objectionable feature, but which, if it stood alone, ought to defeat this entire measure; and that is the introduction of the ad valorem system of assessment to take the place of the specific system now generally in force. You all know the difference between the ad valorem system and the specific mode of levying duties. One is based upon value, the other upon quantity. One is based upon the foreign value, difficult of ascertainment, resting in the judgment of experts, all the time offering a bribe to undervaluation; the other rests upon quantity, fixed and well known the world over, always determinable and always uniform. The one is assessed by the yardstick, the ton, and the pound weight of commerce, and the other is assessed by the foreign value, fixed by the foreign importer or his agent in New York or elsewhere; fixed by the producer, fixed by anybody at any price to escape the payment of full duties.

But listen again, you gentlemen on the other side of the aisle. Secretary Manning, a man who was a sound Democrat, a man whose life and whose record shed honor on the Democratic party, said this:

Whatever successful contrivances are in operation to-day to evade the revenue by false invoices, or by undervaluations, or by any other means, under an ad valorem system, will not cease even if the ad valorem rates shall have been largely reduced. They are incontestably, they are even notoriously, inherent in that system.

And yet our Democratic friends come here and propose in the name of reform, propose in behalf of the "dear people," propose in behalf of the American Nation, to introduce again into our tariff laws a system that has been condemned in the past and which, if adopted now, will be condemned again in the future!

And now, in the fourth place, there is no one who can dispute that the passage of this bill will strike at the very foundation of one of America's great industries. There is nobody who can dispute that the change of method proposed will not only work a temporary injury, but an injury that will be lasting, if it should be enacted into law.

What is the condition of the cotton industry to-day? The cotton industry is dull, partly because of the high price of cotton during the last two or three years, and also because since last November it has been known that a Democratic Congress sooner or later would be tinkering at this tariff. This knowledge has had a serious result on business affairs.

I am willing to admit that in the lower grades of cotton goods we are, perhaps, able to hold our own with small protection. I think that is true. I think the figures that have been brought in here indicate that; but when it comes to the better classes of cottons, when it comes to the classes of cottons into which American labor enters, when it comes to the classes of cottons that every American ought to be proud that we can make in this country, we have trouble in that line.

Now, I am not particularly strong on figures. I do not know very much about percentages. My predecessor once remarked in public that he had a high opinion of percentages so long as he, Adin B. Capron, stood 100 per cent; but by and by, when he took a wife, there were two in the family, and yet he was only 50 per cent. A little later, when the little Caprons came along, his proportion went down, although the family continued to increase. [Laughter.] So I think, when we deal with percentages, we are apt sometimes to find ourselves lost between the percentage and the whole number, and we better, therefore, speak in a much more general way.

I have here two samples of cotton goods, such as are made in some Rhode Island mills. These particular samples were not made there, but they are samples of what the Rhode Island mills seek to equal and to meet in competition. I want to show you in figures, not percentages, just what it means.

Here are three samples of Anderson's ginghams, made in Scotland, probably the best line of ginghams of which the world knows. Any woman who buys ginghams knows what Anderson's ginghams are. We have in the State of Rhode Island a mill that has been undertaking to get into the market in competition with these. Now, this piece of goods sells across the water at wholesale for 14 to 16 cents, depending upon the raw material cost—say an average of 15 cents. When you add to that the brokerage, the commissions, the transportation, and the duty, you land it in New York for 21 cents. The very lowest price for which an up-to-date, absolutely efficient, modern-machinery mill in Rhode Island can make and sell that cloth is 20 cents, 1 cent less than it can be laid down in the city of New York by a Scotch manufacturer under the present tariff rates. Remember one thing, the wholesaler is subject to certain conditions that the retailer feels. An American man, like an American woman, for some reason or other, will pay more for goods that are made across the water than for those made in this country, even if they be no better. Nobody can tell why that is. If you should undertake to find an explanation you would fail; and perhaps you would fail if you should try to explain why it is that the "friends from home," when they return from Washington, are always glad to tell their neighbors that they shook hands with their Congressman. Somehow or other it is inbred. It can not be overcome. Yet that is one of the things that the American manufacturer has to contend with. If you change your tariff rates, as you propose here to-day, the Englishman will lay these cotton goods in the port of New York at 18 cents, and they can not be made in America for that price.

Now, here are some other samples of a similar line that I want to confer with you about. These also are samples of English make, representative of what American manufacturers are competing with. I have some American goods here also which I may show to you before long, but I am showing you these English samples because I think they will carry my point a little better. These are English goods brought across the water and sold here for about 15½ cents. We can not meet these goods at more than a half a cent or a cent less, on a 5 per cent profit. Why is it? Is it because of the American wage, about which so much has been said? It is because of the American wage in part, but also because of the American investment. No man can measure the tariff by the figures you may write out as drawn only from wages paid. Every man knows who knows anything about it that you have to take into this the rate at which the investment can be secured. You can build and equip a mill in Europe for at least 75 per cent less than in the United States. That includes the machinery. This difference is an item that must be taken into consideration; and is it any wonder, then, that the American manufacturers are worried over this bill? And, gentlemen, do not take my word as one that comes from the State of Rhode Island alone. I want to read an extract from a newspaper whose editor is familiar with the textile business, the Fiber and Fabric, published in Boston, of July 8, 1911. I read from an editorial:

TIME TO WAKE UP.

The effects of continued dullness in cotton manufacturing is shown in the passing of dividends and depreciation in the values of mill shares, and primarily the trouble and the losses result from the action of Congress and its apparent tariff policy, as under the proposed tariff changes it will be an impossibility to carry on a successful business in the manufacture of cotton unless pronounced changes are made in, first, the price of raw material, and, second, the wage now paid the cotton-mill operative.

If American manufacturers could operate their mills upon the wage basis in force in England, Germany, and France there would be no objection to a low tariff or even to absolute free trade. But experience teaches that American labor does not propose to place itself upon the foreign level, and consequently a tariff revision downward is bound to bring industrial strife that will menace the industry and generally disturb the peace of the manufacturing communities.

There are no ifs or ands about this fact. It is as sure as anything is sure, and in addition to the labor friction there are two features to a low tariff that have been overlooked, and perhaps their seriousness misunderstood. In the first place, the millions of investors' money tied up in textile securities will not have the same earning power as under a protective tariff, and as a result dividends will be reduced or passed indefinitely, and in New England alone more than 100,000 people will have their income reduced. In our textile communities we have thousands of merchants and professional men who depend almost entirely upon the mill people for their existence. If the earning power of mill hands is reduced 50 per cent, the trade of these merchants is correspondingly reduced, and many of them will be forced out of business or have their incomes greatly reduced. Already, owing to agitation on the tariff, all factors in the textile industry have had a bitter taste of what is coming under the proposed Underwood tariff, which is neither sensible nor sufficiently revenue producing to meet requirements. If the measure is passed, and receives the signature of the President, it is a case of "Cheer up, the worst is yet to come."

Now, let me say one word further on this fourth point. There is nobody, no matter on which side of the aisle he sits, nobody engaged in public or private affairs of this country, who does not know that striking at the foundation of an industry like cotton, striking at the foundation of an industry the way this bill does, is sure to endanger things seriously.

Now, in the fifth and last place. I have already told you how the men in charge of some of these matters have felt the necessity for information. I have already read to you how the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee put into the RECORD what we all believe to be true, that the work of the Tariff Board, soon to be forthcoming, is to be an impartial dealing with facts. Nobody on the floor might advise passing the authority of making rates over to a board independent of Congress, whatever the legality of so doing; but this Congress ought to welcome information obtained in a nonpartisan way. True it is that men who have appeared before other committees have sometimes come with their own axes to grind. True it has been that no matter whether they ask for free raw material or a tax on goods they have come sometimes with a proposition affecting their own pockets. Now, for the first time, however, we have inaugurated a system of obtaining information from a Government source, and its reliableness will compare favorably with that received from other Government sources. How foolish and reckless it would be for an American Congress to hustle through here, only four months before the report from that board is to come in, a bill that will strike at the foundations and disturb the industries of the American people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, of course what I have said has not been said with the thought of moving members on the other side of the aisle. For them the king has spoken, and the king is Caucus. But the men on this side of the aisle, the men who still believe in the policy of protection to American industries, I ask them to oppose this bill, and not, perchance because they feel a little hungry and weary, sell their birthright for a mess of pottage. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. I now yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, this is the third tariff bill of this session. A few important facts are disclosed in its record to which attention has been called, but until recently the public has been given little consideration.

The great Northwest last fall alone stood for Republicanism and sound economic principles. It is now receiving its punishment. First, the so-called farmers' free-list bill came into being from the majority caucus over night without evidence, hearing, or consideration. The farmers of the Northwest were told that "meats and cereals," the large sources of their annual wealth, were to be placed on a parity in the great markets of the United States with the products of the fields and pastures of the Argentine, Canada, Mexico, and the world, while our meats, with the exception of England, must pay tribute at practically every port of the world. In this case the tariff was reduced 100 per cent.

Then came wool. This being more distributed and reaching lower latitudes was given some consideration and investigation. A reduction of from 55 to 60 per cent of the duty on wool was made. This was considered for a few short weeks.

Now comes cotton, confined in its production to low latitudes. The time was long and the consideration protracted before a bill was drawn, the reduction being about 43 per cent of the present duty. A Member of the majority has suggested that with this system of reduction, as the various schedules are taken up, by the time the furnaces of Birmingham, citrus fields, and the mica hills are reached the term is liable to expire or the revision become upward. As to the present bill, I look over the membership of this House from where cotton is produced and conclude that they all want cotton prices reduced. Looking through the Carolinas and New England, where the cotton mills are, it will be noticed in the reduced Republican vote and the increased Democratic membership here, that the mill workers want less wages or closed factories. Might it not be well to give them what they have deliberately asked for after you have compelled us to take that against which we protested?

I should not have spoken at this time had it not been for the delivery of two remarkably intense partisan pension speeches which have recently been printed in the RECORD. One was by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR], and which speech is found on page 3432 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; the other by Gen. SHERWOOD, of Ohio, found on page 3451 of the same highly interesting publication. Of course it is not unusual for cotton to cover many irregular procedures, and that may be why they took advantage of this situation.

Each of these speeches relate largely to personal and political fortunes; that is, to the personal and political fortunes of the speakers. But their burden is to excuse themselves and the majority of the House for neglecting to report a general pension bill. The committee was organized on the 11th of April; bills had been promptly filed at the beginning of the session. The whole pension plan had recently been fully discussed, and the Sulloway bill passed near the close of the last session; it was not acted upon owing to the crowded condition of the Senate Calendar.

The old soldiers looked confidently to the new chairman of the Invalid Pensions Committee for prompt action. There was no congressional power to stop him in reporting his own or some other general bill, but no bill was reported. The people noted his votes on May 12, page 1182, and June 2, page 1722. Then they took the other slant and began to think he might not be able to prevent a bill being reported. They looked with interest upon recurring Mondays for action, but those days were avoided by the majority as if they were days of recurring pestilence. The majority leader some time ago announced that there would be no pension legislation this session.

Three defenses are submitted: First, they have a letter. It is said the chairman of the Senate Pensions Committee wrote to them that there would be no pension legislation this session. Since when did this House begin to take orders from any man or body of men? True, the President told the majority to vote for reciprocity, and they obeyed. Now the senatorial chairman tells them "no pension legislation," and marked obedience follows. I wonder why the new chairman of Finance at the other end of the Capitol did not write a letter to Chairman UNDERWOOD saying there would be no tariff legislation, which would have sent us home to our families long ago. If it would not prevent our worthy Speaker from running for the Presidency and being beaten, I would suggest to our national chairman that he write a letter to the Democratic chairman telling him to see to it that no Democratic nomination be made. [Laughter.]

Second. But if Republican command is powerful, how much more powerful does the gentleman from Indiana make Republican precedent. He says "in an extra session two years ago the Republican Congress being called in extraordinary session for tariff revision did not pass any general pension legislation." That body kept within the scope of the subject for which it was called and did practically nothing else, while this session, ignoring the scope of the presidential call, organized all committees with secretaries, assistant secretaries, doorkeepers, and messengers, who, with few exceptions, slumber and sleep, waking only on the monthly terminals to draw their salaries, which they are given little opportunity to earn.

If Republican precedent should govern in pension matters it ought to govern in tariff and other legislation, and following precedent by leaving the tariff alone or revising it along protective lines. You had time to put meats and cereals on the free list and call it part of the farmers' free list by handing the subject to a butcher and allowing him to cut the bill out with a meat ax, then handing it to one of the pages to correct the spelling, and sealing it with caucus approval, passing it without dotting an "i" or crossing a "t." [Laughter on the Republican side.]

You took weeks to prepare your wool schedule and months for your cotton schedule, but no time for pension legislation.

The three tariff bills are new legislation. There is a special reason why pension legislation should have been considered at this session and the others not. In the hurry of the closing days of last Congress the following bills passed the House, but failed in the Senate for the lack of time to dispose of them:

Apportionment, statehood, publicity, reciprocity, and a general pension bill. In all reason, if any legislation should have precedence, this should have come first. Each of these, with the sole exception of the pension bill, has been taken up by this House and passed. Pension legislation alone of the unfinished business has been denied a hearing by the majority of this House.

When the gentleman from Indiana has the assurance to charge the Republicans with hypocracy on pension legislation he asserts that he does not like hypocracy. That reflects good taste, but his taste should be discriminating. When it is seasoned with assurance and garnished with gall, it seems to him to be a palatable morsel. On page 3433 he says:

> For five years I have stood upon this floor pleading for more liberal pensions and have done everything in my power to secure them.

I assume that his statement is correct, but I am compelled to add that no part of that five years is included in the last four months. And why? He plead with whom? He must have plead with his political opponents. Why? He must have considered them friends of pension legislation. He now ceases to stand and plead with his own political associates who are in power because he knows it is useless, as they are not and never have been the friends of liberal pension legislation. He modestly states on page 3433 that—

> It is a well-known fact that it was our work that forced the Sulloway bill out of the committee last winter.

The thought occurs to the country, why, if he is so powerful with the opposition, he does not train his persuasive and hypnotic powers now upon his friends. More than this, on Mondays, when the Anderson or Sherwood bill could have been called up, we waited to hear the pleading of the gentleman from Indiana for liberal pension legislation. I find his pleadings to have been turned into a protest. We find that in the list of those whose votes are recorded, in effect, against the consideration of pension legislation—I call your attention especially to June 19, at page 2268—and on that roll call the name of ABOU M. ADAIR "leads all the rest." [Laughter.] Our friend might well be described as among those—

> And many there are who could if they would,
> Do that which they ought to do, can do, and should.
> But halting in purpose, and idle in mood,
> Excuse themselves, saying, "I would if I could."

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. I do.

Mr. GARRETT. I get the idea from the gentleman's remarks that he is very strong for pension legislation. Is that correct?

Mr. SLOAN. I am in favor of pension legislation; yes. The gentleman's guess was right the first time.

Mr. GARRETT. I am very glad to have guessed right.

Mr. SLOAN. Well, I am very glad that the gentleman is glad.

Mr. GARRETT. Then we are both satisfied.

Mr. SLOAN. I hope so.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman give us the details now of the bill that he would prefer?

Mr. SLOAN. I express that later on in my discussion, and I will express myself as being in favor of a bill, the best bill that a majority of the men in this House will vote for, and I care not whether it bears the name of Gen. SHERWOOD or Mr. ANDERSON or Mr. ADAIR. All we ask for is a bill, and that you have denied.

Mr. GARRETT. I remember very well that I was induced by the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], who studies detail very much, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], when the Sulloway bill was under consideration and it was being discussed, to vote against it because those gentlemen had studied the details. Now, what is the detail that the gentleman wishes the House to vote on—the detail of the bill?

Mr. SLOAN. I shall favor either bill that is presented here, or I should have favored either the Anderson bill or the Sherwood bill had it been presented during the last four months. I would have been in favor of the Sulloway bill. I am in favor of any liberal pension bill, be it presented from the Democratic side or the Republican side. All that the old soldiers of this country want is a liberal general pension bill, and the details may be fixed by the House; and if your caucus will only give your Members—and they can act with us—free rein, a bill will be sent to the country that will satisfy the old soldiers.

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; but that does not, however, answer my question. What sort of a pension bill does the gentleman favor?

Mr. SLOAN. A general pension bill I shall favor. Now, I yielded to a question and I think I have answered fairly, and I did not yield for the purpose of drafting a bill while yet on my feet.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska decline to yield further?

Mr. SLOAN. Oh, no.

Mr. GARRETT. In view of the elaborate statement the gentleman had made I had no doubt the gentleman had prepared in his own mind a pension bill.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman has no such doubt?

Mr. GARRETT. I am very much interested in it. I have never been opposed to pensions. Has the gentleman a pension bill to suggest?

Mr. SLOAN. I have not. I am not a member of the Pension Committee, but I am prepared to support the best bill that will be presented by this side of the House or the best bill that will be presented by the other side of the House. Is the gentleman, and is he now?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Very well.

Mr. GARRETT. I am ready to vote for a reasonable pension bill and I have always been.

Mr. SLOAN. Then the gentleman and I will vote together and that at the first opportunity.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman state now what a reasonable pension bill is?

Mr. SLOAN. The Anderson pension bill.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman thinks that is a very reasonable bill?

Mr. SLOAN. Or the Sherwood bill, if you prefer.

Mr. GOEKE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Certainly.

Mr. GOEKE. Does the gentleman think it makes very much difference whether the pension bill be passed now or deferred to the regular session, as to the time that the benefit will go to the soldier?

Mr. SLOAN. It makes a great deal of difference.

Mr. GOEKE. In what way?

Mr. SLOAN. If we vote it now, we can register that much progress and force it to its final passage that much sooner.

Mr. GOEKE. Well, no appropriation could be made providing for the payment of the pensions until the regular session——

Mr. SLOAN. They could get the benefit of what will be allowed them and the money can be appropriated so that it will take effect just as soon as this Congress sees fit to give it effect, although they might have to wait a little time for their actual payment.

The third defense pleaded is a list of 24 pension bills, with the following somewhat equivocal statements: "Showing our record on the pension question," "Look at the bills or laws passed by a Democratic House and approved by a Democratic President," "A Democratic House passed."

An analysis of these 24 bills shows that only one bill was passed by a Democratic House, Senate, and President,

A further analysis of the pension legislation since the Civil War discloses that only three great pension bills have been passed by Congress.

The first was in 1887. It was passed by a Republican Senate and Democratic House and vetoed by a Democratic President.

Second, the disability act of 1890. This was passed by a Republican House, Republican Senate, and signed by a Republican President.

Third, the age pension of 1907. It was passed by a Republican House and a Republican Senate and signed by a Republican President.

These last two bills grant the large amount of pensions to the overwhelming majority of pensioners. The amounts paid and the number of pensioners under other bills, while being substantial, in comparison with those coming under these three bills are inconsiderable. Of the 24 bills, all of minor importance, for which the gentleman from Indiana claims his party's credit, practically all were passed with the assistance of only one Democratic branch of Congress, while the President and the other branch of Congress were Republican.

One bill alone, as I have heretofore said, among the 24 was passed by a Democratic House and Senate and signed by a Democratic President. That bill related to increasing a few low pensions of $2 and $4 to a minimum of $6.

Upon the shelf of probably every Member of this House is a compilation of the pension laws. It is also within the reach of every citizen. An examination of that will reveal that at least 50 bills, more or less general in their character, have been passed since the Civil War, increasing ratings, granting valuable privileges, and liberal amendments to the statutes at the particular periods in force. The large majority of these bills were passed by Republican Congresses, signed by Republican Presidents, and, with but few exceptions, the Republicans contributed the action of one branch of Congress and the presidential approval to the enactment of all the others.

Attention is called to the special pension legislation. The following table shows special bills passed by the last 11 Congresses:

	House.	Senate.	President.	Bills.
Fifty-first (1889–1891)	Republican.	Republican.	Republican.	1,388
Fifty-second (1891–1893)	Democratic.	do.	do.	217
Fifty-third (1893–1895)	do.	Democratic.	Democratic.	119
Fifty-fourth (1895–1897)	Republican.	do.	Republican.	378
Fifty-fifth (1897–1899)	do.	Republican.	do.	694
Fifty-sixth (1899–1901)	do.	do.	do.	1,391
Fifty-seventh (1901–1903)	do.	do.	do.	2,171
Fifty-eighth (1903–1905)	do.	do.	do.	3,355
Fifty-ninth (1905–1907)	do.	do.	do.	6,030
Sixtieth (1907–1909)	do.	do.	do.	6,600
Sixty-first	do.	do.	do.	9,623
Total				31,966

This table, carefully scanned with reference to the responsible parties in power, is an eloquent tribute to Republican pension liberality and a powerful contradiction of the partisan claims of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. GOEKE. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SLOAN. For a question material to that which I am particularly discussing, as my time is going on.

Mr. GOEKE. The Anderson bill is much along the line of the Sulloway bill.

Mr. SLOAN. I so understand.

Mr. GOEKE. Only a little more liberal, perhaps.

Mr. SLOAN. I should not object to the liberality.

Mr. GOEKE. The Senate declined and failed to pass that bill.

Mr. SLOAN. The Senate, I understand, did not decline——

Mr. SHERWOOD. It failed——

Mr. SLOAN. It failed, yes; as did these other matters of legislation, all of which have been renewed in this House, save and except the pension bill, and passed by the House at the dictation of a Democratic caucus of this House. If all the pension bills passed by a Republican House and Senate and signed by a Republican President were to be carried by the gentleman from Indiana, it would have made him as bowlegged physically as was the logic of his recent effort. [Laughter.] He gives his colleague [Mr. DIXON] the blame or credit of compiling the list. One might wonder what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DIXON] had against his colleague [Mr. ADAIR]. That record, like that of a person with a "past," had better never have been referred to. It is a record which had better be labeled "A conviction of dereliction and not a basis of boast."

With these defenses submitted, the American people will have little patience. Many will think that instead of these special and specious pleas you would better have followed the senior Weller's advice and tried to prove an "alibi." I find no fault with Gen. SHERWOOD's desire to have his name at the head of a general pension bill. His ill feeling expressed against so many in his own State and elsewhere throughout the country outside of this House and the vaunting of his own martyrdom perhaps work to the prejudice of his proposed bill. But if his martyrdom in his home State, so graphically described, is of a kind and character like that here claimed by him to have been suffered in this House, we can not accept it at par. Some of his comrades might like to see his name head the general pension bill, but the proper figures on their quarterly pension vouchers would please them better.

With all that has been said of the excellent record of Gen. SHERWOOD, I am pleased to accord; but this is a living age and not a period confined to reminiscence.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow an interruption? I want to say to the gentleman that in my speech which I made on the 26th of February, 1908, the first general speech I made on my dollar-a-day bill, I said I had no personal pride, and if the leader, mentioning Mr. PAYNE on the Republican side, would assume my bill and take charge of it I would never mention in public I had introduced such a bill. That shows whether I was ambitious to have my name at the head of a bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SLOAN. I think it would be a decidedly laudable ambition.

Mr. SHERWOOD. But you misrepresented me in that respect and I desire to correct it. I have no ambition of that kind.

Mr. SLOAN. I accept the gentleman's statement and consider it with the other statements and facts, and each one can draw his own conclusion.

Between 1861 and 1865 was a time when his high courage carried him with life at stake against the enemies of his country. Then, and for a long time thereafter, his judgment guided him in the support of Republican policies. But this is a day when his lack of judgment makes him a Democrat and lack of courage while he holds the master-key of pension legislation affecting his former comrades in arms makes him cringe before the political lash of those whose ability makes it sting. It compels him to wear the clanking caucus chains making, instead of the militant hero of former years, a crushed victim of the new Washington system of "white slavery," the "Democratic caucus," over the outer door of which is written, "Who enters here leaves political independence behind," while over the inner portal is inscribed the threat, "Who departs herefrom leaves political hope behind." [Applause.]

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow an interruption right there?

Mr. SLOAN. For a question; yes—for a material question.

Mr. SHERWOOD. In regard to my bill being a nonpartisan bill——

Mr. SLOAN. That is not the purpose for which I yielded, Mr. Chairman; and, Mr. Chairman, I desire that I have order.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I supposed you wanted the facts.

Mr. SLOAN. No, sir. I yielded for a question, and the gentleman knew it.

How times and measures change. Less than a year ago independence on the part of individual Members of the then majority of this House was lauded and heralded as the highest type of citizenship and public service. But in a few short months political independence of thought or action in the membership of the now majority has become an unpardonable political sin. Were we but individuals and our own masters, we might properly surrender to the absolute dictates of a caucus. But if we do surrender we carry with us the rights and privileges of the 200,000 people at home whom we represent. After all it is better while being partisan to wear your individual rights as "royal robes, your manhood as a crown." [Applause.]

It is not a question of which bill; it is the question of a bill. I think the Sulloway bill or its equivalent, the Anderson bill, the best measure which has received serious recent consideration. Gen. SHERWOOD should not keep his bill in hiding. He should have given us an opportunity to examine it. If it is worthy of its author's description, many of us would be ready to vote for it. Why should its mother and midwife prevent its birth? Let it be born. Following the lead of Gen. SHERWOOD and using a chicken metaphore, we say, "Produce." "We can endure your cackle if you will only lay the egg." [Laughter and applause.] It should have been passed and sent to the Senate long ago. One really creditable act might be placed in the list of achievements of this long and weary session.

You say Republicans should have acted before. You can never act earlier than now. Every day brings 540,000 ex-Union soldiers "one day nearer home." Every day's delay 100 are no more. While the roll is being called from week to week, by which you on that side prevent the Anderson or the Sherwood bill from being passed upon, two comrades fall by the way. While the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Ohio spoke eight of those who wore the blue stepped into the ranks of the final majority.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow an interruption right there?

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman heard what the gentleman from New York said about my time——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield?

Mr. SHERWOOD. I desire to call attention to the fact——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska declines to yield.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I want to call attention to the fact——

Mr. SLOAN. Does or does not the gentleman obey the gavel?

Mr. SHERWOOD. I did not hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska declines to yield.

Mr. SLOAN. I always thought the gentleman was a good soldier and obeyed a command.

During the span of this session three veterans for whom I hoped to obtain special bills have turned their longing eyes from the Nation's Capitol to life's sunset, and earth's light to them is gone. I had hoped through special bills or general legislation to have had them provided some food, raiment, shelter, and medicine, and to so have eased their final moments that among their closing sentiments might have been gratitude to a generous Government which they once saved. These soldiers gave their youth, their strength, their opportunities; they risked their lives to reweld the Union and keep Old Glory in the heavens. They went against as brave and strong as they. The best and bravest in blue met the best and bravest in gray; valor met valor; strength met strength. Roman could not teach one nobility. Greek could give no lessons of grandeur to the other. The martial might of right met the inspiration of a fearful conviction, and that conviction a mistake.

These veterans for whom I plead were right. Let us be just, and that speedily, rather than generous, with too much delay. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to yield any further time this evening.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CULLOP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the House had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12812) to reduce the duties on the manufactures of cotton and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SMALL, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for 10 days on account of important business.

Mr. BARTHOLDT, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for the balance of the session on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Tuesday, August 1, 1911, at 12 o'clock m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of State submitting an estimate for an appropriation for the purpose of carrying into effect a special agreement for the submission and arbitration of pecuniary claims outstanding between the United States and Great Britain (H. Doc. No. 97), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13103) granting a pension to John E. Smith; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 11870) granting an increase of pension to Stephen House; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 11343) granting a pension to Livingston D. Smith; Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WOOD of New Jersey: Papers to accompany House bill 13160, granting an increase of pension to Rebecca M. Clark; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, August 1, 1911.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EMPLOYEES IN IRON AND STEEL INDUSTRY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting, in partial compliance with a resolution of the Senate of June 23, 1910, a report dealing with the wages and hours of labor in the principal occupations in the iron and steel industry in the United States, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate No. 1 to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 130) making appropriations for certain expenses of the House of Representatives incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress; agrees to the amendment of the Senate No. 2 with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate; disagrees to the residue of the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution; asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. BARTLETT and Mr. CANNON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

LEMON INDUSTRY IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, a few minutes before adjournment last evening the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] offered an amendment to the pending House free-list bill placing lemons on the free list. The amendment has not been considered by the Ways and Means Committee of the House nor by the Finance Committee of the Senate. It seems to me an unfair advantage that the representatives of this great industry should not have an opportunity of being heard upon it.

As under the agreement we are debarred from speaking upon questions of amendment to-day, I ask permission of the Senate to insert in the RECORD the following letter addressed to me, with accompanying data, giving the imports and value of lemons during the last two years, the amount of revenue to the Government therefrom, and also the present status of the supply of lemons from California.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the letter and accompanying data will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

AUGUST 1, 1911.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: As representing the citrus-fruit growers of California, I beg to submit for your information the following:

The producers of California citrus fruit desire an opportunity of being heard before any action is taken by the present session of Congress on the schedule affecting citrus fruit. They are now causing to be tabulated data statistics covering all features and phases of the lemon industry, in both California and Sicily, and from the ground to the consumer. To get this vast amount of data in succinct and intelligent form requires the expenditure of a good deal of time and a large amount of labor, and we respectfully submit that full hearing of all pertinent facts should be accorded the domestic producers.

The output of California citrus fruits this year is the greatest in its history, a total of about forty-odd thousand carloads of oranges and about 7,000 carloads of lemons being shipped. The amount of capital invested in the citrus-fruit industry in California is approximately $166,800,000. One hundred and fifty thousand citizens of the United States and residents of the State of California are directly dependent on that industry for a livelihood.

Regarding California lemons specifically, will say that the production has increased about 25 per cent since the Payne-Aldrich Act took effect, with also an increase in planting since the same date of 30 per cent. Before the tariff of 1½ cents per pound on foreign lemons went into effect California was producing about 40 per cent of the lemons consumed in the United States, and since that time about 50 per cent of the entire consumption.

FOREIGN LEMONS.

The records of the United States Treasury Department will show that the increase in imports of foreign lemons was about 25,000,000 pounds for the year immediately following the passage of the Payne-Aldrich Act, as compared with the year immediately preceding. But to bring it down to the present time, will note from the records of the New York Fruit Exchange:

	Boxes.
Receipts of foreign lemons at port of New York, June, 1909	238,500
Receipts of foreign lemons at port of New York, June, 1910	307,000
Receipts of foreign lemons at port of New York, June, 1911	359,000
Receipts of foreign lemons July 1 to 28, 1910	265,920
Receipts of foreign lemons July 1 to 28, 1911	387,525

By reference to these figures it will readily be seen that imports have greatly increased under the duty of 1½ cents per pound.

REVENUE.

The revenue collected on imported lemons during the fiscal year 1909 was $1,350,738.88, and in 1910 (which comprehended 11 months after the passage of the Payne-Aldrich Act) the duty collected amounted to $2,233,526.87, the largest revenue ever collected in any one fiscal year on imported lemons.

PRICE.

Without going into this feature extensively, I just wish to call to your attention prices which each and every Member of Congress can himself readily verify. In the city of Washington, D. C., in the immediate neighborhood of Seventh Street and Pennsylvania Avenue NW., good quality, 300 and 360 sizes, lemons have at no time for many months past been higher than 15 cents per dozen, frequently at 10 cents per dozen, but a general average price would be 12 cents per dozen. These low prices to the consumer have prevailed only since the Payne-Aldrich Act went into effect. The yield of apples in the United States last year was 23,825,000 barrels, and, with no import duty on this variety of fruit, they have practically for many months been selling for 5 cents an individual fruit; or, in other words, the cost of two to three apples equals the cost of a dozen lemons. In further confirmation of low prices of lemons since the Payne-Aldrich Act became effective, will note that the selling price of lemons during the week preceding the 4th of July is generally one of the highest of the summer, and for that week, ending July 1, 1911 (duty 1½ cents per pound), the average f. o. b. price per box for California lemons was $1.47 less than the average f. o. b. during the same period in 1909 (duty 1 cent per pound).

Very truly, yours,

W. L. MOULTON.

COMPARATIVE STATEMENT OF VISIBLE SUPPLY OF LEMONS AND RANGE OF PRICES JUNE 24, 1911, NEW YORK.

This table shows that lemons have decreased in cost to the consumer during a period of four years, the last two years being under the Payne-Aldrich tariff rate of 1½ cents per pound. Note the price of $4.40 per box in 1907 for choice firsts as compared with $3.87½ in 1911.

Also note the increased product of California—only 39,680 boxes on the New York market June 24, 1907, as against 97,600 June 24, 1911.

A BRIEF RECAPITULATION OF THE LEMON INDUSTRY IN CALIFORNIA, WITH REFERENCE TO ACREAGE PLANTED AND AVAILABLE FOR LEMON GROWING IN THAT STATE.

The lemon industry was established in California about 20 years ago. In the course of 10 years 6,500 acres were planted in the southern portion of the State. The Dingley Tariff Act encouraged development, and the acreage amounted in 1892 to 15,000 acres. It was then found that the tariff rate of 1 cent per pound was not sufficient protection and the acreage decreased until in 1904 there were only about 9,200 acres.

At this point in the history of the lemon industry the transcontinental railroads awoke to the fact that it was but a question of time until the cultivation of lemons in California would cease; and they reduced the rate on this product from $1.25 to $1 per pound from points in California to points in the United States and Canada. With this incentive, the acreage increased until in 1909 we had 16,700 acres, with an annual output of 1,585,000 boxes. Since the passage of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, which increased the duty on lemons to 1½ cents per pound, the increased output of California lemons has been 25 per cent, and the acreage planted has been increased 30 per cent; and instead of supplying only about 30 per cent of the demand in the United States, California now supplies nearly 50 per cent.

The following statement of lemon plantings in California in 1909–10 and of available acreage suitable for the production of lemons, shows the progress that has been made under proper protection.

Counties.	Plantings last two years.	Plantings arranged for next spring.	Total.	Dec. 31, 1910—Available land for lemon growing on which water is or can be developed.

Ventura	1,000	500	1,500	20,000
Total	3,380	5,150	8,530	56,000

[1] The lemons in Tulare County are produced almost entirely in one crop in the fall. There is practically unlimited land there, no great proportion of which will probably ever be set out on account of the comparatively small consumption of lemons at that season of the year. When the plantings now being made in that section come into bearing, we will have a solution of the problem of the high prices that have heretofore prevailed in the period between the old and new crops of southern California and Sicily.

By Mr. OWEN:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 46) authorizing a per capita distribution of the tribal funds of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, and Seminole Indians; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MESSENGERS TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. PAYNTER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 125), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That each of the following-named committees is hereby authorized to employ a messenger at a salary of $1,200 per annum: Standards, Weights, and Measures; on the Mississippi River and its Tributaries; on Railroads; on the University of the United States; on Pacific Railroads; to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service; on Indian Depredations; to Investigate Trespassers upon Indian Lands; on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard; and on the Geological Survey; and that said salaries be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law.

TARIFF DUTIES ON WOOL.

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a public document (S. Doc. No. 82) a comparative table respecting the duties on wool in Canada and the United States. It has been already printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear the request of the Senator. I should like to have him repeat it.

Mr. GORE. I ask to have printed as a public document the comparative table which I had inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a few days ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As a Senate document. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The order is entered.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives agreeing to the amendment of the Senate No. 1, agreeing to the amendment of the Senate No. 2 with an amendment, disagreeing to the residue of the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 130) making appropriations for certain expenses of the House of Representatives incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate No. 2; insist upon its amendments to the joint resolution; agree to the conference asked for by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. GAMBLE, and Mr. CULBERSON conferees on the part of the Senate.

PROPOSED REDUCTION OF DUTIES.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, it was my intention to offer as an amendment to the free-list bill, which is to be voted upon to-day, the amendment which I submitted on July 25, providing for the reduction at the rate of one-tenth per annum of all duties the importations under which do not equal one-tenth of the total domestic production of the United States, but yielding to the general sentiment upon this side of the Senate that the free-list bill should not be embarrassed by amendments relating to other schedules or general amendments, I have concluded to reserve the amendment to be offered later on upon the cotton bill or such other legislation as may be presented to the Senate by the House.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I ask if the morning business has closed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not. Is there other morning business? The morning business is closed and the Chair lays before the Senate House bill 4413.

THE FREE LIST.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cummins	Lodge	Rayner
Bailey	Curtis	Lorimer	Reed
Bankhead	Davis	McCumber	Richardson
Borah	Dillingham	McLean	Root
Bourne	Dixon	Martin, Va.	Shively

Mr. TAYLOR. My colleague [Mr. LEA] is absent from the city on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the day following the passage of this act the following articles shall be exempt from duty when imported into the United States:

Plows, tooth and disk harrows, headers, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horserakes, cultivators, threshing machines and cotton gins, farm wagons and farm carts, and all other agricultural implements of any kind and description, whether specifically mentioned herein or not, whether in whole or in parts, including repair parts.

Bagging for cotton, gunny cloth, and all similar fabrics, materials, or coverings, suitable for covering and baling cotton, composed in whole or in part of jute, jute butts, hemp, flax, seg, Russian seg, New Zealand tow, Norwegian tow, aloe, mill waste, cotton tares, or any other materials or fibers suitable for covering cotton; and burlaps and bags or sacks composed wholly or in part of jute or burlaps or other material suitable for bagging or sacking agricultural products.

Hoop or band iron, or hoop or band steel, cut to lengths, punched or not punched, or wholly or partly manufactured into hoops or ties, coated or not coated with paint or any other preparation, with or without buckles or fastenings, for baling cotton or any other commodity; and wire for baling hay, straw, and other agricultural products.

Grain, buff, split, rough and sole leather, band, bend, or belting leather, boots and shoes made wholly or in chief value of leather made from cattle hides and cattle skins of whatever weight, of cattle of the bovine species, including calfskins; and harness, saddles, and saddlery, in sets or in parts, finished or unfinished, composed wholly or in chief value of leather; and leather cut into shoe uppers or vamps or other forms suitable for conversion into manufactured articles.

Barbed fence wire, wire rods, wire strands or wire rope, wire woven or manufactured for wire fencing, and other kinds of wire suitable for fencing, including wire staples.

Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and meats of all kinds, fresh, salted, pickled, dried, smoked, dressed or undressed, prepared or preserved in any manner; bacon, hams, shoulders, lard, lard compounds and lard substitutes; and sausage and sausage meats.

Buckwheat flour, corn meal, wheat flour and semolina, rye flour, bran, middlings, and other offals of grain, oatmeal and rolled oats, and all prepared cereal foods; and biscuits, bread, wafers, and similar articles not sweetened.

Timber, hewn, sided, or squared, round timber used for spars or in building wharves, shingles, laths, fencing posts, sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, rough or dressed, except boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, of lignum-vitæ, lancewood, ebony, box, granadilla, mahogany, rosewood, satinwood, and all other cabinet woods.

Sewing machines, and all parts thereof.

Salt, whether in bulk or in bags, sacks, barrels, or other packages.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. I offer the following amendment and ask that it may lie on the table. I wish to have it read. I will call it up later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the Senator does not now offer the amendment? The Chair thinks it is not in order, under the unanimous-consent agreement, to offer amendments to be laid over.

Mr. GRONNA. I offer it now, and I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota offers an amendment, which the Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 9, after the word "articles," strike out the words "not sweetened," so as to make the paragraph read:

Buckwheat flour, corn meal, wheat flour and semolina, rye flour, bran, middlings, and other offals of grain, oatmeal and rolled oats, and all prepared cereal foods; and biscuits, bread, wafers, and similar articles.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRONNA. I offer the following amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, after the word "shoes," in line 16, strike out the words "made wholly or in chief value of leather made from cattle hides and cattle skins of whatever weight, of cattle of the bovine species, including calfskins, and," so as to read:

Grain, buff, split, rough and sole leather, band, bend, or belting leather, boots and shoes; harness, saddles, and saddlery, etc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRONNA. At the bottom of page 3, I move to add:

Roman, Portland, and other hydraulic cement, and lime.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from North Dakota. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment be again stated.

The Secretary again stated the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota asks for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

The SECRETARY. On page 3, after line 18, it is proposed to add the following:

Coal and coke of all kinds, including coal slack and compositions used for fuel in which coal or coal dust is the component material of chief value.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Secretary read the amendment very hurriedly. I ask that it be again read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Secretary again stated the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. By arrangement with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who is paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY], I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Hampshire to the Senator from Mississippi and will vote. I vote "nay." I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). Because of my general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] I am unable to vote upon this amendment or upon any other amendment that may be offered to the bill or on the question of the final passage of the bill. I make this announcement at this time for the day. I will add that if the Senator from South Carolina were present, and I were at liberty to vote, I should vote against this amendment, and I should also vote against the final passage of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON (when Mr. DU PONT's name was called). My colleague [Mr. DU PONT] is necessarily absent from the Chamber. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay." I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. BURNHAM (when Mr. GALLINGER's name was called). My colleague [Mr. GALLINGER] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS], which pair, I understand, has been transferred to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I am paired on all votes to-day with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. SMOOT (when Mr. SUTHERLAND's name was called). My colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] received notice of the death of his father yesterday and left for home yesterday evening. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. I shall allow this notice to stand for the day.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. RAYNER (after having voted in the negative). I voted by mistake, as I am paired with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

Mr. BACON. I am requested to announce that the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT].

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 52, as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bailey	Crawford	Gronna	Martine, N. J.
Borah	Cummins	Hitchcock	Nelson

So Mr. GRONNA's amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRONNA. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, after line 9, it is propsed to insert:

Apples, peaches, quinces, cherries, plums, pears, berries, cranberries, and pineapples, in their natural condition.
Lemons, oranges, limes, grapefruit, and shaddocks, or pomelos.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there other amendments to be offered?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I move, beginning with the word "beef," in line 1, on page 3, to strike out all down to and including the word "meats," in line 5 of page 3.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Beginning at the top of page 3, it is proposed to strike out the following paragraph:

Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and meats of all kinds, fresh, salted, pickled, dried, smoked, dressed or undressed, prepared or preserved in any manner; bacon, hams, shoulders, lard, lard compounds and lard substitutes; and sausage and sausage meats.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, on that amendment I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). Again announcing the transfer of my pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], I vote "nay."

Mr. BURNHAM (when Mr. GALLINGER's name was called). I make the same announcement as before regarding my colleague [Mr. GALLINGER], and will state that if he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER], who is unavoidably detained. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. RAYNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], but I understand he would vote "nay" if present. Therefore I vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 14, nays 63, as follows:

YEAS—14.

Bailey	Clapp	Gamble	La Follette
Borah	Crawford	Heyburn	Townsend
Bourne	Cummins	Jones
Bristow	Dixon	Kenyon

NAYS—63.

NOT VOTING—13.

Culberson	Gallinger	Penrose	Williams
Dillingham	Guggenheim	Percy du Pont	Lea	Sutherland
Frye	Paynter	Tillman

So Mr. BAILEY's amendment was rejected.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I move to strike out, beginning with the word "buckwheat," in line 6, down to and including the word "sweetened," in line 9, on page 2.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, beginning with line 6, it is proposed to strike out the following paragraph:

Buckwheat flour, corn meal, wheat flour and semolina, rye flour, bran, middlings, and other offals of grain, oatmeal and rolled oats, and all prepared cereal foods; and biscuits, bread, wafers, and similar articles not sweetened.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. BAILEY. In view of the other vote, I will not ask for the yeas and nays on this question.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BAILEY. I move to strike out the period after the word "sweetened," in line 9, page 3, and insert a comma and the words "and lemons," so as to put lemons on the free list.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas offers an amendment, which the Secretary will report.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 9, after the word "sweetened," insert the words "and lemons."

Mr. BAILEY. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). Again announcing the transfer of my pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], I vote "nay."

Mr. BURNHAM (when Mr. GALLINGER's name was called). I make the same announcement in regard to my colleague.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (when his name was called). In the absence of my general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER], I withhold my vote.

Mr. RAYNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BACON. I again announce, and will let it stand for all subsequent votes, the pair between the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT].

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 59, as follows:

YEAS—15.

Bailey	Clapp	Johnson, Me.	O'Gorman
Borah	Crawford	McCumber	Owen
Bourne	Curtis	Martine, N. J.	Pomerene
Brown	Gronna	Nelson

NAYS—59.

NOT VOTING—16.

Clarke, Ark.	Frye	Lea	Rayner
Culberson	Gallinger	Paynter	Sutherland
Dillingham	Guggenheim	Penrose	Tillman
du Pont	Kenyon	Percy	Williams

So Mr. BAILEY's amendment was rejected.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move to amend by striking out all of lines 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15, on page 3.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho offers an amendment, which the Secretary will report.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, beginning with line 10, it is proposed to strike out the following paragraph:

Timber, hewn, sided, or squared, round timber used for spars or in building wharves, shingles, laths, fencing posts, sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, rough or dressed, except boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, of lignum-vitæ, lancewood, ebony, box, granadilla, mahogany, rosewood, satinwood, and all other cabinet woods.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES. On page 3, line 11, I move to strike out the word "shingles."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington offers an amendment, which the Secretary will report.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 11, strike out the word "shingles."

Mr. JONES. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). Again announcing the transfer of my pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], I vote "nay."

Mr. BURNHAM (when Mr. GALLINGER's name was called). I make the same announcement in regard to my colleague.

Mr. RAYNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I desire to announce as applicable to all votes taken to-day that the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], and that the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY] is paired with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

The result was announced—yeas 6, nays 72, as follows:

YEAS—6.

Borah	Heyburn	Lorimer	Oliver
Bourne	Jones

NAYS—72.

Bacon	Cullom	Lodge	Richardson
Bailey	Cummins	McCumber	Root
Bankhead	Curtis	McLean	Shively
Bradley	Davis	Martin, Va.	Simmons
Brandegee	Dixon	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Md.

Crawford	Lippitt	Reed	Works

NOT VOTING—12.

Culberson	Frye	Penrose	Sutherland
Dillingham	Gallinger	Percy	Tillman
du Pont	Lea	Rayner	Williams

So the amendment of Mr. JONES was rejected.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move to amend by striking out, on page 3, commencing with the word "sawed," in line 12, down to and including the word "except," in line 13.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 12, after the word "posts," strike out the following words: "sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, rough or dressed, except," so as to read:

Timber, hewn, sided, or squared, round timber used for spars or in building wharves, shingles, laths, fencing posts, boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, of lignum-vitæ, lancewood, ebony, box, granadilla, mahogany, rosewood, satinwood, and all other cabinet woods.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no further amendments to be offered as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and it was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BAILEY. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). Again announcing the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], I vote "yea."

Mr. RICHARDSON (when Mr. DU PONT's name was called). I again announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BURNHAM (when Mr. GALLINGER's name was called). I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. GALLINGER], if present, would vote "nay." He is paired, as has been stated, with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY].

Mr. RAYNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. If he were present, I would vote "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, it resulted—yeas 39, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—39.

Bacon	Gore	Nelson	Simmons
Bankhead	Gronna	Newlands	Smith, Md.
Brown	Hitchcock	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.
Bryan	Johnson, Me.	Overman	Stone
Chamberlain	Johnston, Ala.	Owen	Swanson

NOT VOTING—12.

Culberson	Frye	Penrose	Sutherland
Dillingham	Gallinger	Percy	Tillman
du Pont	Lea	Rayner	Williams

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the passage of the bill the yeas are 39, the nays are 39. The nays have it, and the bill fails to pass.

Mr. GRONNA. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota can not make that motion, he not having voted on the prevailing side.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I move to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate decided against the passage of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin moves to reconsider the vote by which the bill failed to pass.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. KERN. I desire to offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to reconsidering the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading? The Chair hears none, and the vote by which the third reading was ordered is reconsidered. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, in lieu of the paragraph contained in lines 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, insert:

Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and meats of all kinds, fresh, salted, pickled, dried, smoked, dressed or undressed, prepared or preserved in any manner; bacon, hams, shoulders, lard, lard compounds and lard substitutes, sausage and sausage meats, coming from any foreign country with which the United States has a reciprocal trade agreement and which shall admit from the United States, free of duty, cotton, corn, wheat, oats, horses, cattle, and hogs.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, the Secretary has not read my amendment. I wish he would read the language in which I offered it.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. President, I move to amend House bill 4413 as follows:

By repunctuating the clause commencing with the word "beef," in the first line of page 3 of the printed bill, and ending with the word "meats," in line 5 on said page, and adding thereto the following words: "coming from any foreign country which shall admit from the United States, free of duty, cotton, corn, wheat, oats, horses, cattle, and hogs;" so that said clause when so amended shall read as follows:

"Beef, veal, mutton, lamb——

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will inquire as to whether this is an amendment in an amendment proposed to the pending bill or not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not think it is so intended to be. The amendment has already been read, and I understand that this is something that is being offered elsewhere.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is an amendment to the pending bill, offered as such, the Chair understands. The Secretary will continue reading the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it being read again? It was read once.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator who offered the amendment thought the Clerk had not reported it as it had been presented, and asked that it be read in full just as presented, which the Clerk is now doing.

Mr. KERN. I noticed a clerical error that the words interpolated in the clause as it would read if amended are not interpolated in the amendment itself. So I asked that it might be read again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reading will be continued.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. President, I move to amend House bill 4413, as follows:

By repunctuating the clause commencing with the word "beef," in the first line of page 3 of the printed bill, and ending with the word "meats," in line 5 on said page, and adding thereto the following words: "coming from any foreign country with which the United States has a reciprocal trade agreement and which shall admit from the United States free of duty cotton, corn, wheat, oats, horses, cattle, and hogs"; so that that clause when so amended will read as follows:

"Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and meats of all kinds, fresh, salted, pickled, dried, smoked, dressed or undressed, prepared or preserved in any manner; bacon, hams, shoulders, lard, lard compounds and lard substitutes, sausage and sausage meats, coming from any country with which the United States has a reciprocal trade agreement and which shall admit from the United States free of duty cotton, corn, wheat, oats, horses, cattle, and hogs."

Also, by repunctuating the clause commencing with the word "buckwheat," in line 6 on page 3 of the printed bill, and ending with the word "sweetened," in line 9 on said page, and adding thereto the following words: "coming from any foreign country with which the United States has a reciprocal trade agreement and which shall admit from the United States free of duty cotton, corn, wheat, oats, horses, cattle, and hogs"; so that said clause, when so amended, shall read as follows:

"Buckwheat flour, corn meal, wheat flour and semolina, rye flour, bran, middlings, and other offals of grain, oatmeal and rolled oats, and all prepared cereal foods, and buscuits, bread, wafers, and similar articles, not sweetened, coming from any foreign country with which the United States has a reciprocal trade agreement and which shall admit from the United States free of duty cotton, corn, wheat, oats, horses, cattle, and hogs."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

Mr. CRAWFORD, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, and others called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). Again announcing the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], I vote "yea."

Mr. BURNHAM (when Mr. GALLINGER's name was called). My colleague [Mr. GALLINGER], if present and voting, would vote "nay." He is paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY].

Mr. RAYNER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. I would vote "yea" if the junior Senator from Utah were present.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 49, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—49.

Bacon	Cummins	La Follette	Shively
Bailey	Davis	McCumber	Simmons
Bankhead	Dixon	Martin, Va.	Smith, Md.
Borah	Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Stone
Bourne	Foster	Myers	Swanson

NOT VOTING—12.

Culberson	Frye	Penrose	Sutherland
Dillingham	Gallinger	Percy	Tillman
du Pont	Lea	Rayner	Williams

So Mr. KERN's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIVELY. I move to amend, on page 1, before the comma at the end of line 6, by inserting the words "and binders."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Indiana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 6, after the word "harvesters" and before the comma, insert the words "and binders."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert:

Roman, Portland, and other hydraulic cement, and lime.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed, on page 2, after the word "shoes," in line 16, to strike out the words "made wholly or in chief value of leather made from cattle hides and cattle skins of whatever weight, of cattle of the bovine species, including calf skins; and"

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. One moment, if the Senator from Oklahoma will excuse the Chair. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which my amendment to put lemons on the free list was defeated. As the Senate now seems willing to amend the bill, I am sure it will be glad——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] had been recognized for an amendment. The Chair thought the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] had risen to say something in reference to the vote just taken.

Mr. BAILEY. No.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert the following paragraph:

Pulp of wood mechanically ground; pulp of wood, chemical, bleached, or unbleached; news-print paper and other paper, and paper board, manufactured from mechanical wood pulp or from chemical wood pulp, or of which such pulp is the component material of chief value, colored in the pulp, or not colored, and valued at not more than 4 cents per pound, not including printed or decorated wall paper.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. I demand the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REED. I ask that the amendment may be again stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Secretary again stated the amendment proposed by Mr. GORE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNHAM (when Mr. GALLINGER's name was called). I desire to again make the same announcement previously made by me in reference to the pair of my colleague [Mr. GALLINGER] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS], having been transferred to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY].

Mr. RAYNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BACON. Again announcing the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 53, as follows:

YEAS—25.

Bristow	Dixon	La Follette	Reed
Brown	Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Swanson
Bryan	Gore	Myers	Taylor
Clapp	Gronna	Newlands	Watson
Crawford	Johnson, Me.	O'Gorman

du Pont	Lea	Rayner	Williams

So Mr. GORE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. GORE. I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following:

Type, linotype and typesetting machines, and printing presses.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, on yesterday I submitted two amendments to the pending bill, one of which I shall not call up to-day because it has been substantially covered. It relates to Canada. The other amendment I ask to have read, and I desire now to submit it as an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma will be stated.

Mr. GORE. I offer the amendment relating to commercial union between the nations of the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. LODGE. What question is pending, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma has offered an amendment which the Secretary is about to state.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That whenever it shall be duly certified to the President of the United States that the Government or Governments of any or all nations of the American hemisphere have declared a desire to establish commercial union with the United States, having a uniform revenue system, like internal taxes to be collected, and like import duties to be imposed on articles brought into either country from other nations, with no duties or with uniform duties upon trade between the United States and such nations, he shall appoint three commissioners to meet those who may be likewise designated to represent such Government or Governments, to prepare a plan for the assimilation of the import duties and internal-revenue taxes of such countries, and an equitable division of receipts, in a commercial union; and said commissioners shall report to the President, who shall lay the report before Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. I submit that that amendment is not germane to the pending proposition and is not in order under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question of germaneness must be submitted to the Senate. Senators who think the amendment is germane will say "aye" and those opposed "no." [Putting the question.] The "noes" have it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I rise to withdraw the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn, and it is also ruled out of order by the Senate. Does the Senator desire to offer his other amendment?

Mr. GORE. No.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I recall that it was a record vote which was taken when I moved to insert "lemons"; and, as I voted with the losing side, I can not move to reconsider.

The VICE PRESIDENT. At another stage of the proceedings the Senator need not move to reconsider.

Mr. BAILEY. I need not move to reconsider, but I can move the amendment at this time in the Senate. I move, on page 3, line 9, to insert, after the word "sweetened," the words "and lemons," and a comma instead of a period.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 9, after the word "sweetened," it is proposed to insert a comma and the words "and lemons."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LODGE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 6, after the words "buckwheat flour," it is proposed to insert:

Rice, cleaned; uncleaned rice, or rice free of the outer hull and still having the inner cuticle on; rice flour, rice meal, and broken rice; paddy, or rice having the outer hull on.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "ayes" seem to have it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, if there is no objection, I should like to have the amendment again stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Secretary again stated the amendment of Mr. LODGE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). Again announcing the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], I vote "nay."

Mr. RAYNER (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KERN (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to change my vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to change my vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. DAVIS (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to change my vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to change my vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 45, as follows:

YEAS—30.

So Mr. LODGE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. In lieu of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and at the same place in the bill, I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas offers an amendment which the Secretary will report.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 6, after the words "buckwheat flour," it is proposed to insert the following:

Boston baked beans, black beans, string beans, and all other beans, raw, dried, split, or parched; also codfish, skinned or unskinned, fresh, salted, or served in balls.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BAILEY. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when his name was called). Again announcing the transfer of my pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], I vote "yea."

Mr. BURNHAM (when Mr. GALLINGER's name was called). My colleague is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. If present, my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. RAYNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. If present, my colleague would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 48, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—48.

So the bill was passed.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2983) for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Thirteenth Census.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho will state it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Whether or not it is in order, the Senate having by unanimous consent determined upon the time when that measure shall be taken up, to change the order at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks this does not change the order. The Senate has determined to take it up for final disposition at a particular time, but the Chair thinks that it can be taken up meantime for consideration, not for disposal.

Mr. HEYBURN. Frequently, when the question of fixing a time for a vote has been before the Senate, one of the reasons that has been urged is that Senators may safely be absent, if their business requires it, with the assurance that the measure will not come up. That has often had much to do with the reaching of unanimous-consent agreements. This is the first time I have ever known this departure from that rule. It has always been understood that when we fixed a time to take up a measure for final determination Senators might safely be absent. I have no objection to taking it up except that I do not like to see a departure from a good rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was understood at the time the order was entered that the then unfinished business should continue to be the unfinished business, and be considered just as this is being considered, and precisely as the bill which has just been passed was considered.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course we can not vote upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly not.

Mr. PENROSE. It was also distinctly understood that amendments might be voted upon at any time up to the day fixed for the final disposition of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, yes; amendments in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will either himself or through some one else, if he is not here, lay this bill aside from time to time, in order that we may do other business. Of course, if anyone desires to debate the bill it ought to have the right of way. I recognize that. But I do not want the bill used for the purpose of preventing a vote upon some other measure in the meanwhile.

I make the suggestion to the Senator from Pennsylvania in order that we may have that understanding now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair suggest that it could not in any event do away with the morning hour, which is two hours?

Mr. CUMMINS. But we have met more than once a situation in which no one desired to debate the unfinished business, but rather than to lay it aside adjournment has been suggested, and that has accomplished delay in some very much needed legislation. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will have this in mind between now and the day we vote upon the reapportionment bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Of course, as far as I am concerned, I am not in charge of this particular bill. The unfinished business would be laid aside, I assume, at the request of a Senator, or the Senate can at any time drop the consideration of a measure and proceed to the consideration of any other bill. It is always in the hands of the Senate.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I should like briefly to explain two amendments which I have introduced to the pending bill.

Mr. BACON. Before the Senator from Ohio goes on with that, I desire to ask attention to what the Senator from Pennsylvania said as to an alleged understanding. I understood—there was a good deal of noise, and I may not have understood it correctly—the Senator from Pennsylvania to say that while Thursday was set for the day for voting upon pending amendments, there was an understanding that that would not prevent in the meantime voting upon other amendments to the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. My understanding is, and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], I believe, expressly raised the point at the time, that amendments can be voted upon at any time, but not the bill.

Mr. BACON. I did not know that fact. Of course, if it is, the Senator is correct. But I want to make this suggestion——

Mr. PENROSE. And as a matter of fact, we have been voting on amendments right along every day.

Mr. BACON. I will not try to interfere with that understanding, but I want to make this suggestion: I understand the amendments which have been offered were not amendments really to the apportionment bill, but as to other matters which were sought to be engrafted upon it, to which I have no objection.

The apportionment bill itself, I think, is a matter of such importance that whenever amendments to it proper are to be voted upon there should be such notice to the Senate as would enable Senators to be present. It is a matter of such importance and reaches every nook and corner of the country to such an extent as, in my opinion, to make it proper that the Senate should be upon notice whenever there is going to be a vote upon an amendment to the bill proper. That is the only suggestion I would make in regard to it. So far as concerns the offering of other amendments which do not relate to the matter of apportionment, I have no objection to that at any time.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, the request I made when the matter was up for consideration was that amendments might be offered in the intermediate days, so that there would not be a congestion on the day when the vote was to be taken, when debate could not be had, and one of the very purposes was to serve notice upon the Senate that amendments were likely to be voted upon any day, so that the Senate would not be practically abandoned on these intervening days.

Mr. BACON. I think the Senate will certainly recognize the fact that if the apportionment bill is to be amended without any regard to the final test voting, that is, if it can be done before that day, we will certainly have to have the Senate present all the time. These amendments are too important to be taken up informally when sometimes not more than a dozen Members of the Senate are present.

Mr. BRISTOW. I entirely agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. BURTON. I desire to state that I shall not at this time ask for a vote on my amendments. I should decidedly prefer that neither the vote upon them nor upon any other amendment should be taken until day after to-morrow, the day fixed by the unanimous-consent agreement. It is only fair to Members of the Senate that everyone should be here when the vote is taken. Again, it is not probable that there will be so many amendments proposed as to create any embarrassment. We can readily vote upon all of them on that day.

The first amendment to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate consists of the addition of a new section, to be known as section 5; on page 4, after line 19, to insert the following:

SEC. 5. That candidates for Representative or Representatives to be elected at large in any State shall be nominated in the same manner as candidates for governor, unless otherwise provided by the laws of such State.

The last section of the bill as reported—that is, section 4—contains this provision:

That in case of an increase in the number of Representatives in any State under this apportionment, such additional Representative or Representatives shall be elected by the State at large.

The bill as introduced and reported provides for choosing Representatives at large at the general election—that is, if a State has 21 Members under the old apportionment and 22 under the new bill or if the number of Members allotted to any State is increased and no reapportionment or redistricting is made by the State before the election of November, 1912, then such new Members shall be elected at large.

But I desire especially to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that while the election of additional Members apportioned to any State is provided for by this bill, yet in some States no machinery is provided for a nomination at large, and it is desirable that such a section should be added. I have examined the statutes of the State of Ohio and regard it as doubtful whether under the present laws of that State they could nominate a Congressman at large. The same is true of other States. This section is proposed to meet that contingency. It is to the effect that the Member of Congress shall be nominated in the same manner as the governor unless otherwise provided by law. After some consideration and consultation by correspondence with the attorneys general of a couple of the States interested, this seemed the simplest and the best provision to meet this situation.

I may desire to make some further remarks on this amendment to-morrow.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to his colleague?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. I have not had time to examine the question, and I ask simply for information. In view of the provision of the Federal Constitution which provides that the legislature shall prescribe the time, place, and manner of the election of Representatives, I should like the opinion of my colleague as to whether his proposed amendment would come within the power of Congress?

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I think it would. The right to fix the times, places, and manner of elections rests with the individual States. Congress may make or alter such regulations. That provision of the Constitution would be especially salutary when a State has failed to make any provision. Nomination is a part of the election, an essential step in choosing a representative; and if the laws of any State should lack a provision governing nominations, it is certainly entirely proper for Congress to supply that omission. Indeed, it might alter the regulation of a State, although that question is not raised here.

I want to say further in this connection that this subject was considered at some length in the discussion of the so-called publicity bill. The Senate has passed a bill providing that requirements relating to filing statements of expenses shall apply to contests for nomination as well as to contests in the election proper. If we can pass a bill making the provision of the Constitution referred to applicable to the conduct and to the expenses of candidates for election to the House and Senate, we certainly can pass a law pertaining to nominations. Thus, so far as the action of the Senate is concerned, an affirmative decision upon this question was certainly reached in the enactment of the publicity bill. Independently of that, however, I think this is clearly within the power of Congress.

Furthermore, Mr. President, this provision is so desirable in order to avoid complications, that the probabilities are altogether against any opposition or question being raised. This is not a controverted subject where a statute might inure to the benefit of one party or the other. It would benefit both parties alike in providing for a situation where there might be serious embarrassment.

The other amendment which I have proposed requires perhaps a somewhat more extended explanation. It is this: On page 4, line 15, after the word "redistricted," strike out the words "by the legislature thereof in the manner herein prescribed," and insert in lieu thereof the words:

In the manner provided by the laws thereof and in accordance with the rules enumerated in section 3 of this act.

This amendment pertains to the dividing of the several States into districts and to the manner in which this shall be done. Section 3 contains this clause:

That in each State entitled under this apportionment to more than one Representative, the Representatives to the Sixty-third and each subsequent Congress shall be elected by districts composed of a contiguous and compact territory, and containing as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants.

The next section—section 4—provides that Representatives "shall be elected from the districts now prescribed by law until such State shall be redistricted by the legislatures thereof in the manner herein prescribed." "The manner herein prescribed" means that the district shall be composed of contiguous and compact territory and contain as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants, as expressed in the prior section.

I desire to call attention to the fact that as the bill passed the House in the preceding Congress it did not contain this clause or expression, "by the legislature thereof."

Mr. President, whatever our views may be on the subject of the initiative or referendum we can not ignore the existence of statutes in divers States of the Union under which they are the recognized methods of enacting laws. Under such circumstances what is the effect of this expression, "by the legislature thereof"? It is a distinct and unequivocal condemnation of any legislation by referendum or by initiative. It is a mandate to the States to this intent: Whatever your laws may be for the enactment of statutes, yet in the division of the State into congressional districts you must act by the legislature alone, even if under the laws a trivial question can be submitted to the whole electorate, nevertheless in this very important matter of dividing the State into districts the legislature alone shall have full authority.

At first sight, in reading this section and finding the words "by the legislature thereof," it would seem to be an oversight. Whether it is or not, I am unable to say; but in any event it does not belong here. A due respect to the rights, to the established methods, and to the laws of the respective States requires us to allow them to establish congressional districts in whatever way they may have provided by their constitution and by their statutes.

I call attention to the exceptional importance of a districting law. Mr. President, we all know there have been most unjust—yes, I may say, shameful—instances of gerrymanders in some of the States. In one State of the Union last autumn the candidates of one party for judge of the supreme court and several other State offices received a majority of 3,000 or 4,000. Nevertheless in that same State, at the same election, out of 16 Congressmen 13 were chosen by the other, or minority, party in the State.

If there is anything which is clearly a distinct denial of the rights of popular government it is a gerrymander. It is possible to so adjust a State by shoestring districts, by including in one district remote portions of the State and connecting them by a narrow line, as to absolutely defeat the will of the people. I can not understand how the Senate can refuse to adopt this amendment.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SHIVELY. I agree with the Senator from Ohio in his view as to the iniquity of some of the gerrymanders. But in a general statement he might very easily be mistaken as to inferences to be drawn from the returns at an election. Take the instance of my own State. President Taft carried it in 1908, as I recall, by some 12,000 plurality, yet 11 out of the 13 Representatives were returned by the Democratic Party on an apportionment made by a Republican legislature.

On the face of the returns of an election you may conclude that there must have been a vile gerrymander. But, though our Republican friends had redistricted the State, and though the Republican candidate for President carried the State by 12,000, 11 out of the 13 districts returned Democrats.

I only say that local conditions in many States bring these things to pass. You can not always infer that they are the results of unfair apportionments.

Mr. BURTON. I concede to my friend from Indiana that under exceptional circumstances results of that kind may ensue. It is to be said that in the State of Indiana, in the election referred to, in 1908 a Democratic governor was elected and a Democratic legislature. I think I can call attention to another instance in Indiana which is even more striking than the one which the senior Senator from that State has mentioned.

Under a districting made by the Democrats in accordance with the census of 1890 there was a gross disproportion in the majorities in the respective districts. There were very large majorities under normal conditions in two or three districts which it was anticipated would go Republican, while in the others there was a small but apparently safe Democratic majority.

After 1892 and 1893 there was a nation-wide political reaction which extended to Indiana, and as a result in 1894 the Republicans carried every district in the State, sending a solid delegation to Congress.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Ohio yield further to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SHIVELY. Does the Senator infer that the result of the election in 1894 was due to a redistricting act passed by the Indiana Legislature?

Mr. BURTON. The solid Republican delegation was due, in a measure, to a lack of calculation on the part of those who framed the districts. The majorities which were relied upon to carry them for the Democrats did not prove reliable; the rather narrow margins by which it was expected many districts would be carried were entirely wiped out.

Mr. SHIVELY. Of course, the Democracy of Indiana that year went down with the general tide. In the Nation we elected only 12 Representatives in Congress north of Mason and Dixon's line. That can hardly be attributed to a so-called gerrymander. If the Senator means that political parties are apt to overreach themselves when they make unfair apportionments I agree with him. But if he wants to infer that his own party is exempt from that abuse of power, I think he is utterly mistaken.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, I do not claim that. If I were to make any comparison I would say that your party had been guilty of a larger number of transgressions, but I will not say that my own party has been entirely free from considerations of party advantage.

Mr. SHIVELY. There the Senator is woefully mistaken.

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator desires to go into that subject, I can give him some figures on the question which I think will establish it, but I do not desire to do so at this time, though I may later discuss this from a partisan standpoint.

I can entirely agree with the Senator from Indiana in the statement that local conditions may affect an election to such an extent that we may not be sure that it was an unjust division which caused the returns to show exceptional results. But my argument goes far beyond that. It is not a question of chance illustrations; it is a matter of principle.

If you have a referendum in a State the object of which is to submit to the people at large the question of whether or no a statute shall stand, the question whether it is just or unjust, that provision ought especially to apply to a law dividing a State into districts, where there is such an opportunity for monstrous injustice. If there is any case in the whole list of laws where you should apply your referendum, it is to a districting bill.

Senators on the other side, and on this side as well, have of late addressed the Senate ardently advocating the principle of the referendum and the initiative. I shall be interested to know whether they will permit the restriction, "by the legislature thereof," to remain in this statute. If you believe in the principle, stand by the principle and do not take that very inconsistent and absurd position, "We are for the rule, but we are against the application thereof."

I take it the object sought by the amendment I have proposed could be secured by merely striking out the words "by the legislature thereof," but if it is to be amended I think it is desirable to make both the substituted and the following words more definite. So I have suggested that the Senate strike out the words "by the legislature thereof in the manner herein prescribed," and insert in lieu thereof, first, the words "in the manner provided by the laws thereof." This gives to each State full authority to employ in the creation of congressional districts its own laws and regulations. What objection can be made to a provision of that kind? Pass this amendment, and you will transmit to each State the message "Proceed and district your State in accordance with your laws." This act does not do that. It sends the message, "Do it in only one specified way; that is, by your legislature." Then I think——

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. I will yield to the Senator from Indiana in just a moment. I think it best to add a few words more—"and in accordance with the rules enumerated by section 3 of this act." The rules enumerated in section 3 are, as already stated, that the districts shall be "composed of contiguous and compact territory, containing as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants."

Mr. President, there have been instances in which one district has contained two, or even three, times as many inhabitants as the adjoining district.

If we adopt as the basis of representation a population test, which is in accordance with the Constitution and laws of the United States, districts should be as nearly as possible equal in the number of their inhabitants. The courts in passing on provisions like this, requiring contiguous and compact territory, and as nearly as possible an equal population, have been averse to any interference. It therefore seemed best to set forth in section 4 the language "in accordance with the rules enumerated in section 3 of this act," so as to bring home to each legislature or to the electorate of any State when they vote under the provisions of an initiative or referendum the requirement that the districts must be symmetrical in form, contiguous, compact, and that gross violations of law in the way of inequality of population should not be tolerated.

Now, I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY]. I think otherwise I have said all that I care to at this time.

I wish to give notice, Mr. President, that I shall introduce other amendments before the vote is taken on the pending bill, and I may then desire to address the Senate at some length.

Mr. ROOT. I give notice of my intention to offer the following amendment, which I ask to have printed and laid on the table.

Mr. BURTON. In order to familiarize ourselves as nearly as possible with the question to be discussed, may I ask unanimous consent that the amendment submitted by the Senator from New York be read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York gives notice that at the proper time he will offer an amendment, which the Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out from and including line 5 on page 1 to and including line 15 on page 3, and insert the following:

Three hundred and ninety-one Members, to be apportioned among the several States as follows: Alabama, 9; Arkansas, 7; California, 10; Colorado, 3; Connecticut, 5; Delaware, 1; Florida, 3; Georgia, 11; Idaho, 1; Illinois, 24; Indiana, 12; Iowa, 10; Kansas, 7; Kentucky, 10; Louisiana, 7; Maine, 3; Maryland, 6; Massachusetts, 14; Michigan, 12; Minnesota, 9; Mississippi, 8; Missouri, 14; Montana, 2; Nebraska, 5; Nevada, 1; New Hampshire, 2; New Jersey, 11; New York, 39; North Carolina, 9; North Dakota, 2; Ohio, 20; Oklahoma, 7; Oregon, 3; Pennsylvania, 33; Rhode Island, 2; South Carolina, 7; South Dakota, 2; Tennessee, 9; Texas, 17; Utah, 2; Vermont, 2; Virginia, 9; Washington, 5; West Virginia, 5; Wisconsin, 10; Wyoming, 1.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks that his amendment may lie on the table and be printed. Without objection, the order will be entered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 2 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, August 2, 1911, at 12 o'clock m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate August 1, 1911.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, August 1, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., delivered the following prayer:

O Thou great Jehovah, King of Kings and Lord of Lords, mighty to deliver, come Thou and reign in all our hearts that the work of this day may be acceptable in Thy sight and redound therefore to the good of the people here represented. And Thine be the praise through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE WOOLEN SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 11019, an act to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, for the consideration of the House. And I desire to state to the House that my purpose in doing so is to move to disagree to the Senate amendment and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 11019, an act to reduce the tariff on wool and manufactures of wool.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Would it then require consideration in the Committee of the Whole or not? I am not sure.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman that I think it will, and I would like to ask unanimous consent, if there is any consideration, that we may consider it in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Therefore I ask unanimous consent to take the bill from the Speaker's table and that it may be so considered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent to take the bill H. R. 11019 from the Speaker's table and consider it in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 11019. An act to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to disagree to the Senate amendment to H. R. 11019 and ask for a conference. I do not desire to go into a discussion of the question at this time.

Mr. MANN. Would not the Senate amendment have to be read?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Unless the gentleman from Illinois desires the amendment to be read as printed, I will ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of it. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the Senate amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether anybody on our side desires time or not.

Mr. HILL. I would like about two minutes, perhaps five.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand, under the rules of the House, that when we consider a bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole it is under the five-minute rule, and the gentleman can be recognized for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] is recognized for five minutes, and in the meantime the House will be in order.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, this is the first time that I have seen this amendment. I take it that it does not vary much from the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin originally, which was voted down in the Senate. I understand it differs from that something like 5 per cent.

It is another illustration of the manner in which tariff bills are now being made, the ball being thrown by some Member and the legislative body hitting it if it can, making a home run if possible in one case, and going out at the bat in another case—without judgment, without reason, without intelligence, and without knowledge.

Now, so far as the original Underwood woolen bill is concerned, I think the woolen industry of the United States would just as soon have one bill as the other; just exactly. They are equally destructive. It is only a question whether the industry shall be killed by a bullet or stabbed to death. That is all there is to it. The Wilson bill gave free wool and 50 per cent duty on woolen cloth such as is used for men's and women's dress goods. That is the largest item of importation. The Underwood bill gives a duty of 20 per cent on wool and 40 per cent on cloth, leaving a net duty of 27 per cent on manufactured woolen fabrics. That is 23 per cent ad valorem less than the Wilson bill, which closed most of the factories in the United States. My understanding of the La Follette bill, which is now offered as an amendment, is that it is substantially the same in its ultimate effect. I figured it up the other day in another place when it was being acted upon, and found that, instead of 23 per cent less than the Wilson bill, it was 17¾ per cent less than the Wilson bill, so that you see either bill is absolutely destructive to the woolen industry.

I suppose one of these propositions is to be passed by Congress, and I suppose the cotton bill, which is equally destructive to the cotton industry, will be passed also. I am very glad to see the Members from the South taking a little of their own medicine, and I hope that all this talk which is going on now around the Capitol to the effect that it is not the intention of the Democratic Party to force to an ultimate conclusion the cotton bill may, for its own credit, be mere rumors, because I can conceive of no greater political advantage that could come to the Republican Party than to have the free-list bill passed and to have the wool bill passed, but to have the cotton bill held up. And if that is done, gentlemen, if that is done, you will not be here after the next election. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It must all go together, and, as I say, there being practically no difference between the La Follette bill and the Underwood bill, so far as the woolen industry is concerned, I rise simply to call attention to the fact that both are destructive to the woolen industry of the United States——

Mr. KITCHIN. And to the Republican Party.

Mr. HILL. We will take our chances on that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman pardon me just one word? I want to add my profound conviction that the revision of some of the rates of the cotton schedule, notwithstanding all the articles from muckraking magazines in the past two years, is as desirable as the revision of the rates in the woolen schedule.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Connecticut speaks of rumors going about the Capitol. I do not believe that any man can justly say that the Representatives on this side of the House have hesitated for one moment to revise the schedules that affect their own people any more than they have hesitated in revising the schedules that affect other people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. HILL. I want to compliment here and now the chairman of the committee for his honesty of purpose and the straightforward way in which he has conducted his business since this session began. [Applause.] I believe that he honestly believes in a tariff for revenue only and is doing the best he can to carry it out, but he must admit that the rumors are going around the Capitol in regard to what is intended to be done concerning the cotton schedule.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thank the gentleman from Connecticut for the kindly words he has said in reference to myself. We can not answer rumors, but I can assure the gentleman that if any of these bills go to the President of the United States, and he signs them, that we will finish the work at this session of Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If the President of the United States refuses to let us legislate, then we will prepare our additional bills during the summer vacation and present them at an early date in the winter session of Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, as to the cotton bill, we intend to push that bill so far as we are concerned as vigorously as we intend to push the woolen bill. We are going to vote on it as soon as we can this week. As to whether it will pass the Senate before the adjournment of Congress will depend on the action of a Republican Senate and the action of a Republican President and not upon our action on this side of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. MANN. We are all interested in knowing somebody's estimate as to how long we shall stay here, and the estimate of the gentleman from Alabama is certainly more valuable than the estimate of anybody else. The gentleman gives us information in reference to the continuation of the session if the President does not veto a bill, and an early adjournment if he does. What I want to ascertain from the gentleman is an estimate as to the continuation of the session if the bills do not get to the President. Are the working lines now between the gentlemen on that side of the aisle and their fellow Democrats at the other end of the Capitol, and certain other gentlemen, in such a condition that this bill is likely to get to the President?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not answer the gentleman's question at this time. As to the working lines, I will say to the gentleman that that has not been as yet perfected. [Laughter.] But I have hopes that it will be, and that we can present the bill to the President.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman a moment ago talked as though it was certain that the bill would go to the President, and the natural inference from that is that the gentleman is prepared to yield to the working lines at the other end of the Capitol in order that the bill may go to the President. We are all interested in knowing whether it is the House that has something to say about tariff legislation, or whether we act pro forma in order that the Senate may actually pass a tariff bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We found that out in the last Congress. [Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to my friend that I will take pleasure in answering his question when the conference report on the bill comes back to the House. As to what my friend from Connecticut said about these being drastic bills, I want to say, in the first place, that my friend is entirely mistaken about the incidental protection under the original bill that passed the House being only 27 per cent.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Alabama be extended five minutes? Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the incidental protection that grows out of this wool bill to the woolen manufacturer certainly, in my judgment, amounts to 30 per cent, and in my judgment there is no question but that with that amount of incidental protection to the woolen industry it should make it a thriving and successful business in this country.

As I stated the other day in reference to the cotton bill, I believe that that bill, although there is a greater reduction in rate than in the woolen bill, I believe it is the most conservative bill so far as its effect on the industry will be, because, as I said the other day, our estimate of increased importations is only $10,700,000, less than one-half of 1 per cent of the amount of cotton goods consumed in this country, and one-half of 1 per cent increased importation could not possibly injure the great cotton industry in this country.

But if we are mistaken in our estimate of the importation, and it is twice as much as we estimate, then the increased importation and increased competition will only amount to 1 per cent more by reason of the passage of this bill; and when we have got a great cotton industry that is exporting its goods to the Orient and which increased its exportations last year, I say it is utter folly for any man to claim that a bill that only increases the importation less than one-half of 1 per cent is a serious menace to any business industry in the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I would like the privilege of five minutes more in which to reply to the gentleman from Alabama. His time was extended for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] says that the incidental protection under the Underwood woolen bill is 30 per cent. There is no incidental protection on any rate of duty less than the difference in the cost of production, because such competition is unequal and unfair, and if it was 5 per cent less than the difference in the cost of production the revenue tariff would not carry that incidental protection, because the industry would be impossible. But the gentleman makes this serious mistake when he says there is 30 per cent protection under his bill, for he is only counting withdrawing from the rate of duty on the fabric the compensatory rate on the wool, whereas he makes no provision whatever for the duty which the manufacturer has to pay on all the other materials aside from wool that enter into the cost of the fabric. Now, Canada tried it at 27½ per cent preferential tariff with Great Britain and absolutely failed, as we failed under the Wilson bill. Canada had to raise her duty from 27½ per cent to 30 per cent, with free wool, with a very much lower duty on everything entering into the production of wool and fabrics, and to-day the industry in Canada is practically nil, for I am informed by those who know that at least half of the woolen mills of Canada are idle, even under a 30 per cent preferential duty with Great Britain and very much lower duties on everything else that enters into the fabric.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Connecticut if a large number of woolen mills in this country to-day under a 90 per cent tariff are not idle?

Mr. HILL. They are, and cotton mills, too; and they will continue to be idle just so long as the shadow of a Democratic tariff for revenue only hangs over them. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, in justification of my statement in regard to rumors concerning the cotton industry I submit for printing in the RECORD an editorial from the Washington Post of this morning upon the South's influence in Congress and ask that it be printed in the RECORD. I will not ask to have it read at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The editorial is as follows:

SOUTH'S INFLUENCE IN CONGRESS.

The attitude of the delegations from the cotton States on the tariff question is challenged by the Manufacturers' Record, which has superior facilities for sounding the business sentiment of that section. According to the Record, the South has grown away from its politicians, and they no longer respond to the spirit of the times. The South has changed from a wholly agricultural community to one whose factories have a productive capacity greater than the combined output of the farms and mines, but some of the politicians have not changed with it. They cling to the South of tradition, and while they are essentially honest the attitude of some of them in tariff legislation and discussion gives evidence that they must arouse themselves and learn if they would be of value to their section.

This severe arraignment of the statesmen of the South by a usually well-informed and conservative southern publication is impressive, but really it is not altogether deserved. The work of the extra session in the House, if fairly indicative of the statesmanlike qualities of these men, does not show that they are proceeding regardless of the interests of their section. Search the legislative record in vain for a single instance where the South has not been excepted from the ruinous workings of cut tariff rates. Scan the farmers' free-list bill, if you will, for one among the hundred articles of manufacture affected that is made to any extent in the South. Just how the southerners hypnotized their party colleagues from the North into voting for that monumental piece of sectional discrimination has never been explained. The wool revision hits Texas growers; but can not the South make a small sacrifice, seeing that the blow falls elsewhere with hundredfold force?

Now comes the cotton schedule, which on its face has the aspect of a square deal at last. But really how much does the coarse cotton-goods business of the South suffer in comparison with the handicap the bill puts on the North? Is it not worth while to hand New England a lemon of such acidity, even though it does do some hurt to northern capital doing business in the South?

And doubtless the remaining schedules will be taken care of with the same religious fidelity to detail that has marked the policy of revision up to date. The Record, we apprehend, has taken its cue from the public utterances of the men it pillories, whereas a truer appreciation of their services might have been gained by a study of their work in the privacy of the Committee on Ways and Means and the caucus room.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to ask him if all of the Democrats in the United States were dead whether all of these mills that are now standing idle would at once start up? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I yielded to answer reasonable questions. I will state that I think as it goes on there will be less and less Democrats living, but I expect there will always be some—just such as the gentleman who asks the question.

Mr. BARNHART. It does not look that way now.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, the last consular report from Barcelona sets forth an extraordinary depression in the cotton manufacturing business in that city. Is the Democratic Party responsible for that?

Mr. HILL. I have not read that report yet; but I shall read it, and be prepared to answer the question when I have.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, to disagree to the Senate amendment and ask for a conference.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The Chair announced the following conferees:

Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. RANDELL of Texas, Mr. HARRISON of New York, Mr. PAYNE, and Mr. DALZELL.

CAMPAIGN PUBLICITY BILL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 2958) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected."

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri if he will state his purpose in asking this disagreement? I will ask him first if he will agree to couple with his motion this: That in the adjustment of the differences between the two Houses on the said bill the House conferees shall yield to the Senate conferees so far as to agree that the following three propositions shall be retained in the bill:

1. That there shall be the same publicity of contributions and expenditures concerning primary elections and indorsements at general elections as in the case of general elections.

2. That the same publicity shall be required of contributions and disbursements for the nomination, indorsement, or election of Senators as in the case of Representatives in Congress.

3. That there shall be a limitation upon the amount which may be expended to secure the nomination, indorsement, or election as Senator or Representative in Congress.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], I will say to him frankly I will not couple the motion he has just read with the motion I have made to disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference. I do not believe that the conferees ought to be instructed by the House, in the first instance, because I fear an instruction would have a tendency to destroy a free conference between the two bodies and might be objectionable to the Senate. Let me say to the gentleman, however, that he may rest in perfect contentment. If the motion which I have made prevails, I think I am warranted in saying the gentleman will be one of the conferees. I will never yield one iota from every suggestion contained in the paper which you have just read sooner than you do, and if you yield, then I assure you I will still be found fighting for those principles, every one of them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman asks the purpose of my motion. I want to say to the House very briefly and frankly that I regard the amendments added to this bill by the Senate as very valuable additions to it. I have, however, after carefully studying the amendments, discovered what I think are obvious errors and obvious mistakes, matters that I believe ought to be reformed and perfected during this session of Congress in order that the bill, when it is enacted, may be such that no one who advocates the principle of publicity will be ashamed to go to his constituents and confess that he helped make it. My only purpose is to perfect the bill. I disclaim any purpose whatever to detract in the least from it. I do not want to destroy it, but I want to inject into it life, vigor, and efficiency, and nothing more, and I have every reason to believe that with the gentleman's able assistance as a conferee we will have no trouble whatever in reporting such a bill to this House that every Member who favors publicity will readily agree to the conference report, which, I assure the House, will retain the primary feature. That is one of my hobbies, I will say to the gentleman. I think this answers the gentleman's question.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, if I may have a few minutes, four or five minutes?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, the last Democratic convention adopted as part of its platform a plank demanding greater publicity for election expenses. A bill was brought in here in this Democratic House which improved very little, if any, the bill passed by the Republican Party at the last session of Congress. It did have in it a provision requiring the publicity of expenses before the election. My friend from Missouri says that his hobby is requiring publicity of primary election expenses, but it is to be observed that he voted against his hobby when such a proposition was offered upon the floor as an original amendment to this bill. The Senate has put in certain amendments which embody that feature and the others to which I have already called attention, and which we on this side think are very important features. Now, we did not know just what we were going to face this morning. A week ago the gentleman from Missouri informed us while the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] was speaking that if he lived until to-morrow he would have an opportunity to vote to concur in the Senate amendments, but last night our Democratic friends held a secret caucus upon this subject. I find in the Washington Herald of this morning this statement:

> More than 150 Democrats attended the caucus last night until 12.30 a. m. in the Hall of the House of Representatives, which was called to decide upon the policy of the majority party of the body with reference to the Senate amendments to the campaign publicity bill.
> Right off the bat the caucus adopted a stringent resolution forbidding any Member to reveal anything that might happen during the continuance of the caucus, and threatening the instant discharge of any employee discovered giving out information on the subject.

[Laughter on the Republican side.]

In other words, they were opposed to publicity of their own actions on the publicity bill. [Applause on the Republican side.] Therefore I say we did not know what we might be up against this morning. Now, I am free to confess that the Senate amendments—and I would rather see them adopted in toto than see them fail—do need some improvement, some smoothing out. For instance, there is a provision in one of them that no candidate shall expend in the aggregate more than 10 cents for each voter in his district.

Now, a voter is a man who votes. Differently construed he might be a man who is entitled to vote, but no man on earth can tell before election who is going to vote, how many are going to vote, or how many are entitled to vote. Therefore that provision in the bill as it now stands is inoperative. Nobody could be convicted for a violation of that provision. If you took it in the State of Mississippi, say, in the first three districts, the votes at the last congressional election were so few they have failed to record them at all in the Congressional Directory, I take it, therefore, that candidates in those districts could not spend anything. In the sixth district there were cast 4,070 votes. A man could spend $407 there. I notice that my friend from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] has left that entirely out of his proposed amendment, which he printed in the RECORD the other day. I hoped the gentleman from Missouri would consent to instructions to conferees such as I suggested. I do not think such instructions would prevent a full and free conference, because they do not ask that the Senate conferees yield to the House conferees in any particular, but merely that the House accept.

But I have entire confidence in the gentleman from Missouri and in his statement. If he and I are conferees, as he suggests, and he votes in harmony with my suggestions, as he says he will, we shall finally have a pretty good bill. I take it that he will be the chairman of the conferees of the House; at least, the first member on the conference. I am willing to accept his statement. As some of the Senate amendments were made on the floor of the Senate, some of them without previous consideration, they can be improved, and therefore I am entirely content, Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned, that the motion of the gentleman from Missouri shall prevail.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, permit me just one moment more to make an additional statement. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] read from some newspaper an article concerning the caucus of the Democrats last night. In some respects, I take it, although I could not hear the reading very well, the article recites facts and in some respects it does not recite facts.

Mr. MANN. Tell us what the facts are.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Come over on this side and get acquainted. I will say, Mr. Chairman, there was no action taken in caucus that binds anybody to vote for this measure or against it when it comes back from conference—none whatever. When it comes back it is going to be so harmonious and so perfectly in accord with public sentiment that I think everybody, without caucus action, will be for it. I hope so, at least.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], to disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees:

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri, Mr. CONRY, and Mr. OLMSTED.

THE COTTON SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12812, a bill to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12812, with Mr. CULLOP in the chair.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I had promised to yield the first hour to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] this morning, but he has yielded half of his time to his colleague [Mr. WILDER]. Therefore, I yield 30 minutes to the latter.

Mr. WILDER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to acknowledge my indebtedness to the distinguished statesman from Massachusetts, my friend and colleague [Mr. MCCALL], for the privilege of speaking first this morning. I trust what I have to say may not be entirely unworthy of the favor.

I shall speak upon this bill from the standpoint of the business man or from the standpoint of its practical workings. I am quite aware that laws must be made by lawyers. No less true is it that business must be transacted by business men. About one-half of my life I have given to the rank and file; a large portion of the other half I have given to manufacturing, incidentally knowing something about the law. I have found, however, by experience that the lawyer knows about as much concerning the practical workings of the business man as the business man knows about the intricacies of the law. Each has a general knowledge of the other, but the science of business is an exact science, while the workings of law are not exact.

This we understand well by the various important decisions that are rendered from time to time. As to the last two decisions from the United States Supreme Court, none knew what they were to be, whereas when we come to the affairs of business, it is an exact science. The business that is legitimate, that is well managed, will succeed. The business that is not well managed will fail.

And so as to the tariff. I wish to speak upon it from the standpoint of the business with which it has to do. Certainly it is the largest problem connected with our business affairs. We well know the line of business activity from the man who handles his own farm and raises his own crops from which he takes his living, then to the transactions that he has with his neighbor and the market and next to his town, and next his State; then with his nation, each of which is larger and more complex than before. Still, when we come to the question of our business activities with the world, we are in the realm of the largest business transactions that exist.

The tariff, to my mind, seems something like a tree, with one common root and many branches. Perhaps all of our national activities would center in this same common root. The tariff divides itself, as we hear it spoken of very many times, into five different lines of activities—free trade, tariff for revenue, protection, regulation, and reciprocity. They are all related, and when we come to organize a tariff on the basis of any one of them, we overlook others just as important and perhaps more so than the one we consider. For instance, when we come to advance the idea of tariff along the lines of revenue only, we leave out other more important features than the element of revenue. Free trade, surely from a Democratic standpoint, is nothing. I say "nothing" because if we had no laws whatever, that would be free trade. We need no law to trade freely. Then we come to a tariff for revenue only. A tariff for revenue only is wholly mercenary when considered alone, and it may be cruel. For instance, 45 per cent tariff on women and children's clothing, provided in the Underwood wool bill when considered alone, is cruel, but when it has involved with it the question whether or not it insures additional work for those very people, you have brought in another element which may rescue it from its discreditable position as a tariff for revenue only. One can not be used wisely alone. They all ought to be operated together. And when we come to revise the cotton schedule for revenue purposes, we leave out matters of more importance for those of less importance; we leave out those more honorable for those of less credit, for certainly to live alone for money, as an individual, is not the highest ideal of life. Most certainly such can not be the fact with a country so great as ours.

I wish, then, to go a little further than I went in a previous speech made in this House on the question of labor and its relation to the tariff. I said then that the goods that we used from abroad or imported, or the question of tariff regulation, was from 50 to 75 per cent labor. I wish to increase that ratio to from 75 to 90 per cent labor. I will try and make that clear if I have time. The reason I say this is a question of labor is for the same reason that Abraham Lincoln advanced when he was speaking about one of the great questions of the day in his time, that "the evil so far transcends the good that I shall speak of it only as an evil."

So I say that in our matters of tariff and our matters of manufacture the question of labor so far exceeds all other things that I am constrained to say that it is almost wholly a question of labor. It is more than 75 per cent a question of labor, and I wish to address myself to the subject from that standpoint.

I wish, then, to state that the vital test of a correctly regulated tariff, from the standpoint of our business interests, as a whole, is the question of the balance of trade. I make the statement that the times of the greatest depression in this country have been the times when the balance of trade stood most largely against us for a considerable period and that the times of the greatest prosperity in this country were those times when the balance of trade was most largely in our favor for a considerable period.

It is exactly the same as in our individual affairs. If my outgoes are greater than my incomes, it is not long before I am in bad shape financially. If, on the other hand, my income is greater than my outgo, I am constantly improving financially. If we sell abroad more than we buy from abroad, we are increasing our foreign balance and our prosperity; and it makes no difference how much we may argue, or how far we go hither or yon, we can not get away from this proposition. It starts with our individual affairs and goes through every business avenue of life, and it assuredly does not cease in our national affairs. The real or practical test is the size of the imports. For every million dollars worth of goods we buy from abroad, that we can make here, we put out of employment more than $750,000 worth of labor in this country. This may be worked out from any standpoint from which you may approach it, and the net result must be the same.

Many times the question is overlooked of the great relation that our tariff affairs have to the question of finance. Here comes up a very important matter that I do not often see mentioned, and that is the relation of our tariff affairs to panics. Many people do not appear to observe a material difference between the panic of 1907 and the panic of 1892–3. The panic of 1892–3 was a chronic panic, the panic of 1907 was an acute panic. One came about when there were normal adequate cumulative reasons for it. The panic of 1907 came about when there was no normal or cumulative reason for it. What was the difference? In 1892–3 and previous and succeeding we were buying goods largely from abroad and our mills at home were shut down or abnormally so. Our debts were growing largely abroad, and our income from abroad was slight, until the trade balance was against us, and consequently the financial balance was against us, and the foundation was laid for those distressing times which I know something about, from 1892 to 1897. That was a chronic panic followed as always by a depression brought about by the balance of trade running largely against us, or in other words by our imports being large and our exports being small; by our buying more abroad than we sold abroad.

The causes of this depression are not far to find. They have been analyzed so many times in this House that it is not necessary for me to analyze them again. In the cotton schedule before us, however, the average tariff levied is substantially less than it was in the law that made those awful times possible or induced such a disastrous culmination.

In the fall of 1907 the panic we had was acute. There was no normal, adequate, or cumulative reason for it. A combination of sharp, quick circumstances brought about a state of affairs acute and severe at the time, yet from which we quickly recovered, because the foundation elements were not such as would make a long depression inevitable. Those elements were the long-continued large balance of trade in our favor; that is, our large exports and our comparatively smaller imports. We gain or lose gold or credits from abroad exactly in propotion to our trade balances, and it does not follow that because this country is large it can not be harmed, nor does it follow because it can not be harmed in a moment that it can not be harmed at all. Of course, as we grow larger we may take in more millions of foreign goods and not notice it to any large extent, as we might when we were smaller.

I suppose as the country grows large and wealthy to that extent we may take in foreign goods; but still the law stands, that every million dollars' worth of foreign goods imported throws out $750,000 worth of American labor. We can not get away from that proposition. We may not be able to find at first the people who are out of work, because it does not put out of work specific individuals. But it does, just the same, put out of work that amount of labor—not necessarily all in one factory, but distributed all along the line. Our affairs are becoming so stupendous and so inextricably interwoven that it is difficult to state just where the ultimate comes, but that it comes is something that must be admitted. The mere statement of the fact makes it apparent that there can be no wage scale for us in goods coming into this country from abroad. Any wage scale, however poor, is better than no wage scale at all.

Many times it is stated that the free-trade bills, or those bills lowering duties, like the cotton schedule and the wool schedule and others, are like or similar to the trade relations we have had, like reciprocity with Cuba and like free trade with the Philippines or some other bills of that sort. Is there no difference between our trade relations that we are near making with Canada, with 8,000,000 people, the nearest like ourselves of any people on the face of the earth, and such an arrangement as the free-list bill that deals with the peoples of all the earth with its 1,000,000,000 inhabitants? Is there no difference in the exchange of some or even all supplies with Canada on an even basis and the proposition to give up our markets regardless to the pauper labor of the earth? They can not be compared. I get out of patience sometimes at these calamity howlers about the harm that will come from reciprocity with Canada and Cuba and yet are in favor of the farmers' free-list bill that gives our markets to all the world when they do not give us anything in exchange, whereas reciprocity is an exchanging of products, like reciprocity with Canada, in which she gives us some of her products and we give her some of ours in return on some fair basis. If Canada was commercially annexed to our country, is there anyone who thinks that that would materially harm us—8,000,000 people like our own, merely adding another State like New York or Pennsylvania? It might be glorious, but scarcely calamitous. It is wholly unlike the question relating to other bills, one of which we are considering at the present time. Hundreds and thousands of people are molested by one and not harmed by the other.

I again refer to those beautiful times between 1892 and 1897, the only time when we have had a Democratic tariff law since I remember, for I have heard it stated in this House several times that President Taft remarked that Schedule K of the Payne tariff bill is indefensible. Quite likely that is true, but where was it ever written that he stated that the Underwood bill was defensible? Where has he ever stated that the Underwood revision of the cotton schedule now before us was defensible? Give him a chance at them and see what he will say about them. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Again, when you are quoting Presidents, why not quote your own President? What did he say about the Wilson-Gorman bill? He did not take out one schedule that he thought was indefensible. Did not he say that the bill was a piece of party perfidy and dishonor? Why not quote this for a change? But the late President Cleveland, you must remember, was half Republican; that is why he was elected. [Laughter.] You say, Wherein? I say on the matter of finance one of the greatest and most important of all our affairs. I may have more to say on this subject when it comes up in the winter. Was not he squarely on the Republican platform on finance? I say that no man can ever be elected President of this great Republic who is an out and out Democrat; and, gentlemen, if you want to elect a President a year from next fall you must be sure and take one that is partly Republican. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

That celebrated Wilson law of 1893 to 1897, we are informed by competent authority, carried an average tariff of 44 per cent ad valorem on the cotton schedule. The Payne law, which is now in vogue, we are informed carries an average of 48 per cent on the cotton schedule. The present bill that we have before us, we are informed by the same authority, carries an average of 27 per cent on the cotton schedule. By what token or rule was it ever established that in the Democratic experience we had from 1893 to 1897 under a 44 per cent average tariff on a cotton schedule that we can now live with an average of 27 per cent?

The Wilson bill is out-Wilsoned in this affair. It is also stated by the same source that the estimated imports under this proposed bill will be something like $11,000,000 more than under the present law. It has been stated this morning that this was a very small amount of the whole—that is, of our entire cotton commerce. Granted. Just the same, from the time we start, all along through the line of these manufactures not only the labor in the yarn and weaving mill, but the labor of building the factories, machinery, and the administration, and overhead charges, the selling expenses, and the railroad employees, and every other affair that enters into or is connected with the handling of the goods, all goes into the question of labor, it can be very easily established that at least $8,000,000 of labor is represented by $11,000,000 of imports. Now, it is thought to be a light thing, $11,000,000 increase in our imports, but it is admitted that such is the expectation, and if such is the realization it is easy to discover that about $8,000,000 of labor would be put out of work annually, allowing $500 each, then 16,000 people will be thrown out of work by these increased imports. This bill is wrongly labeled. This bill ought to be labeled a bill to throw 16,000 people out of work, because that is exactly what is is admitted that it will do. How can we escape from the proposition that where goods come in from abroad they carry with them no labor, and so all is lost.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. WILDER. Certainly.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman is figuring on labor at $500 a year.

Mr. WILDER. In the cotton mills, men, women, and some children.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Is it not a fact that the reports from the Department of Commerce and Labor give it at less than $5 a week as the average, and will that make $500 a year?

Mr. WILDER. I do not object in the least to my Democratic friend arguing for me. I wanted to be fair, and I put it at $500. If he wants to put it at $5 a week, then he must throw 32,000 people out of work. I like it if he does.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I want to get the right information, and if the gentleman wants to sustain a tariff and claim that it has succeeded and accomplished something while it is getting that kind of conditions for labor, he is welcome to the credit for doing it.

Mr. WILDER. I would only make one point in reply to that. The labor even then is better than no labor at all, as they had from 1893 to 1897, with Gen. Coxey and his army and soup houses galore. Does the gentleman want some more of that? This bill looks like an effort in that direction.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WILDER. Certainly.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does the gentleman think with 40 per cent of children under the age of 16 at work, where labor is crushing the lives out of the children at a tender age, and also out of women, that that is a condition that is acceptable in preference to hardly anything?

Mr. WILDER. I am not arguing for that. I am not in favor of women and children operating in our factories. I would like to see them all up to this $500 basis, to which the gentleman from Illinois appears to object. I am certainly making this proposition fair for his side.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I was just asking for the facts. I wanted to know whether my information is correct or not.

Mr. WILDER. I will not raise the question of whether or not it is. I shall contend, however, that even if true in some cases and under some circumstances, that a small wage is better than no wage and Government soup.

Mr. BUCHANAN. My efforts have always been for high wages, and if I can do anything to get them, I will be glad to do it.

Mr. WILDER. Then, the gentleman will have to vote against this bill. Mr. Chairman, I wish to follow a little further the question of cheap wages raised by the gentleman from Illinois. I stated before that I had spent nearly half of my life in manufacturing. No tariff is necessary, let me say in the first place, to protect anything in any of the factories with which I am connected. We are a peculiar set of American ducks out our way, and we believe very strictly in Americanism. We welcome all of these people who come to us from the other side, a million of them a year, and are willing to do all we can to help them be Americans, in the real sense, whether born here or adopted here; but when it comes to a question of relative wages, these affairs adjust themselves, and when we come to a thoroughly expert American proposition, whether it be in manufacturing or anything else, the world can not compete with us.

When many of these cheap wage people come over from Europe, Asia, and Africa, they are not in any sense Americans, and those who don't want to be, or don't try to be, as with the Chinese, we don't want them here, for this is America, the "land of the free and the home of the brave." Many insist on their Old World methods and living and don't get into the spirit at all, or only in a small way. We believe in "American wages for American workmen," and would frame our tariff bills accordingly. Witness the splendid prosperity of the last 10 years. The world never knew the like of it regardless of all its human shortcomings. But it takes time to become a true American. It is not easy perhaps to come to Congress through the bridge-building-blacksmith-steeple-jack route, especially when you have to escape from perilous positions via the hand-over-hand cable route à la the Apostle Paul from the Damascus wall, but like Booker Washington's remark about the negro, we are coming up, some head first, some heels first, some end over end, but we are coming up.

And there are many similar experiences in this country, also many lines of manufacture so developed that the old country simply can not compete. It has been stated, however, and misused in my estimation to some extent in the shoe industry where one party stated that the tariff was not material with his particular business and some have tried to use it as meaning that it was not material in the shoe business generally. Nothing of the sort. The facts are this party makes a specialty by which he has built up a trade along special lines and people call for that thing and want nothing else and the question of competition is not in it, but when you come to the cotton, or worsted, or woolen schedules the mills abroad are as well equipped as our mills here and the labor as skilled and perhaps more so. Those are old industries built up from time immemorial. Now, the real question after all is said and done is, Do we want American wages paid to American workmen? We may say they are miserable in some cases; that is, those paid near-Americans and far-Americans. We hope they will all become more Americanized later.

We are aware that the prices in many of these cases are too low, but wherein will it remedy matters to make them still lower; wherein will it help to buy the goods abroad and shut down the mills altogether? Will we pursue our course along those lines? Do those who are in favor of this bill and think that American wages are not high enough at the present time think matters will be benefited by taking labor away altogether and giving it to them on the other side of the river. It occurs to me that is rather an unfortunate method with which to accomplish anything good. I should think it was going down hill backward. Now I want to put up one point in regard to the awful profits which manufacturers make on their goods. I judge that some speakers are not entirely informed along these lines, and I want to make an illustration to show what is apparent on its face and ask if on the whole it looks like an enormous profit, and yet it is what often happens when you find these large profits from the big concerns or maybe trusts. Suppose the concern has a capital of $100,000, is in good credit, as any quantity of our large concerns are, and can borrow $100,000 more. They would not pay exceeding 5 per cent for that additional $100,000.

Mr. BOWMAN. They would now pay 6 per cent.

Mr. WILDER. An average of 5 per cent for a concern in good credit. I do not mean all over the country, but I mean where our large manufacturing industries are, but I do not wish even to be confined to 5 per cent. You can take 6 per cent, it makes no difference. So they have a working capital of $200,000, and with that working capital of $200,000 there are many mills in this country which do $1,000,000 worth of business. Now would any of you think that 5 per cent profit was too much after the labor and the materials are paid for, after the overhead is paid for, selling expenses paid for, salaries are paid for; would you think that 5 per cent was too large a net profit? I do not believe anyone here would for a moment suggest that they were not willing to pay a profit of 5 per cent on goods they purchase; but are you aware that under such circumstances the net profit of that concern would be $44,000 a year on $100,000 capital? These big concerns and trusts of which we speak at the present time are doing an enormous business, with a profit so small you can hardly find it specifically. I am going to give some little details of what the margin is and——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield 15 minutes additional time to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 15 minutes additional.

Mr. WILDER. I propose to show on some goods I have here made in the fourth Massachusetts district, which I know about, that I am sure you will not find any fault with the profits that are made on them, and at the same time I do not know how we can cut them out of it, because when we cut out much we cut out the whole. I do not think anyone questions the proposition which I stated in reference to $100,000 capital and $100,000 borrowed capital doing $1,000,000 worth of business and earning honorably and fairly $44,000. I do not say that all of the concerns in the country are doing that. But, if you apply this principle to the much-hated Standard Oil Co., and no one has any reason to hate them more than I, and yet, I suppose, even the devil is entitled to his due. And you come to figure up the business this concern does, I doubt if the profit will exceed 10 per cent, perhaps not more than 5. They are located in every hamlet, everywhere. They make a little rake-off here and there and everywhere, but the total amounts to $40,000,000 dividends. I am aware of it. I want it distinctly understood that I am not talking for that crowd, and yet the late Henry H. Rogers once made the statement that there never was a time when water could be hauled 100 miles and sold cheaper than oil is sold for to-day. Poland water, just pure spring water, comes from Poland, Me., and we pay 25 cents or more per quart, which would be a dollar or more a gallon, while kerosene sells for 10 cents a gallon.

I do not wish to defend these people, but it is generally admitted to be the best-managed concern that there is on earth to-day, and upon that fact depends much of the profit. They have been ripped up the back and the front for being a trust and have been dissolved by the United States Supreme Court. Now let us see what we have gained or if the price of their goods is any cheaper. These fellows know how to manage their affairs profitably under any circumstances. But here is another concern that makes a profit of only 7½ per cent on fabrics. If any of you object to that profit, hold up your hands. I am talking about these things because a reduction of 7½ per cent will wipe out all there is. A reduction of 10 per cent will ruin any quantity of industries in this country. When we talk of these things in a flippant fashion we do not know what we are talking about. We are talking theory and not fact.

I have here some gingham made by the big Parkhill mills, of Fitchburg, Mass., possibly some of them by the big Lancaster mills, of Clinton, Mass. I have also here two pieces of worsted. The same story in regard to both of them. This piece of worsted [exhibiting] is not exactly like the worsted which I have on, but those near by me can see that there is not much difference between them. It can be bought for $1.50 a yard. It takes 3½ yards to make a suit of clothes, making the total cost of enough for a suit $5.25. That piece of worsted [exhibiting] comes from the Sherriffs Worsted Mills, and the yarn was made by the Star Worsted Co., of Fitchburg, the mills which made the inaugural suit of President Taft. I do not say that the cloth for his inaugural suit did not cost more than $5.25, for that was a finely woven double cloth, but this piece of cloth here [exhibiting] costs $1.50 per yard. That is the wholesale price, and it is good enough for any gentleman, and the manufacturers are not responsible for the fact that the tailor charges you $40 or $50 for the suit, the price which they charge me. You are not going to attack the manufacturers and their workmen in my district and I not say a word, when, as a matter of fact, the manufacturer is not asking an exorbitant price for such a piece of goods.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILDER. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will not the gentleman explain if that had been an imported article what the tariff would have been upon it?

Mr. WILDER. I have not that exact information.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then will the gentleman answer this: The $5.25 for which that cloth was laid down to the man who made it up into the suit costing $40 or $50 included every possible tariff charge, did it not? I am assuming it is foreign made.

Mr. WILDER. I am not quite in sympathy with the tariff being a tax. But that piece of goods is made and sold in this country against foreign goods, tariff and all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is to say, these goods at $5.25 for 3½ yards had the benefit of the barrier levied against imported articles at the customhouse?

Mr. WILDER. Quite right.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Hence all the tariff is responsible for is to be found in that $5.25?

Mr. WILDER. Quite right. Let me follow that a little further, which will clinch that matter. That piece of worsted, I am informed by Mr. Sherriffs, can be purchased for one or one hundred suits. If anybody wants it they can have 3½ yards for $5.25. If they want to go along through other lines and pay more, well and good, but the manufacturer is not responsible for it, and yet the tariff protects the manufacturer and his men and the industry all along the line.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Assuming that the tariff is paid upon that $5.25 worth of cloth, and the tailor sells you the suit for $40, will you please explain wherein the tariff is responsible for the increase in the cost price between $5.25 and the $40?

Mr. WILDER. Well, I could if I had time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then there is no tariff exaction in any of that large increase in the price?

Mr. WILDER. No tariff on the cloth outside of the $5.25.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let me ask further: Is the increase given to labor?

Mr. WILDER. Certainly everything is given to labor. Let some one on the other side of the House show to the contrary if they can.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. WILDER. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Does not the gentleman's argument tend to indicate that the next remedy will be, and must be, to reduce the tariff on the final suit of clothes, the completed manufactured article? Must you not reduce that also?

Mr. WILDER. That is all domestic. The tariff does not touch it. How are you to get a "to-order" suit from abroad?

Mr. HARDY. But if your clothing—if your suits were put on the free list or the tax placed very low on them, that would bring down all these intermediate additions to the cost, would it not?

Mr. WILDER. Yes; but these intermediate additions are labor. I think the concern that made this suit of clothes is doing an honorable business under modern conditions, and I think if you would cut down the tariff on the completed goods it would harm the ready-made suit makers.

Mr. HARDY. Then you think that——
Mr. WILDER. The remedy is not to lower the tariff.
Mr. HARDY. What is it then?
Mr. WILDER. That is not the point I am making. It is not the tariff, excepting as the workmen get it through some route or other.
Mr. HARDY. The point I make is that if you reduce the tariff on a suit of clothes and the manufacturer's product and the tailor's product, all along the line, then the people would get some benefit of it.
Mr. CAMPBELL. If I may be allowed to answer that question I would say that we would probably be buying $8 suits of clothes all along the line.
Mr. HARDY. And of the same quality.
Mr. CAMPBELL. Not at all.
Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Illinois?
Mr. WILDER. Yes.
Mr. BUCHANAN. Would it not be better for these workingmen who work for $5 a week to be able to buy a suit of clothes for $8? They can not pay any more.
Mr. WILDER. Well, sir, I do not know of any men who are working for $5 a week. There are not any in my town, or in my vicinity. There is no use in mincing matters of that kind, and furthermore you can buy plenty of $8 ready-made suits now, and the man who wants "to order" suits takes them of choice, hence there is no hardship.
Mr. BUCHANAN. If the gentleman will look at the reports of the Department of Commerce and Labor he will find those figures there.
Mr. WILDER. I am talking and living in actual life to-day. I am not getting my ideas from printed reports.
Now, Mr. Chairman, I have better figures on the worsted business than on the cotton business, but it illustrates the workings of the tariff. Now notice that the mill that makes that piece of worsted, as I have stated, does not make the yarn. There is 89 cents of actual cost (purchase price) in the yarn in that piece of goods per yard. There is 33 cents of labor in that piece of goods, and there is 9 cents of overhead charges in it, and 8 cents of selling expenses, and 11 cents profit, which is, as you will see, less than 7½ per cent profit on that piece of goods which is worth $1.50 a yard. That is the regular price of that piece of goods, wholesale, to-day.
Now, let us not expect to find the solution of the difficulty in the manufacturer, for $5.25 for that piece of goods is not a high price. Now, how much can you lower the tariff—answer me this question, now—how much can you lower the tariff on that particular article and not at the same time put some one out of business? You can not lower it without selling that piece of goods for less than $1.50 a yard. How much can you take out of the profit of 7½ per cent. Does anybody wish to reduce that? There is 8 cents for selling, about 5 per cent. Does anybody want or expect a man to go on the road or elsewhere and sell goods for less than 5 per cent commission? Does any gentleman on that side of the House want to reduce the labor item of 33 cents? Can the overhead charge be reduced that covers the cost of the maintenance of the factory?
It is all well enough to say that we should be able to buy our goods abroad, overlooking entirely the loss of the whole labor in this country, in machinery and the factories and every other thing. Do you think it would make no difference if our goods were made on machines and in factories made abroad and so lose only the machines and factory building? Is not that a strange thought? And yet do we realize what this labor means? Labor means, on metal, from the time it starts from the mines along up through the transportation companies to the furnaces, to the mills, to the factories where it is made up; and what is one man's supply is another man's finished material. The same is true with respect to the farms. Why, over across the way, one gentleman—I think it was the distinguished Senator from Idaho, Mr. HEYBURN—gave a description recently of a ranch where the total expense of running the place for 10 years was $70,000, and the sales were $69,000; $15,000 of the sales, however, was to themselves for fodder, etc. And so we reduce the proposition to a $55,000 proposition, and $30,000 of it was for labor, while $15,000 of it was for interest money, as he apparently borrowed the most of his capital and did not own his whole farm. That made $15,000 more. That cuts it down to a margin of $10,0000 for his living and for every other affair for 10 years. A great deal of the living is labor. I say the whole thing is labor from beginning to end.
I said 89 cents was for yarn in this piece of cloth. Yes; but I go back to the yarn mill, and I have the figures here. I will not try to give them, as the time is getting so short.

On necessities that can be made in this country the tariff should be so low as to insure a sharp competition; on luxuries the highest compatible with a fair competition. Necessities that can not be made in this country should be free, and on luxuries that can not be made in this country there should be levied the highest collectible rates.
There is much to be said along these lines, and it all argues to this same end. How much labor is there in this yarn? Probably 25 per cent. And then the overhead charge is labor. And then for buildings, machines, and affairs of that sort. The salesmen represent labor. When you come to the question, "What is labor?" it is all labor, including the wool growing.
Even the large income of any man goes right back into labor, for, indeed, the stocks and bonds he buys are issued to pay for labor. When a millionaire builds his fine house it all goes into labor. Indeed, the closer you follow it the more nearly all our activities are sure to turn up as labor.
I remember a story which I read when I was quite young. I guess you have all heard of it. It is the story of a celebrated gentleman in a saddle, who rode from Winchester, 20 miles away; and he came up to the boys and saw them in confusion and defeat and rout and said, "Come on, boys; we will sleep in our own tents to-night."
How would you divide up the pay for what that crowd did? Would it be too much to give that distinguished general one-quarter or one-half of the glory? I use this as an illustration of what goes to make up labor. Are you going to say, because I have not sawed wood to any extent for 10, 15, 25, or 30 years, that I do not labor? I am the one man in our concern who does the most labor, for the longest hours, and bears the biggest burden. I am glad to bear them; I have learned how to bear them. That is what every man should aim for—to bear burdens; but when he comes to do that he has become something of an American, and he certainly is not going to work for $2.50 or $5 a week. He is going along up the line somewhere.
A great railroad has recently been looking for a president at a salary of $100,000 per annum. You say large? Do you think that a salary of $2,000 per annum large for a man who is competent to manage a business of $1,000,000—only one-fifth of 1 per cent—but the total business of that railroad is over $50,000,000 per annum and the salary less than one-fifth of 1 per cent. Do not you suppose that the difference between good and mediocre or bad management would amount to more than one-fifth of 1 per cent? Try it on your own affairs, however large or small, and see. So I say it is all labor, each man being paid the reasonable price that our civilization and progress in Americanism determines.
Now, there is not much politics in this speech, is there? I am just talking about the practical facts of manufacture. It is not my business when I am talking before this House to be a politician. I want to state frankly and clearly that I am a Republican because I believe in the policies, the principles, and the practices of the Republican party. The Republican party intends to stand for that which is right and good and best, and when you gentlemen on the other side of the aisle get anything that we deem to be good, we at once appropriate it. That has been shown in the past. You say we take your platforms. We do not. We simply take that which is good in them and which was probably put there by mistake. [Applause on the Republican side.]
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. PAYNE. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.
Mr. WILDER. This bill will admittedly lessen the revenue about $3,000,000 and increase the imports about $11,000,000. In other words, runs at "both spigot and bung" at the same time. The money runs out of the spigot (Treasury) by the lessening revenue and out of the bunghole by the extra money from the country generally to pay for the increased imports. Who ever saw such folly launched as a good business proposition? While it is claimed to be a tariff for revenue only, it admitedly raises some rates and allows others to remain already prohibitive. Hence no revenue whatever, and strange as it may seem, these low-grade cotton cloths, used so largely by the people whom the sponsors for this monstrosity claim to serve and expect it to be overlooked, that in addition to this this grade of goods are largely made by the South, from whence these patriotic gentlemen come. They say the country wants the tariff reduced, presumably regardless of consequences, and that they were ordered to do it last fall, but ask any manufacturer if he wants the tariff reduced on the goods he makes, and he will answer, in no uncertain way, no. Ask the workman if he wants the wages reduced on the specific goods that he makes, and he will cry, no. What, then, they expect that it will be reduced only on the goods that they buy; this is, of course, impossible, for what they buy some one else sells. Where is the trouble, then?

Simply the people have been deceived, and if the framers of this cotton schedule do not know it they might recall that they have not had much experience in tariff making, and that it is no hop, skip, and jump affair when the question might suggest itself to them, if they were sure that they knew enough to make a good bill without more care. In short, would it not be the part of wisdom to await the report of the tariff board, and even then take more time.

I can not end what I have to say better than by quoting that much-loved man of whom we have all heard so many times, Abraham Lincoln. Whatever he says must be good. So I will close with a favorite quotation from him:

I am not bound to win, but I am bound to stand true. I am not bound to succeed, but I must live up to the light I have. I must stand with anyone who stands right, stand with him so long as he stands right, and when he goes wrong, part.

I am not in favor of taking from American labor anything good that it now has or reducing its price. I am in favor of maintaining and increasing it. I am not in favor of the conditions spoken of by the gentleman from Illinois, and do not know where men are working at that price. I would not tolerate them in any factory with which I was connected. If I could not do better than that I would get out of that business. Yet I am aware that there are certain kinds of business in our country where these near-Americans are working, but we hope they will come out of those conditions and be better and larger and bigger at some later time. I will certainly turn in and try to help them. Will you, gentlemen on the other side of the aisle? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL].

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, the schedule to which this bill relates is one of two of the most complicated schedules in the tariff. It is one upon which only an expert is qualified to speak, and an expert I do not claim in any sense to be. But there are certain obvious things about this schedule and about this bill which a novice may see, and some of these things I shall attempt to bring to your attention.

In the first place, the business of manufacturing cotton is a great national industry; it is not in any sense a sectional industry. There was a time when the manufacture of cotton was confined largely to the New England States, but it is now an important industry in, I think, 16 States of the Union; and in the States of the South, where in 1880 it had developed only to a very slight extent, it has since that time increased more than 1,000 per cent; and they to-day make into cotton manufactures more than 200,000 bales of cotton each year, more than all the New England States combined. That shows that however well adapted the soil of the South is to the raising of the cotton plant—and it has a practical monopoly in raising cotton in all the world—yet it is no more adapted to that than are the industry and genius of her people to the manufacture of that plant into cotton goods. There is a tendency for gain there which we have seen for 30 years, which is still continuing, and it is no idle dream to look two or three generations ahead and see made on the southern soil nearly all the cotton that is raised there; and, as I say, in the raising of cotton they have a practical monopoly.

So there was no necessity, Mr. Chairman, even if gentlemen wanted to be sectional, for them in revising the cotton manufacturing schedule to temper the bill so much to the present condition of the industry in the South, for they have not yet developed in the South the manufacture of the higher grades as they have in the North, but there is a constant improvement; and if the authors of this bill were considering merely the South and had looked to the future, they would not have written in the bill the sectional lines that I shall point out before I close.

This report, which has the appearance of a very learned document, says that the cotton-manufacturing duties cost the American people some $200,000,000 a year. That I think is a pure assumption; it is a pure guess; but it is interesting for another purpose to consider the reasoning which the committee adopted in reaching that conclusion. They say that the average ad valorem of the cotton schedule is 56 per cent, and then they assume that only one-half of that percentage is effective, and they generously figure that half at 25 per cent, and they say 25 per cent of the cotton duties are effective and the rest are surplusage. Now, that is an interesting admission, coming from the greatest aggregation of free-trade statesmen at present performing on the Continent of North America [laughter]—that you can not add the duty in fixing the price to a domestic consumer. For they very generously throw out 31 per cent of this duty which they say is not effective and should not be added to the price.

But follow them one step further and see what they do. Having decided that all above 25 per cent is surplusage and should not count, they say they are going to relieve the people from robbery and from extortion and from the greed that we have heard about on this floor. How? Why, they are going to leave the schedule at 27 per cent; they are going to leave the 25 per cent and then add 2 per cent more for the robbers to come and go on to be sure that they get it all. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

This estimate, as I said, of the cost of the schedule at two hundred millions is nothing more than a guess. I think that the same thing may be said of the estimate of the committee, that the duties under the proposed bill will stimulate importations only to the extent of $10,000,000 a year. I question very much whether that is true. I do not know whether that estimate is any nearer the truth than one I heard a few days ago by one of the greatest cotton manufacturers in the country, who said that the duty in this bill would stimulate importations to the amount of $200,000,000 a year.

I think both are guesses, but with millions of idle spindles in Europe, with only half of the labor cost which we have in this country, with the duties upon the Payne bill where you reduced them at a point where there are millions of importations into this country, it seems to me that if you cut those duties absolutely in two you will stimulate importations many, many times over $10,000,000 a year. I do not believe there is any escape from that conclusion.

But I said that this bill was drawn upon sectional lines. It is put forth here as a general revision of the cotton schedule. The first paragraph of the section relating to cloth fixes the duty upon the low-grade cotton cloth at 15 per cent. Let us see how that compares with the Payne bill. The Payne bill fixes the duty upon cotton cloth up to 7 cents a yard at 1 cent a yard. That is, upon cloth worth 7 cents a yard the Payne duty would be 14⅔ per cent. Under this bill it would be 15 per cent. As to the grades lower than 7 cents, let me show you how you would get an increase of duty by the difference between the operation of a specific and an ad valorem duty. Upon these lower grades of cotton, heavy in weight, often the value of the raw material is the great cost of production. Nearly two-thirds in some cases of the cost of goods, I understand, is represented by the cost of the cotton. At 12 cents a pound upon these lower grades you would get substantially the same rate as you do upon the Payne bill. But suppose cotton goes to 15 cents a pound, and the tendency is for a constant increase in the price of cotton; you will get an increase in the duty over the rate in the Payne bill. Then take the next step. The cotton goods that are valued at 9 cents a yard under the Payne bill, unbleached, carry a duty of 1¼ cents a yard.

Under this bill the duty is 15 per cent ad valorem, which will be 1.35 cents a yard, still an increase. Advance one step further and get to the goods that are bleached, dyed, painted, printed, and so forth, where up to 12 cents the Payne bill is 2 cents per yard, or 16⅔ per cent ad valorem. Your duty is 20 per cent, which is an increase of about 20 per cent over the Payne bill duty. Get to the upper grades of cotton, where the value of the raw material is a very slight element in the cost of manufacture, where, perhaps, it is not over 4 per cent of the cost of manufacture, where they have two and three and four hundred threads to the inch, and where the great cost is labor, goods that are manufactured for the wealthy people and that are luxuries, and you give those consumers relief to the extent of 50 per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCALL. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will challenge the gentleman to show from the returns of last year, published by the Treasury Department, where the ad valorem rate in the Payne bill on the same class of goods, the lower class of goods, is anywhere lower than the rate fixed in this bill.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman has been paying attention to what I have been saying, he will know that I have quoted from the Payne law, as it is contained in the gentleman's report, and from his bill, and if he will look over the instances that I have cited he will find no reason to doubt what I have said.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that the lowest rate in this bill is 20 per cent on the low class of goods, and I would like to have the gentleman point out any class of low goods—I do not mean to take one particular item—where it is in the Payne bill anything like as low as that.

Mr. McCALL. What I have said will be printed in the RECORD to-morrow morning, and I think if the gentleman will examine it he will find that I have stated the exact truth, and taken it from his bill and his version of the Payne bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would state to the gentleman that I am satisfied that in this low class of goods he will not find anywhere where the reduction in this bill is not very much greater than the same class of goods in the Payne bill.

Mr. McCALL. If the gentleman will read his own report——

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman pardon me just for a moment?

Mr. McCALL. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. I turned to this book incidentally—I have not studied the question, and refer to the 9 cents a yard with a duty at a cent and a quarter, and I find the ad valorem is 10.92 last year——

Mr. McCALL. Well, I cited the cost to the House.

Mr. HILL. Six and thirty-six one-hundredths in 1909 and 9.17 the year before that.

Mr. McCALL. I cited three distinct instances to the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I stated to the gentleman from Massachusetts I did not refer to particular items, but to the general class of goods proposed to be covered by the law. We must take the class together. I am not talking about a particular item.

Mr. HILL. This refers to bleached goods, value not over 9 cents per square yard, and not exceeding 50 threads to the square inch, and which, I understand the gentleman, is 15 per cent in his bill and 10 under the Payne bill.

Mr. McCALL. Painted and bleached is 20 per cent on the 12-cent grade. In the Payne bill it was 16⅔. That is, you have increased the duty on some of these cheap goods 20 per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman can take an item here and there where for some particular reason it may have been brought in at a very low rate, but I say the class of lower goods fixed in this bill is materially lower than the Payne bill and lower than the upper ones as fixed in that bill. The gentleman can not sustain his proposition.

Mr. McCALL. I am not imitating the method of reasoning that gentlemen on the other side have adopted in treating what is called the stepladder specifics, so as to show the great increase of duty in the Payne bill, and the great mass of speeches on the other side are built upon just such instances. I assert that there is no substantial decrease on those lower kinds of cotton goods and there are some very substantial increases, and I am willing to stand upon that statement. Now, I am going to follow that a step further. Here is a bill drawn avowedly, as the authors say, in the interest of the masses of the people, and they take the low-cost goods, the goods that are consumed by the poor people, by the working people of the country, and they either do not materially decrease the duties or they increase the duties, and they take these luxurious fabrics in which labor is the great cost, which are near silks, which are deemed luxuries and which are consumed by wealthy people, and to those people they give a reduction to the extent of nearly 50 per cent. That is, this bill is drawn in the interest of the wealthy class and is drawn in defiance of the interest of the great mass of the poor people of the country. Now, why is this done? If you will look over the statistics of manufactures you will find that the goods to which I have been referring are manufactured chiefly in the Southern States, and the goods to which the schedule applies which are made in the South have very little reduction made upon them, and some of them have increases made upon them. That is, your bill draws a class line and it draws a sectional line. Now, we know that a great many of these cotton goods that are being made in the northern mills to-day are very high-priced and that the chief cost in the production is the cost of labor. Suppose we cut down the duties—and there are now millions of importations of such goods under this schedule—suppose we cut down the duties, why, obviously, with duties at the importing point, the foreign goods will come in in greater volume, and the only way in which our manufacturers can meet them is to cut down the cost of production. They can not reduce the price of cotton. The price of cotton is not very material in the production of those goods, but, even if it were material, they can not reduce it, but their great item in the cost of production is the cost of labor, the wages of labor, and it is inevitable, if our mills desire to keep running under this drastic cut that you have here, that the wage cost of the goods should be reduced.

I am not able to see upon just what theory this bill is drawn. If you look at the importations you will find that in those paragraphs where there are now practically no importations, where we have no foreign competitor, where the duty is prohibitive, they keep the duties where they are or they increase them. Certainly they can not be upon a revenue basis. And upon the other goods, where we have free importations, they make a still further cut.

Now, gentlemen talk about the principle of tariff for revenue only. You would think from the way they argue about that sacred dogma that it was contained in the Constitution of the United States. But Congress has the power to levy taxes and duties and imposts without any limitation, and it can exercise its high sovereign prerogative and discretion in any way that it thinks would be for the benefit of the country. But gentlemen contend that they are to exercise this taxing power without reference to the consequences upon the condition of the country or upon production. Why, in that way you would impose upon a given industry a tax which might prevent it from growing. It might prevent it from reaching that stage where it would be a great revenue producer, where it would add to the wealth of the country and to the efficiency of the taxing power of the country. It is a very narrow view to take that in drawing a revenue bill you are to proceed with regard to revenue only and that you are not to consider in the exercise of your discretion its incidental and most far-reaching effects.

Now, there is the wool bill, which the House has just sent back to the Senate and upon which it has asked for a conference. Let me call your attention to the progress of this bill through the House. When it first appeared here there were a large number of gentlemen upon that side of the House in favor of the ancient Democratic doctrine of free wool.

A candidate of that party three times for the Presidency and its leader declared himself in favor of free wool; and, after a great effort, helped along and seconded by the Democratic caucus, they finally decided to impose a revenue duty of 20 per cent upon wool, a result much at variance with the recent practices and professions of the party and with the belief of its leaders. And but a little while ago we saw all the Democratic Members of another legislative body in this country voting unanimously in favor of the duty of 35 per cent upon raw wool, a percentage which in times when wool was high and when we specially would want to get it into the country at as low a rate as possible would give an equivalent specific rate equal to the rate in the present Payne law. And that is the bill that has been sent back to the House and which the House to-day has complaisantly asked for a conference upon. Now, I remember hearing read in this House on a somewhat parallel occasion, when the Wilson bill was returned here with some 640 amendments, a letter from the Democratic President of the United States denouncing that measure as one of "party perfidy and party dishonor," and yet, after the pretense of a struggle, I saw the Democratic House of Representatives accept every amendment proposed by the Senate. I do not know what you gentlemen propose to-day. I do not know how far the alliance has progressed, but I am wondering if you are going to imitate your predecessors in the Fifty-third Congress, when you will perhaps not even get a tariff bill, but when you will have the pleasure of surrendering your principles and of committing an act of party perfidy and party dishonor.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. McCALL. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. While the gentleman is trying to anticipate the future, could he tell us what the Republican President would be likely to do with the bill when it came up to him?

Mr. McCALL. I will give my guess at it. I do not pretend to know what the President will do. I see what the newspapers are saying, which is that he will veto the bill. And I am wondering if that should happen if the gentlemen on the other side will be seen to go down with their ship of tariff reform or whether they will be upon a protective bark. [Applause on the Republican side].

Now, this industry is one of the great industries in the United States. It is a great American industry, and I believe can be made a distinctive American industry. We have, as I said, a monopoly of the raising of the cotton plant, and I believe that, ultimately, under wise laws, we will approach a monopoly in the manufacture of cottons.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCALL. I will.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman left his statement as to the rate of duty under the Wilson bill. The Wilson law put wool on the free list, did it not?

Mr. McCALL. Yes. Even that measure of "party perfidy and party dishonor" had wool on the free list. They had some Democratic features left in their bill.

Mr. COOPER. As I heard the gentleman, it seemed he left it where we would understand that it was 20 per cent.

Mr. McCALL. No; I did not mean that. The Wilson bill provided for free wool.

Mr. COOPER. It made wool free, but put 70 per cent tax on rice. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. McCALL. The total production of our cotton manufacturers to-day is close to the billion mark. They employ more than half a million people, and the wages of that industry give sustenance and support probably to 2,000,000 people. It is a great industry, and it deserves fair treatment. It deserves fairer treatment than it is likely to get upon the bill based upon this voluminous report containing crude assumptions and mutually destructive theories and undigested statistics that make this great volume bulge from one end to the other with inaccuracies. [Applause on the Republican side.]

If we are to deal with this industry, let us deal with it intelligently. Let us at least pass a bill, in the passing of which we can maintain serious countenances. If we are going to lead it to the slaughter, let us carve it into a dish fit for the gods and not hew it into a carcass fit for the hounds. [Applause on the Republican side.] And for my part, I do not propose to join in a night assault which may be destructive of one of the fairest of American industries.

It has been well known, Mr. Chairman, that the Tariff Board is investigating this question. There could not be an abler tribunal for the consideration of an economic question than is the Tariff Board. It has at the head of it Prof. Emery, who was at the head of the department of economics in Yale University. It has one of the leading members of the faculty of the University of Virginia. It has men who are expert in economic lines. And they have been investigating this question, and have promised a report to this Congress by the 1st of December next.

Your own bill, by its terms, does not take effect until the 1st of January, and why should we not wait until we can avail ourselves of the studies of that board and have the evidence which they are gathering, so that it may help us in what we are about to do? I think this bill is emphatically a leap in the dark. It may be that some of these duties should be decreased. I should be willing to vote that they should be decreased, but I think that before I so vote I am justified in awaiting the evidence of this board, for the principle of which—that of a Tariff Commission—so many eminent gentlemen on that side of the House voted only last winter.

Now, I had in view to say a few words upon the general result of the Payne bill during its operation.

Mr. PAYNE. We will give you more time.

Mr. McCALL. I have heard gentlemen on the other side claim that the Payne bill increased duties. We have in this very report a statement that the duties in the cotton schedule were increased from 25 to 460 per cent, and yet in another place they say the average increase of duties was from 54 to 56 per cent. That is 2 per cent. They do not mention the fact that by reason of a decision of the courts separating a proviso from the paragraph which the authors of the Dingley bill intended to have it apply to and in connection with which it was enforced for four years that the duties on luxurious cotton fabrics were reduced from 60 per cent to 4 and 5 per cent. There was an increase in those instances in the Payne bill, and the justice of making them is shown in this very bill, because you increase those duties at least 500 per cent over what they were in the Dingley bill. And it would be a gross distortion of the idea of Democracy for anyone to stand for the theory that the low-priced goods should pay 15 or 20 or 25 per cent on coming into this country while the luxurious fabrics should come in for only 5 per cent.

I was going to say a word about the general operation of the Payne bill. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] has handed me a letter which he received from the Department of Commerce and Labor, responding to a request by him for a statement showing the average ad valorem rate of duties on imports during the fiscal year just ended. From that it appears that the free imports into the United States during the year ending on June 30 last were $777,000,000; that the dutiable imports were $749,000,000—that is, that more than half of all the goods coming into this country came in under the Payne bill free of all duty—and that the customs receipts were $313,000,000, showing an average ad valorem duty upon all goods of 20.54 per cent, which is lower than the rate under the Dingley law, lower than the rate under the Democratic Wilson law, and lower than that under the McKinley law.

If you will look at the figures showing the operation of the Wilson bill, of the Dingley bill, and of the McKinley bill during the full period when they were in force you will find that the Payne law shows a lower ad valorem upon dutiable goods than any of them. It shows a lower ad valorem upon all goods coming into the country than any of them, and especially for the year 1910, which was the last full year that I had when I made the comparison. It shows a reduction from the Dingley duties averaging 17 per cent upon dutiable goods. And yet gentlemen say that this was a revision upward.

And not merely did it reduce the duty upon dutiable goods from the Dingley bill 17 per cent, but it has put great items like hides upon the free list entirely, which do not appear at all in that calculation.

For the first time in the history of the country during the last year the total exports from this country to other countries exceeded $2,000,000,000. We had the greatest foreign trade that we have ever had.

Mr. Chairman, when we come to consider these simple facts, first that under the Payne bill we have the greatest exports that we ever had and for the first time more than $2,000,000,000; that we have the greatest foreign trade that we ever had; that we have a less average ad valorem on dutiable goods than under any of the last four great tariff bills; and that we have a less ad valorem upon all goods than under any of the last great tariff bills, including even the Democratic Wilson bill, it seems to me if these facts can be made known, the clamor, the prejudice, and the misinformation that have been scattered abroad about this bill will be dispelled, and that it will be seen to accomplish some of the great objects for which a revenue bill is established.

And then let me call your attention to one other matter. During the two years before the Payne bill took effect we had a deficit of about $80,000,000, or about $40,000,000 a year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. McCALL. We were not at liberty to throw away revenue. We had to address ourselves to the problem of providing money to meet the running expenses of the Government. What was the result? Although in the two years preceding the operation of this bill the average deficit was $40,000,000, in the first year in which this bill was in operation the surplus was $15,000,000 and in the second year it was $47,000,000. [Applause on the Republican side.] We had an average surplus in the two years of $30,000,000; and if gentlemen on the other side of the House want to study a way by which they may create a system for revenue only or a system that will benefit the country or that will extend its foreign trade or that will increase its domestic industry, I commend them to the study of the provisions of the Payne law. [Applause on the Republican side.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. BURLESON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to joint resolution (H. J. Res. 130) making appropriations of certain expenses of the House of Representatives, incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had disagreed to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 2, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. GAMBLE, and Mr. CULBERSON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE COTTON SCHEDULE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN].

Mr. AIKEN of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the Democratic Party, in control of the lower House, has undertaken revision downward of certain tariff schedules that are notoriously oppressive.

In so far as the Senate is concerned no revision would be possible but for the indignant cry of the people, who had repudiated the Payne-Aldrich monstrosity. Even a Republican President, whose signature made this act a law, admits that many of the schedules are indefensible, particularly the wool schedule.

Under the present high tariff rates, which have existed with few changes during a long period of unbroken Republican rule, monopolies and combines have sprung up a hundred times greater in number than during any like period of this country's history. So bold, so oppressive, so shamelessly corrupt and corrupting have been these creatures of Republican misrule that even the fostering mother, the Republican Party, would gladly repudiate the relationship were her hands not stained with part of the plunder. [Applause on the Democratic side.] She can not wipe out the campaign contributions exacted of these her wayward children. Prosecutions of the Standard Oil Trust, the Tobacco Trust, and others by the present administration are to be commended in so far as the executive officers are concerned, but as to the party the act reminds me of an old negro in my town who had made a good Sunday dinner on a chicken that his boy had stolen, and when the theft was brought home to him, thought it ample satisfaction that he whip the boy soundly. [Laughter.]

Whether or not I am entirely orthodox on the question of Government taxation, it is my belief that a well-regulated tariff next to an income tax is the most equitable method and is attended with less friction than any plan that can be devised for raising revenue. The complaint of the people is not with the tariff, but with tariff abuses. I can vote consistently for an income tax, a corporation tax, or an inheritance tax, in the conviction that many of those who are liable have robbed the people under Government sanction, and it is a maxim of law that the owners of stolen goods have the right to take them wherever found. If the Government can be brought to this view, with the purpose of evening up things, no harm is done.

We hear much of high tariff and high wages going hand in hand. To quote the words of a leading manufacturer in my own State, Mr. Lewis W. Parker, for whose ability and integrity I have the greatest respect, "the wages of cotton-mill employees are already low and below the basis of a majority of industries." Bulletin 57 of the Census Bureau, page 93, shows that 44,452 youths and men, 24,552 girls and women, and 3,743 children under 16 years of age employed in the manufacture of woolen goods receive a weekly average of $7.61. Employees of the steel mills of Pittsburg, Chicago, and Milwaukee, all strong, healthy men, receive $1.75 for 12 hours a day 7 days in the week—$12.25. In these averages are included the wages of skilled mechanics and head men. And let it ever be remembered that these are high-tariff prices. It would seem then that under the highest tariff rates operatives' wages are abnormally low. The workingman in highly protected Germany has somewhat the advantage in wages and hours over the workingman in highly protected France. The workingman in free-trade England has a shade the advantage over the workingman in highly protected Germany.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, so much has been said in Republican speeches here about the tremendous cost of labor that I should like to ask the gentleman if he has statistics with reference to the cost of labor in the South, in New England, and in England?

Mr. AIKEN of South Carolina. The average weekly wage paid in cotton mills in England is $6.37. The average weekly wage in New England is $7. The average weekly wage in the southern mills is $4.10.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. AIKEN of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. BOWMAN. I should like to ask if the gentleman has any information tending to show the difference in efficiency of the labor, and whether the price paid to the labor is not somewhat dependent upon efficiency?

Mr. AIKEN of South Carolina. My information and understanding is that the labor employed in southern mills is just as efficient and well disciplined as the labor in New England mills or in the mills of old England.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I should like to ask the gentleman if the average wage scale that he just spoke of applies exclusively to the cotton mills?

Mr. AIKEN of South Carolina. Yes. Admitting that high tariff and prosperity for many years have gone hand in hand, it has been a tariff paid by the masses and absorbed by a select few. One-tenth of the population of the United States owns more than four-fifths of its entire wealth.

Now, it is a fact that the American laborer is paid more per day than is the European laborer, but it is admitted that, as a whole, improved machinery, improved methods of business, and the greater skill of the American laborer give him nearly twice the earning capacity. Not the rate of wages, but the output, is the governing standard of measurement. And then, too, the price of labor is controlled in large measure by the supply. In the congested populations of Europe labor is more than ample, while here it is inadequate. I was impressed by a statement made in a recent speech by the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD], in which he spoke of a friend of his getting a contract recently for several million dollars' worth of locomotives in open competition with Germany and England. The contract was awarded in Japan. While there he was told by a master mechanic of the Imperial Railways shops that locomotives could be manufactured cheaper in Japan than in America, because, said he, "we only pay one-fifth the wages to our men that you pay yours." A comparison of their cost books on the same specifications showed that the labor cost on the Japanese locomotive was three and one-half times as great as that of the American locomotive.

Another interesting statement by this gentleman, who is himself a manufacturer, was to the effect that he had proposed to a manufacturer of certain staple articles in Birmingham, England, that he manufacture the same articles for him in America, lay them down for him at his shop, and allow the Birmingham man a profit of 10 per cent above the American charges and carriage.

American locomotives to the number of 720 may be found in Japan. Americans are selling yarn in China; they are selling electrical machinery in Calcutta, and they are selling shoes there at $3.85 that cost the home consumer $5; they are selling goods in every country in Europe, and are furnishing bridge material and railroad supplies even in darkest Africa. When American goods are being sold in every extensive market of the world, it is folly to speak of the foreign manufacturer invading the home market. Here are a few American-made articles advertised in one foreign journal, and being sold in open competition with Germany and England: Ironmongery, fine tools, bicycles, sporting goods, lamps, razors, firearms, carriage makers' supplies, sanitary goods, lighting systems, dry goods, men's furnishings, office devices, stationery, typewriters, filing cabinets, printers' supplies, paper, machine tools, boilers, lubricants, electrical material, valves, woodworking machinery, belting, shafting, pulleys, packing, furniture, kitchen ware, and hundreds of other articles from a protected market to the open markets of the world. And yet we are told that we can not compete in foreign markets.

Perhaps there was a time when the wage earner of America was dependent upon high tariffs for the higher price of his labor, but that was in the days of infant industries, long since passed.

Under conditions foisted on the public by Republican misrule the question of tariff revision must be approached with a twofold care. Rates must be sufficient to raise revenue adequate for the needs of an extravagant Government, and they should not be lowered so as to cripple any American industry that is not fully equipped to meet foreign competition. Whether or not many of our industries have been created and maintained artificially by protection we will not discuss. The fact is, they are here, and they are American industries. In this spirit the Democrats have taken the initiative in revising the rates on wool, an article as necessary to rich and poor alike as the food they eat. Can any man honestly justify a duty of 95.57 per cent on expensive blankets and 105.5 per cent on the cheaper grades, which was the actual duty paid on these articles of common consumption during the past year? The duty on cheap clothes is prohibitive. Clothes valued at 40 cents per pound carry a duty of 144.05 per cent; those between 40 and 70 cents per pound carry a duty of 123.55 per cent. Clothes that may be bought by the wealthier people, valued at 70 cents per pound and over, carry a duty of 96.02 per cent. It is evidently the policy of the Republican Party to make the burden lightest where it is easiest borne.

I have not treated this subject from the standpoint of the millions of American people, something like 85 per cent of the whole, who have no direct or indirect interest in high tariffs, but must pay tariff-made prices to enrich a few capitalists, perhaps 2 per cent of the population. The man who drives the plow or stands behind the counter or works at the carpenter's trade, the lawyer, doctor, teacher—in fact, everybody except those directly interested in manufacturing—by what right are they taxed to the limit for the enrichment of a few?

What I have had to say on the general subject of tariff reduction is by way of preface to the subject that I desire to discuss. South Carolina is the second State in the Union in the manufacture of cotton goods, and the district that I have the honor to represent is one of the principal manufacturing districts. Believing that the people of the United States as a whole have reached the limit of endurance, I have advocated a reduction of tariff affecting other sections, and I can not consistently shut my eyes to some of the prohibitive rates on cotton goods. Raw cotton does not enter into the discussion, for the demand for it is world-wide; our exports alone exceed the total amount raised outside of this country, and the price is made in Liverpool.

To demonstrate that the rates on cotton goods are prohibitive, we have but to note that only 4.17 per cent of the revenue of this Government raised under the Payne-Aldrich Act during the past year was for cotton goods imported. I do not believe, however, that England would flood this country with cotton goods even if the tariff wall were razed entirely, so great is our advantage of location in the home of raw cotton. I would not favor the removal of the tariff, but I do favor a reduction that will give the American manufacturer a reasonable advantage, and which would add to the revenue from this source.

It is a fact that for two years cotton manufacturers in this country have been running on small profit, and in many instances at a loss. It is evident, then, that something more than a prohibitive tariff is necessary to insure permanent and continuous success. As long as the demands of our local market exceeded our local supply of cotton goods cotton mills flourished, many of them doubling their capacity and laying up large surpluses. The habit of depending on a protected home market has become so fixed that now, when the supply far exceeds the demand and goods are piled up in warehouses for want of local buyers, the industry is paralyzed. Like a child that has fed too long at the mother's pantry, they are afraid of the competition of the world. While the cotton manufacturers of the United States have been taking waning profits from a protected and now glutted home market, England has been reaching out for the oriental trade. I can not recall the exact figures, but as I remember, in a statement published something like a year ago, it appeared that England sold 10 yards of cloth in China for every yard sold by this country; and yet both of these countries combined have scarcely touched the trade that may be opened up there. The hope of the cotton industry in this country is not in a tariff that will keep out moderate competition, but in concerted effort to cultivate new fields for the output. A few mills combined and put an agent in the vicinity of the Red Sea, with the result that American-made cotton goods were sold in the ascendant there. Every section of the civilized world should have an agent, not of a particular mill, nor of a particular kind of cloth, but to establish friendly commercial relations with the people and incidentally to place American goods. The idea should be to stimulate consumption in foreign countries where the use of cotton goods is scant, rather than curtail output and depend solely upon an uncertain market at home.

I touched on this subject in a recent newspaper interview. I believe that I would go further than any suggestion that I have heard and say that I would vote for a measure looking to the establishment of a trades department of this Government that would put an agent of American-made products in every inviting market of the world at the Government's expense. Find a market for the goods and I will show you expanded investment and higher rates of wages, tariff or no tariff. Depend wholly on a circumscribed market and the minute your supply oversteps local demand you will have that stagnation which has characterized the cotton-fabric market of the United States for the past four years. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

A committee of cotton manufacturers memorialized Congress in behalf of present rates on cotton goods, and said: "The cotton schedule is now on a competitive basis as far as the majority of it is concerned." Let us inquire how misleading and how wide of the truth is this statement. Our facts are taken from a statement made by Mr. L. W. Parker to the Committee on Ways and Means. Mr. Parker is one of the largest and one of the most successful manufacturers of cotton goods in the United States, and his frankness in contraversion of certain statements made by certain other manufacturers are not only deserving of serious consideration but are a worthy example for all manufacturers who would ask concessions of Congress. Realizing that Congress will deal fairly when fairly dealt with, he advocates reduction now rather than meet the storm when it has swept further and has broadened its track. He believes that settled conditions and expanded trade will be worth more than prohibitive tariffs that are now impotent to protect against an overtopping and ever-increasing surplus of manufactured goods. Referring to a class of goods known as lawns and domestics, after figuring every possible cost, he shows that the duty on this class of goods is one and one-half times the entire manufacturing cost. Referring to print cloth, such as is used for underwear, printed for percales, and bleached for cambrics and muslins, he shows that the duty thereon is more than 100 per cent of the entire cost of manufacture. On a still finer texture, lawns and like goods, the duty is over 100 per cent. On a corded effect, used for making shirts, the duty is one and three-fourths times the entire cost of manufacture. A colored stripe, bleached, he finds carries a duty of two and one-half times the total manufacturers' cost.

I have not reproduced the elaborate and interesting deductions made by Mr. Parker, nor have I stated all the instances in his report. I have left out several classes of goods where the rate of duty is the same as some of those that I have mentioned, but I have given the lowest rates as well as some of the highest. He very properly concludes that with prohibitive rates the cotton manufacturing industry in this country has gone through two years of the greatest depression known in its history, and the time has come to look for something else besides high tariff for relief.

Mr. Parker's suggestion as to new rates, placing all classes of goods on an ad valorem basis, is technical in its nature, but it seems from a study of it that the rates suggested would afford the American manufacturer ample protection. There is no question of his ability as a manufacturer; there is absolutely no question of his sincerity. It is not likely that he would recommend a reduction that would prove disastrous to the trade; and when he thinks a duty apportioned according to the grade of cloth and ranging from 20 to 40 per cent will not cripple the trade we are disposed to accept it. It seems to me that even a Republican might accept this in good faith and be in strict accord with his last platform declaration. We quote that declaration, following the facts just stated, to show what elasticity the Republicans have given the words "reasonable profits":

> In all tariff legislation the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries.

Mr. Chairman, I would not cripple the cotton-mill industry. Next to steel, cotton is more extensively used in industrial development than any other commodity, and many millions of yards of cotton cloth are annually used for purposes other than clothing. Perhaps it would be safe to say that a million bales of cotton are annually manufactured into cloth to be used in the industrial arts.

In the strength of the cotton-manufacturing industry my State has risen from the ashes of war to the second place in the picture. All through what is known as the Piedmont section of South Carolina may be seen the towering smokestack, like so many giant exclamations of progress. When agricultural products were at a discount in the markets, and each year added to the mortgage debt until it swept away the farm, many of our people, bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh, turned to the mill and found there employment and with it food and clothing for their children. I regret exceedingly that tariff rates no longer assure a profitable business in cotton manufacturing; I sympathize to the fullest with those good men and women who during the past two years have had their wages or time reduced or have been turned out of employment; but this is only a note of warning to our captains of industry to establish additional trade relations in the markets of the world to absorb the increasing surplus of manufactured goods. Assuming that Mr. Parker is correct that the new tariff rates suggested by him will not cripple the industry or cause the reduction of wages, recent legislation by Congress taking the tariff off of the necessaries of life and bringing the cost of living down will make for the betterment of all our people. We all know how nearly the earnings of the laborer are adjusted now to the necessaries of life and how few, with the help of the entire family, ever lay up a surplus. Is there not here a study for the mill owners? It does seem that the practice of shutting down the mills, threatening a reduction of wages, cutting out a large per cent of wage earners, so unsatisfactory to the mill owners and so disastrous to the operatives, could be avoided by a little more scientific study of the problem. I repeat, in conclusion, that I believe the solution lies not in curtailed output, not in reduced wages, but in an expanded market. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, Schedule I, the cotton schedule, which this bill revises, deals with some of the commonest articles of clothing and household use. There is hardly one among our 90,000,000 people who does not wear cotton in some form or other. All are interested in this revision. The Democratic bill now before the committee proposes to reduce the average rate of taxation of the Payne-Aldrich bill on those articles from 56 per cent ad valorem to a little more than 27 per cent ad valorem. And in this process of reduction it is believed by our committee that the revenue will not be materially disturbed, the burden of taxation upon the American people will be lifted in the amount of $200,000,000, and that at the same time the wages of industry will not be unfavorably affected, nor will the cotton-manufacturing concerns of the United States suffer any hardship.

One of the features of the Payne-Aldrich bill which has provoked the greatest indignation in our country has been the series of raises in the cotton schedule, and the history of those raises is the history of an extraordinary conspiracy by special privilege.

The cotton spinners of New England selected as their agents to appear here in the last Congress two gentlemen, named HENRY F. LIPPITT and James R. McColl. They were instructed by those who sent them down here to see that the rates of the cotton schedule were not changed. These two gentlemen charged with that mission came to Washington, and one at least, I think both of them, appeared before the Ways and Means Committee of the House and advocated that the rates in the cotton bill be not changed. But thereafter, by some curious process of intrigue, they contrived that the report by the Ways and Means Committee to the House should contain a series of mysterious reclassifications which raised the rates of duty in some cases 25 per cent, and in some cases many times 25 per cent, without an ordinary man being able to ascertain just what had happened.

The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, upon discovering the effect of these proposed changes in classification, arose on the floor and declared that he had been tricked and misled and struck those changes from the bill. They reappeared in the Senate, they stayed in the bill, and they became the law. Those are the rates which we are now reducing downward.

Upon the actual importation under those rates in the last current year, it is found that the effect of this reclassification was to raise the rates on cotton cloth from 37 to 42 per cent ad valorem, and to raise the rates on stockings from 60 to 71 per cent ad valorem.

Now, the work was done in the dark and in secret, and it was done at the behest of the two men whom I have named, and supposedly at the request of the interests which they represented down here. But the cotton spinners of New England were aghast when they discovered what had been accomplished. They said, "Boys, you have killed the goose which lays the golden egg." Because they saw plainly that the result of this raise in rates would be to arouse the American people in revolt, and they reaped the whirlwind in the last November election. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, these same interests in New England are instigating a propagandum to the effect that the Democratic cotton bill will shut down the mills of the United States, throw the working people out of employment in some cases, and reduce wages in all. That is the kind of argument to which those of us who have served some terms in this House have been familiar with, lo, these many years, but to-day it rings an unresponsive note in the ears of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But the manufacturers of New England have to put down wages when the tariff is high; they claim they have to put down wages when the tariff is low. They put down wages when they are prosperous and they put down wages when times are hard. Their only aim and purpose in politics seems to be to create the idea that if there is any tariff reduction labor has to suffer.

Now, of course, I do not mean to assert that all the manufacturers in the United States are content with the proposed cotton bill. Nor do I mean to assert that some of them are not alarmed at these proposed rates, but I think that for generations past many of these manufacturers have been nursing ghosts, for the tariff makes cowards of us all.

It is conceivable that the approach of a reduction in duties might alarm some of them in the same way that the rumor of the death of some great plunger on the New York stock market might throw the market temporarily into despair, although the removal of that speculator from the scene of his mundane activities might be the best thing that ever happened to the New York stock market. But I do deny that any cotton mill in the United States will close down and remain closed on account of this bill. The closing of a factory is one of the most brutal political weapons of the high protectionists. Many a time during campaigns they have coerced their employees with threats of closing down in the event of Democratic victory. Some of them are even capable now of carrying that threat into effect, but, unfortunately for their logic, the depression in the cotton trade has been going on since the Roosevelt panic of 1907. Since February, 1910, it has been acute.

I do not believe that the honest and sincere manufacturer can maintain that the increased importations of one-half of 1 per cent which will follow the establishment of these rates will subject him to a competition which will cause him to shut down his plant. But they say some of the plants are now shut down. Some of them have been shut down off and on for the last three or four years. The cotton manufacturing industry is already in some places in extremis. Why, gentlemen on the other side of the House and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] in particular maintain that it was the threat of Democratic tariff legislation which did this. I have here the Textile Manufacturers Journal of September 10, 1910, published two months before the election of the Democratic House of Representatives, in which it is shown that all over the United States textile manufacturing plants were then being shut down.

KNITTING MILLS IDLE.

The Oswego (N. Y.) Knitting Co. has closed its plant for three weeks. About 150 operatives are employed by the company.

The machinery and equipment in the plant of the Reading (Pa.) Glove and Mitten Manufacturing Co. will be sold at auction on the premises. The sale will take place October 12.

The Williamsburg (Va.) Knitting Mill Co. became a voluntary bankrupt in the Norfolk Federal court on September * * *. The high cost of cotton was given by the company as causing the failure.

Creditors of the Aken Knitting Co., Philmont, N. Y., will hold a meeting on September 16 to consider the sale of the property. * * * Operations have not been carried on at the Philmont plant for some time.

The Henrietta (N. C.) Mills have closed for a week to give the operatives a vacation.

After an idleness of 10 days or more the Tremont and Suffolk Mills and the Massachusetts Cotton Mills, of Lowell, Mass., resumed operations on Tuesday.

The Everett Mills and Pacific Mills, of Lawrence, which shut down on August 1, will resume work on Tuesday.

Five hundred operatives of the Empress Mills, of Augusta, Ga., will welcome September 12, as the mill will open on that date after a two months shutting down. The high price of cotton was the cause of closing the mill.

Many other items could be given of the same nature covering every month of the last few years. In view of that unfortunate state of affairs in the cotton trade, it is unlikely that even the most audacious high protectionists will lay at the doors of the Democratic Party any responsibility for the depression.

Just about this time of the year it is the custom in cotton manufacturing to shut down the plants. They shut them down sometimes for a few days, sometimes for a few weeks. They do it partly to curtail production and keep prices up, and partly to overhaul the machinery that is in their mills. There are other parts of the country to-day where the cotton mills are suffering from a genuine depression, but there is no single one of those manufacturers who will honestly maintain that the fear of Democratic tariff revision has made idle the spindles in their mills. The spindles in Europe are idle. The spindles in Canada are idle. The spindles in many of our southern cotton mills are idle, because, as we read in the morning papers of to-day, there has been a great drought on the Catawba River, which took away the motor power of the mills in North and South Carolina and caused them to shut down for lack of power. Is that Democratic tariff revision?

However, to offset that, the morning papers also announced that all through New England a general reopening of the mills, textile and otherwise, is now under way. Many of them reopened yesterday, and many more are to come. [Applause.]

To every self-respecting American it must have caused a feeling of disgust to learn from Republican orators of recent years of our helpless incapacity in all lines of business. According to them there has been nothing that any American could do as well as a foreigner. All lines of trade and manufacturing could not survive any competition from abroad. Whatever prosperity we had came from making our taxes higher, and no American could retain his employment for a moment if a foreign article was sold in competition with that which he produced. And through all this chorus of hypocritical pretense their chief concern has been for the wages of the laboring man. Even now certain cotton manufacturers are announcing that under our bill they must shut down their plants and throw their labor out of employment because they can not afford to operate with 0.53 of 1 per cent of additional competition from abroad. It is the old legacy that we received from the Wilson tariff law. I think the greatest curse that came to the American people as a result of the hard times in 1892 and 1893 was the refastening upon our neck of the yoke of a high protective tariff. In those days of depression, when men in all lines of business were suffering from causes already in operation long before the passage of the Wilson Act, the high-protected manufacturer of the McKinley law came to the front and asserted that it was the fault of the Wilson tariff, and succeeded in persuading enough voters that that was the cause of their hardships, so that they were able to refasten on our necks the tariff burden which we have ever since endured. The workingman has believed this. He has believed his wages came out of the tariff. He has voted for a high protection every four years. If he had not so voted, it is not possible that the manufacturers could have succeeded in prolonging their long lease of high protection beyond the term of its natural life. But it does seem to-day that the workingman of the country is beginning to realize that he is the chief sufferer from a high tariff protective system, that to tax him higher is not to make him more prosperous, and that a tariff system that takes his wages out of his pockets does not make him any richer; that he has to buy as many of the commodities of life as the rich man, and that therefore the tariff bears more heavily upon him than the man of unlimited income.

But our Republican friends across the aisle have asserted day after day, and some of the manufacturers are now asserting in the public prints, that the first effect of the Democratic bill will be to put down wages, that they can not operate and pay these magnificent American wages to the employees of the cotton mills if the present Underwood bill becomes a law. That opens up one of the most extraordinary instances of political buncombe with which the American people have ever been deluded. An examination of the condition of the cotton-manufacturing industry in New England discloses one fact more luminous in that record than all others in the history of manufacturing. It establishes beyond peradventure of a doubt just exactly where the tariff plunder goes. It does not go to the American workingman, but it goes in dividends to the highly protected manufacturers. [Applause on the Democratic side.] According to the twenty-second report of the industrial statistics of Rhode Island, the average weekly earnings in cotton-goods mills vary from $7 to $8 a week. How is that for a magnificent American wage! For 12,000 men employed the average wage is from $8 to $9, and for women it is $6 to $7, and for children $3 to $4.

There are 53,000 persons employed in Rhode Island in the manufacture of textiles, and 72 per cent of the working children of Rhode Island are in the textile mills. In New Hampshire the story is almost the same; in the manufacture of cotton cloth the average number of male employees is 12,167; the average number of females 12,901. The average wage of the male is $11.67; the average wage of the female $8.11 per week; and there are 330 children under 16 who are employed at an average of $5.27 a week. In the manufacture of cotton yarn in New Hampshire the general average is somewhat lower than cotton cloth, being only $7.52 instead of $9.01 for cotton cloth.

In Maine in 1906 the average number of males employed was 5,323; females, 6,400; children under 16 years of age, 590; making a general average of $6.27. Now, we heard the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] on yesterday describe how the working people of England were coming to our country in great numbers to take advantage of the magnificent wages which American workmen receive at the hands of a high protective tariff, but if he would examine the figures which are reported, he would see that the average wages paid in the cotton mills of England per week is $6.37, actually higher in free-trade England, with her pauper labor, about which we have heard so much, than the American workman receives in the highly-protected State of Maine. In Massachusetts the weekly wage now averages in the vicinity of $9. Now, what is the result of the payment of these miserable, starvation wages in the cotton mills of the United States? The result is inevitable—that a wage of $8 or $9 a week is not a living wage, and that the husband and father takes his wife and children into the mills to eke out his miserable existence. The immediate result of it all is a system of industrial slavery which excites the commiseration of all benevolent people throughout our country. High infant mortality inevitably follows. I do not desire to dwell on these unhappy conditions, and I refer to them only to answer the preposterous and hypocritical pretense of the Republicans that a high protective tariff gives these workmen in the textile mills their share of protection; that their wages are raised by a high protective tariff. Of course, if the manufacturers had been willing to give their share to the operatives in the New England mills, there would not have been such an outcry of discontent. But those people up there understand the situation. They are not going to be beguiled by statements such as we heard yesterday from the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. UTTER], describing the magnificent condition of the mill workers to-day.

I believe that if you could put in the hands of every workingman in New England as he casts his ballot on election day a statement of the contrast between the wages that he receives and the dividends paid in the mills in which he is employed, every one of them would go into the booth and vote the Democratic ticket for the sole purpose of getting rid of this tariff incubus.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman explain why, if conditions in this country are as bad as he claims them to be, there is such a large number of foreign-born workingmen constantly seeking admittance into the United States?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Well, the gentleman is too good an American not to know that those people come here because they want to live in a democracy and get out of a monarchy.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, is not it true that most of them come here because they have a better opportunity to secure a better living by receiving a higher wage than they received on the other side?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has just listened to my statement that the operatives in the textile mills in England receive higher weekly wages than the operatives in the textile mills in Maine under all these years of high protection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I wish to ask the gentleman to listen to me, as I believe I am to follow him, when I present the figures showing that wages are about one-half as large in all the textile industries of England as they are in the United States.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The gentleman must be a necromancer if he produces those figures.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The figures can be found in the British Trade Report.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, the fact is the wages paid in the cotton industry of the United States are lower than those paid in any other textile industry in our country. They are lower than those paid in the manufacture of woolens; they are lower than those paid in the manufacture of silk goods; and they are lower than those paid in the manufacture of jute and hemp goods.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. BOWMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows the character of the work that the English mechanic is employed upon, and whether it is a higher class of work than that upon which the workmen in New England are employed?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I think there are some employees in the English mills who do a higher grade of work, and the result is shown in the fact that England produces a higher grade of cotton goods, on the average, than the United States does.

During these recent highly protected years in New England mills the poorly organized employees have been fighting for a living wage. In Rhode Island in the cotton mills there were 12 strikes in 1901, 7 strikes in 1902, 10 strikes in 1903, 5 strikes in 1904, and 2 strikes in 1905. If the high tariff has been operating so beneficently as Messrs. Whitman, LIPPITT, and McColl allege, why these strikes? And these strikes do not mark the only periods of discontent. Sometimes the mill owners are too quick for them. When the operatives hear by chance of the enormous profits of their employer and decide to demand a mere crumb more from his table, the owners many a time shut down the mills and cast their operatives out of employment. Hunger is a wonderful remedy for discontent.

The Report on Statistics of Labor in Massachusetts for 1907 says, at page 476:

> The predominant cause of strikes, as measured by the number of disputes, was for increase in wages. This cause alone produced 38.29 per cent of the 1,003 strikes that occurred during the five-year period from 1903 to 1907.

And at page 481:

> So far as the number of strikes is concerned, the leading industries were cotton goods, with 2,223, or 14.77 per cent, of all the strikers.

The whole matter may be summed up in the statement that the average wages per capita in the cotton industry are lower than in any of the textile trades in our country. The census of 1905 showed that the average wage in cotton manufactures was $304.31 per annum; in wool manufactures, $393.37; in silk and silk goods, $336.28; in flax, hemp, and jute products, $350.12; and in dyeing and finishing textiles, $434.96.

Look on that picture, then on this. Consider the effect of high protection on the industry which pays the lowest wages. Look well and you may see distinctly where all the tariff plunder has gone. The question may be excellently understood from the dividend returns of New England cotton mills in recent years.

The year 1908 was not a satisfactory one to the average stockholder in the United States. Although the panic started in 1907 its full effect was not felt until the following year. Thousands of corporations passed their dividends; many of the most prosperous were compelled to reduce their dividends. The cotton manufacturers in Massachusetts were remarkably prosperous at a time when other industries were facing either bankruptcy or curtailment in every possible direction. A review of the dividends paid by the cotton mills of Massachusetts in that year of depression is a fair illustration of the ability of that industry to weather any financial storm without disappointing the stockholders, who have grown accustomed to abnormal profits.

Take the Acushnet Mill, of New Bedford, for instance. Prior to 1907 that mill had been paying 16 per cent on a capitalization of $1,000,000. In the panic year a dividend of 66 per cent was paid. In 1908, when other industries were passing dividends, the Acushnet was able to pay its normal rate of 16 per cent. That it might have paid a much higher rate is indicated by the fact that last year it declared a stock dividend of 100 per cent.

A more striking illustration is to be found in the financial history of Dartmouth mill, also of New Bedford. This mill had been paying dividends ranging from 8 per cent to 26 per cent. In the panic year, the dividend jumped to 66 per cent.

The year in which the panic actually started, and the year in which the depression was felt most, had no effect whatever on the Dartmouth mills. In 1908, the year of depression, the Dartmouth stockholders were again given a 66 per cent dividend. But this does not begin to tell the wonderful story of cotton-mill prosperity. One would suppose that stockholders and directors who had been paid 66 per cent on their investment in a year when their neighbors received nothing from their investments in other industries, would feel contented. Sixty-six per cent did not satisfy the Dartmouth people, however. The Christmas holidays of 1908 came around and on Christmas eve the board of directors of the Dartmouth mills assembled in the board room to see what they could do to make their stockholders happy when they awoke on Christmas morning. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They glanced at the profits for the year, concluded that a 66 per cent cash dividend was totally inadequate to compensate their stockholders for risking their money in such a hazardous industry and thereupon declared a stock dividend of 100 per cent.

It is a curious coincident that during 1908 in Massachusetts the wages were reduced to 83,403 employees of cotton mills, the total reduction aggregating $89,972.78 a week.

Even the 100 per cent Christmas present to the Dartmouth cotton barons does not tell the whole story. The cotton schedule in the Payne-Aldrich bill had increased the duties on the fine cotton goods manufactured in the Dartmouth mills. With these prohibitive duties in effect there was more business ahead than could be cared for by the equipment then being operated. The directors therefore decided to build another mill, to install the machinery necessary to manufacture the finer grades of cotton goods on which the rates had been increased. These improvements were to cost approximately $3,000,000. The entire cost was paid out of the surplus, after dividends of 66 per cent had been paid in two preceding years, and after a stock dividend of 100 per cent had been declared. After this enormous outlay of cash had been made for dividends and improvements, the Dartmouth mills were able to pay 13 per cent on their doubled capitalization in 1909 and 16 per cent in 1910.

The policy of declaring big stock dividends is not peculiar to the Dartmouth corporation. It was done by other mills before the panic, during the panic, and since the panic. Here are a few illustrations:

The Butler Mills, of New Bedford, declared a stock dividend of 20 per cent in 1910, and goes right on paying approximately the same rate of dividend which was paid before the increase in capitalization.

A 20 per cent stock dividend was paid in 1909 by the Pierce Mill of New Bedford. The dividend rate before the company made this gift to its stockholders was 8 per cent. The company continues to pay 8 per cent on the stock for which it was paid and on the stock which it gave away.

The Whitman cotton mills in New Bedford pays its dividends regularly, and following the custom in that city, occasionally makes its stockholders a present. This mill paid a cash dividend of 33⅓ per cent in 1909. This particular mill is worthy of more than passing attention. It is owned by William Whitman, who has boasted that he has helped make every Republican tariff bill for more than 40 years. Whitman is the man who has repeatedly warned Congress that a reduction of duties in the cotton and woolen mills would paralyze these industries. Mr. Whitman's activities in the making of tariff schedules have been remunerative, which fact is illustrated in his payment of a cash dividend by his cotton mill in 1909 of 33⅓ per cent.

The Kilburn Mill, of New Bedford, is another corporation which has found it possible to make handsome presents to its stockholders without disturbing its regular dividend rate. This mill made a 100 per cent increase in its stock in 1910; in the same year it declared a cash dividend of 33⅓ per cent, and it goes right on paying its 6 per cent dividend.

While the New Bedford cotton-mill corporations are notorious for their enormous profits, the Fall River mills, making a lower grade of cotton goods, are not far behind.

The Bourne Mill paid a stock dividend of 40 per cent in 1903.

The Chace Mills paid a stock dividend of 20 per cent in 1905, a stock dividend of 33⅓ per cent in 1907, and despite this increase of 50 per cent in its capitalization for which it received no money, it is paying a higher rate of interest on its stock to-day than it did before the stock was presented to the stockholders.

The Davis Mill was paying 6 per cent to its stockholders for a number of years. In 1909 the company declared a stock dividend of 25 per cent. Apparently this increase in capitalization had not the slightest effect on the earning capacity of the Davis Mill, for the same rate of dividend has been since maintained.

The same situation prevails in the Davol Mills. This mill had been paying 6 per cent. In 1907, the panic year, a stock dividend of 25 per cent was declared without affecting the rate of the dividends in the succeeding years.

The King Phillip Mill is another which had been paying 6 per cent. Manifestly this rate did not represent the real earnings of this corporation, for in 1906 the stockholders were given an opportunity to take a stock dividend of 50 per cent or a cash dividend of the same amount. This did not disturb the dividend rate.

The Laurel Lake Mills were more generous. In 1907, the panic year mind you, a stock dividend of 100 per cent was declared, and on the doubled capitalization the mills are now paying 8 per cent, 3½ per cent more than in 1905 and 1906, two years generally recognized in the cotton trade as normal years.

Another evidence of the prosperity of the Fall River mills in the panic year is to be found in the Merchants Mills. In that year, 1907, the Merchants declared a stock dividend of 50 per cent. In the following year its dividends were 6 per cent on the increased capitalization, 1½ per cent greater than in 1907 and 2 per cent greater than in 1906, a normal year, and 4 per cent greater than in 1905, also a normal year in the cotton trade.

The Pocasset Mills furnish another illustration of the fact that the cotton-manufacturing industry is immune from panics. In 1907, a year of distress in other branches of business, the Pocasset declared a stock dividend of 100 per cent. The doubled capitalization caused no fluctuation in the dividends, for the corporation has gone right on paying 6 per cent, just as it did for years before the stockholders were allowed to double their holdings without the expenditure of a penny. It is reasonable to expect that the monotony of these 6 per cent dividends will be broken in the near future by another stock dividend.

The year 1907 was a happy one also for the stockholders in the Richard Borden Mills. In that year there was a stock dividend of 25 per cent. On this increased capitalization the mills are now paying 10 per cent, which is 4½ per cent greater than the dividend rates in the normal years of 1905 and 1906.

In 1906 the Tecumseh Mills paid a stock dividend of 50 per cent. Several times since the capitalization was increased the dividends have exceeded those prior to the date of the increased capitalization, and at no time has it gone below the rates paid prior to 1906.

The Troy mills varied the monotony of cash and stock dividends by presenting their stockholders with a bond dividend of 100 per cent in 1909. This enables them to continue paying from 12 to 67 per cent on its $300,000 of common stock.

Mr. AIKEN of South Carolina. Has the gentleman any information of the market value of the stock in those mills?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The gentleman asks me for the market value of the stock in those mills. I have the figures here which will answer that question precisely, but I can say in general terms that the market value of almost all the New England mills is above par, and in many cases a premium of 200 or 300 or 400 per cent.

Now, of course, the gold mine that the New England manufacturers have discovered in the tariff probably does not seem to them excessive. We had some testimony before the Ways and Means Committee during the Payne-Aldrich revision which gave an illuminating impression to the people of this country as to just what New Englanders did expect to make out of the tariff. I quote from the printed hearings of the committee——

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from New York permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. DICKINSON. I notice that you have been reading about the large profits to the New England manufacturers in 1908 and other years. It has frequently been stated here in this Chamber that there is a great depression now in the cotton industry, and particularly among the southern cotton mills. Can you state to the House what is the cause of that depression and the reason for no profits coming now, when they did come two years ago, if that be the fact? Is there a real depression and no profit, or is it due, in part, to the increased price in cotton? Or what are the real facts, and what is your explanation?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Well, I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that so far as the southern mills are concerned, and some of the northern mills, I believe that the depression now existing is in large part due to the high price of cotton. But the southern mills, in addition, as I stated a few minutes ago, are suffering from a momentary loss of their motive power. They are also suffering from a partial loss of their oriental market. Now, mark you, I do not mean to say that our cotton goods exports have gone off because we do not sell as many goods in China as before. Our general exports of cotton goods have increased, but we do not sell as many goods in China as we did.

Mr. DICKINSON. May I inquire further of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. DICKINSON. I understand, and I am informed, that there is a great demand for, and difficulty among the manufacturing establishments to get, at this time, sufficient raw cotton to meet demands of the industry. Is not the present condition of depression which exists, both in the South and in New England, due to the fact that there has been overproduction?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I think unquestionably.

Mr. DICKINSON. And that there is not sufficient market to make a demand for their goods?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I think the gentleman is unquestionably right, and I think that contains an expensive lesson for the American manufacturers. If they would only consider the effect of the high protective tariff on their trade relations with the rest of the world, they would see that England, that has twice as many cotton spindles as the United States, is catering to a market of perhaps 900,000,000 people and American cotton manufacturers are catering to a home market of only one-tenth as many people, although their export trade has begun to improve. Now, they can not go out to the world's markets with a piece of cotton goods in one hand and a club in the other hand and expect to do business with other peoples. But the ultimate improvement in the cotton trade is to be looked for in our export trade. Our manufacturers have got the home market and they have overcapitalized and overproduced, and they have given our home market about all it could absorb since the time of depression in 1908.

Mr. DICKINSON. Just one other question, if I may be permitted.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. DICKINSON. Do I understand the gentleman to say or mean that if we had freer trade and more active commerce with all nations those industries are liable to revive, instead of suffer continued depression?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Unquestionably; and American labor will be better employed and American wages will be higher in the cotton mills.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have just two more matters which I wish to touch on briefly. I have been describing to the committee the state of affairs in the Dartmouth mill, where in the years of depression—in 1908, for example—they paid 166 per cent in dividends; and I would like to have the committee consider whether this Tariff Board, which is expected to bring relief to the American people, in endeavoring to ascertain the difference in cost of production here and abroad, and a reasonable profit, as the Republican platform demands, is going to adopt New England standards and to follow the advice of the Republican tariff prophets, Mr. HENRY F. LIPPITT and James R. McColl, who wrote these tariff rates. Here is a little colloquy that occurred before the Committee on Ways and Means in the last revision, when Mr. LIPPITT appeared before the Ways and Means Committee. I read from page 4535:

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not know whether I understood Mr. LIPPITT correctly to say that no large fortunes have ever been made in this business in New England?

Mr. LIPPITT. I think so.

Mr. LONGWORTH. My impression is that most of the large New England fortunes have been made in it.

Mr. LIPPITT. We are not accustomed to very large fortunes in New England.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then, may I ask you what you call a large fortune?

Mr. LIPPITT. I would regard a fortune of three-quarters of a billion as a large fortune.

* * * * * * *

Mr. MCCALL. You mean there are no manufacturers of very great wealth in New England?

Mr. LIPPITT. Yes; I mean to say if you compare the cotton industry with others.

There, Mr. Chairman, is where the "reasonable profit" goes. There is where the benefits of the high protective tariff go. They do not go to the workingmen. Do you suppose that the men employed in Mr. LIPPITT's cotton mill at $6, $7, or $8 a week would share his opinion that it takes three-quarters of a billion dollars to make a large fortune?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to conclude his remarks.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. In deference to the gentleman, I yield to myself five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes additional.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, out of consideration for the feelings of the committee I will not detain them further than to make a few closing observations.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman repeat the figures he gave as being Mr. LIPPITT's estimate of a large fortune?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Three-quarters of a billion dollars.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it possible for any one man to have three-quarters of a billion dollars?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. LIPPITT evidently believed that if he could get the tariff up on cotton he could get that much. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman does he believe that Mr. LIPPITT has any such amount of money, or that it would be possible for Mr. LIPPITT to have any such amount of money in his own possession?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. No; but he is looking for it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will permit me one more question: Is it possible for any man in this country or any other country to have in his possession so large an amount of money, taken away from the public, by whom it would be used in labor and in other industrial purposes?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I suppose that Mr. LIPPITT had in mind the extraordinary fortune that Mr. Carnegie made out of the tariff on steel, but his purpose was to get the cotton rates up so that he could equal Mr. Carnegie, and he pretty nearly succeeded.

Mr. UTTER. In all good faith I should like to ask the gentleman from New York if, after reading the hearing from which he has read, he took the answer of Mr. LIPPITT in a serious way?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I was very much alarmed when I heard that he proposed to mulct the American people in three-quarters of a billion dollars if he got the rate that he asked for.

Mr. UTTER. I am glad to have the gentleman say that, because it strikes me that very many other statements have been taken in the same way, and things said as a joke have been taken in all seriousness,

Mr. HARRISON of New York. In view of the stupendous dividends of which I have given you a brief idea, Messrs. LIPPITT and McColl came down here to get the tariff rates on manufactured cotton goods raised. Mr. LIPPITT stated to the Ways and Means Committee that the industry was not a bonanza, but he said it is one of narrow margins and that success in it can only be obtained by most careful management. Now, the most careful management that these extraordinary men in New England have been exercising has been yielding them 100 or 200 per cent dividends for some years, but they were only able to pay the labor in their mills $5, $6, and $7 a week. These men have perfectly solved the riddle of how to get something for nothing, and I do not wonder that they are not willing to let go of it. These are the corporations which tremble at the threat of tariff reduction. Swollen with tariff profits, they are unwilling to leave the banquet table.

Had their marvelous achievements at money making been conducted on an economically honest basis, all Americans would approve. Had they not the stigma of paying the lowest wages of any of the textile trades, all men would bid them Godspeed. But when, rich beyond the flights of the most eager imagination, loaded down with tariff plunder taken from all Americans, rich and poor alike, built up with the sweat and toil of underpaid employees, they announce that tariff reduction means reduction in wages, all Americans must cry them down in shame. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to my colleague from New York [Mr. REDFIELD].

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from New York yield for a question?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. If the gentleman from Kansas will excuse me, I think the committee would prefer to hear from my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, on the way from India to this extra session, and while crossing the Arabian Sea, I strolled one afternoon to the afterpart of the ship to a little shop in which the steamship company allows certain small articles to be sold. The vessel was one belonging to the Peninsula & Oriental Steam Navigation Co. I need only mention the name of this famous line to have you know that it is a peculiarly British line. It is heavily subsidized by the English Government, and is also under contract with the Australian Government and the Government of India. It is the British steamship company par excellence of this world.

There in the little shop at the afterpart of the ship were sold some very attractive small clocks—little travelers' clocks. I call your attention to the fact that they were the "Line" clock; they bore on their face the English flag beautifully intertwined with the flag of the steamship company. I bought one of the clocks and took it with me to my stateroom and showed it to my wife, and in my enthusiasm took it out of its case and discovered on it an inscription I had not theretofore seen: "Made in Connecticut, U. S. A." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I wish to discuss to-day some salient features of three public statements, viz, a pamphlet, "Wool Manufacture in America and Europe," sent each Member of this House by the National Association of Wool Manufacturers; an address before this House on June 17 by the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. AMES; papers sent with the message of the President of the United States, dated May 17, 1911, Senate document 31; and with these some letters from the National Association of Wool Manufacturers to me. Before doing so it is well to suggest certain principles and to make certain facts and their relations clear. And in using figures I recall that in a New England city, famous for its municipal statistics, appeared the statement that 300 per cent of its Turkish population was criminal. A sudent, whose attention this fact aroused, investigated it and found that the Turkish population consisted of one Turk who had been locked up three times. In studying manufacturing costs it is necessary to go behind the returns.

Let us stand before a great factory and think who are interested in it. At the office door enters the man in control. Often he is not the owner, but one among many owners chosen to act in their behalf. In a true sense he is a trustee for those whose money made the mill. Upon its success his livelihood and their profits depend. Among these owners often are women and children. Their capital is at risk and is largely locked up in buildings, machinery, and material. The proportion of their assets that is liquid is small. The demand for dividends is imperative. The risk is large. The men who run that mill and by their skill, wisdom, and experience provide employment for workers and profit for owners should be well paid. The owners, because their property is tied up in assets not easily convertible and at a serious business risk, are entitled to more return than would be the case were the money invested in prime securities quickly turned into cash or secured by mortgages and subject to less risk. Money in a textile or paper mill should therefore earn more than in Government or State or city bonds or in quickly convertible stocks. It is natural that those whose money is so invested should shrink from any change in their conditions. This alone accounts for much of the opposition to tariff changes.

At the large mill gate enters the throng of workers. What they use in that mill is often not their own. They, in a sense, are trustees for the use of materials and machinery belonging to others. Their property is not at risk, but their living is. So far as livelihood is concerned, they have at stake what the mill manager has at stake. Upon their faithful doing of the daily task the owners' profit depends. Upon the wisdom and strength of the management the homes, the comfort, the health, perhaps the lives of the workers depend. The mill is the common ground. It should be the servant of them all; often it is the master. As the money of the owners is at risk in the mill, so the homes of the workers are at risk, and the margin of safety for those homes and families is less for the worker than for the manager and for the owners. As the business risk of the owners should have consideration, so the home risk of the worker is entitled to care.

Without the mill, distant perhaps from it, is the third and the greater party in interest, the public—the people who buy the goods that are made there. Out of the great mill gate go cars of goods to this public and those consumers of the mill's product are interested in the design, the quality, the cheapness of those goods and in the promptness and regularity with which they are supplied. The right of the consumer to standard goods at a reasonable price is real and must be considered. [Applause.]

In Soerabaya, Java, I saw dredging and filling done in a strange way. Naked men with small baskets dived from boats in midstream, scraping the sandy mud from the bottom in these baskets, from which they loaded the boats. These then were rowed ashore and again with baskets the mud was dumped upon the marshy spots where the building was to be erected. When a suction dredge is substituted for such a crude process all parties gain, the owner of the dredge, the workers on the dredge, and the customer for the dredge. The owner receives more, the worker is paid more, and the cost is less.

Whether they will or not, these three parties in interest in that mill can not be separated. They are united by bands not less strong that they are unseen, nor less potent that at times one or another of these parties seek to break or ignore them. A mill will not permanently prosper if the owner seeks his profit at the expense of the worker, whether it be the expense of the worker's pocket or health or brains, nor will it long prosper if the owners seek profits without regard to the consumer, nor will the worker or consumer profit long if the goods are sold more cheaply than they can be made. Loss to the mill owner means, ultimately, loss to the mill worker and loss to the consumer, too. Nor will the worker long profit if, thinking of himself alone, he demands an undue share, more than can justly be had, of what that mill produces. These three must get along together. How can it best be done?

It should be clear, Mr. Chairman, from what has been said that the thoughts to be presented are offered in no partisan or destructive spirit. The Democratic Party has been charged with being a destroyer of our industries, of being heedless alike of their right to earn profits and their duty to pay righteous wages. Perhaps we may charge our opponents with insufficient care for the interest of the consuming public in our industries, but above and beyond political and financial considerations rises the human interest in our theme, for we deal with the homes and lives of men. If into dark places light may come, if for penury plenty may be had, if for sickness we may have health, if for anxiety we may substitute peace, surely it is worth doing. Not, indeed, that we may do these things all at once, but rather open the way so that as time passes the clearer light of a better day may dawn. Can we translate into terms of human happiness the laws of business and of taxation? No less than this is what needs doing, and is what we seek to begin to do. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In a recent book I read:

> What workmen want from their employers beyond anything else is high wages, and what employers want from their workmen most of all is a low labor cost of manufacture. These two conditions are not opposed to one another, as would appear at first glance. On the contrary, they can be made to go together in all classes of work without exception.

The writer proceeds to say that he speaks—> with the object of advocating high wages and low labor cost as the foundation of the best management.

A prominent manufacturer states—> to insure the best results the organization of productive labor must be direct and controlled by persons having not only executive ability and possessing the practical familiarity of a mechanic or engineer with the goods produced and the processes employed, but having also an equally practical knowledge of how to observe, record, analyze, and compare essential facts in relation to wages, supplies, expense accounts, and all else that enters into or affects the economy of production and the cost of the product.

Another American manufacturer in a different line says:

> The American manufacturer to be successful must be an economist, know exact costs, and have the courage to abandon slipshod ways of product.

A third manufacturer in still another line says:

> When the time comes, and I think its approach is near, that as much thought and study and as big brains are devoted to the problem of labor as have heretofore been devoted to and absorbed by the problems of financing, selling, and equipment, when we study the man behind the machine as closely as we do the machine, we shall see ways of making the one fit the other more closely than we do now.

All about great mills are instruments regulating machinery, providing that machines are not overstrained, that their product shall be within their power regularly to produce without damage to the machine; we even care lest machines get overheated and, in a true sense, lest they get overtired, for we know that a tired machine gives out and its life is not as long as it should be, and its product neither as large nor as good as it ought to be. We protect it against dust, we lubricate it, we even let it rest, yet that machine is dead and of itself inert. When shall we learn that to be most productive a living and responsive man needs also not to be overtired or overstrained, that he needs rest, that his product shall be always within and not beyond his power? Until the course we take with our machinery is recognized as of equal application to our men and women workers we shall not have solved the problem of production. So long as we extract from men and women the most possible for the least return to them we are working against the deepest laws of nature and of finance, our sight is short, we are but blind leaders of the blind. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The normal resistance of a working force to pressure under conditions of a narrow wage and long hours is not an element that leads to profit.

And here once for all let me say that believing strongly in scientific management, no management is scientific or sound which promotes or permits human overstrain or which taxes the future of women and children to make profits.

In a former address it was stated as a principle of production that high wages, combined with the best equipment of machinery and tools, with the best factory conditions, and the best management, means always low labor cost per unit of product, and also that a diminishing cost per unit of product was not inconsistent with but was normal to an increasing rate of wage, provided the conditions of modern equipment and tools, good working conditions, and proper management were had. These laws apply to every industry; it can never be claimed respecting general laws that they are of limited application. Human nature is the same force in a paper mill as in an army; antagonism to injustice, resistance to narrow conditions, righteous desire for a living wage, are the same in the factory, the family, and the mine. It was written of old, "A house divided against itself shall not stand." It is the commonplace of every baseball field that teamwork wins. If we establish the law of the increasing wage and the diminishing labor cost, when conditions are as they ought to be, then we shall see the beginning of the end of the sweatshop and of child labor.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. REDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate very much the line of argument which the gentleman is making, and I would like, for further information, to have him elucidate this problem. A month ago I was in a mill connected with the cotton industry, and I saw a woman who four months ago was winding bobbins in Dresden, Germany. She got 12 marks a week. I saw her winding bobbins on the same machine, running at the same speed, getting $12 a week, or a little over four times as much. Right alongside of her I saw 26 looms. The weavers were from Nottingham. The machines were from Nottingham. The men six months ago were running the same machines in Nottingham at the same speed, getting $12.50 a week, and I saw them getting $30 to $32 a week. Now, how can there be an equal cost?

Mr. REDFIELD. I am very glad, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman has asked that question——

Mr. HILL. And I ask the question in good faith, in view of the gentleman's large experience.

Mr. REDFIELD. And I will answer it in good faith by saying at once that a large lace manufacturer in Nottingham, England, told me on the 2d or 3d day of May that if we would take off our tariff bars that would drive him out of business. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. Does the gentleman mean that we could do it paying the same wages?

Mr. REDFIELD. Pardon me. I will not listen to the gentleman until he will give me a chance to answer his question. The answer to the first half of the gentleman's question is that if the manufacturer who was employing the woman at a higher wage knew his business and had his proper management his goods would have cost him less at the higher wage than more, and if you will pardon me I will give you testimony in a very short time of one of your former Republican Members, himself a large cotton manufacturer.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman pardon me just one word?

Mr. REDFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. It was the identical same management in Connecticut owned by the same people that are operating the mill in Germany.

Mr. REDFIELD. I am very sorry to hear it. It should have been very much better. [Laughter.] And right there I will say without any question of hesitation that a large number of your textile mills keep no costs at all. They do not know what their goods cost them now, and I will give you an example, if you will be a little patient with me, of what scientific management did in one case, and I will be very much pleased to do it.

Mr. HILL. But the gentleman has not answered my question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. REDFIELD. No; I must go on with my argument.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. REDFIELD. It is perhaps right to add something respecting low labor cost per unit resulting from a higher wage under better conditions. No one questions that within the last 50 years, taken as a whole, the rate of wages paid in our industries advanced; yet if the total wages paid are compared with the total product in all our industries, it is found that whereas in the year 1860 the proportion of wages to product was 20.1 per cent, in 1905 the proportion of wages to product was but 18.4 per cent. Think you this a small difference? If the labor ratio in cost in 1860 had been maintained in 1905, our total manufactures that year would have cost two hundred and eighty million more than they did. It means also that while the wage itself has gone upward the labor cost of product has gone downward, for in this very period 1860–1905 wages advanced 69.5 per cent, but product grew 132.3 per cent. This is true also of the woolen industry. The ratio of total wages and salaries to total productions in 1889 was 20.6 per cent; in 1904, 19.8 per cent; and the ratio of the same factors to one another in 1909 was 18.8 per cent. I am not discussing now what the actual cost is, but merely showing the downward course of labor cost side by side with the upward course of wages, and I take an extended period of years in order to get a true average.

Said the superintendent of a southern cotton mill to his employer only a few months ago—and the employer told me—"Boss," said he, "I have cut down my labor cost." "How much did you reduce the cost of wages?" said the man. "Nothing," he said, "I added to them, but I got more work." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In a letter to me of June 23 the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. says that while the item of wages for locomotive-engine men and firemen per mile run shows for 1910 9.52 cents as compared with 4.38 cents in 1860, the tractive power of their locomotives in freight service to-day is almost exactly four times that of 1860, and the other locomotives have increased in power somewhat in proportion, hence it is easy to see that while the wage element is a little more than double per mile run, the work done is four times, and therefore the labor cost per unit of work done per ton-mile or per passenger mile is about one-half to-day, despite the increased wage, because conditions exist which brings the law of highly paid labor making low labor cost into operation.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. REDFIELD. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to get the source of the gentleman's information. Was that information contained in the letter from the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad? I do not question it at all, but——

Mr. REDFIELD. Yes [tendering the original letter].

Mr. NORRIS. I did not know whether it was the language read from the letter of the president or whether that was the gentleman's own statement of the language of the letter.

Mr. REDFIELD. The statement was made by him, and I drew the deduction that four times the work done at twice the cost is one-half.

Perhaps one may pause here to state certain further facts respecting the proportion of the labor cost to the total cost of production which appears in statistics recently collected. It is important in all this discussion to keep in mind that in discussing labor cost we are dealing not with a major but a minor factor in production.

I have already shown that in our total manufactures in 1905 wages form not over 18.4 per cent of the total value, and in the woolen industry wages and salaries form 18.8 per cent of the value of production in 1909. This is confirmed by the report of the United States Steel Corporation for 1905, showing a total expenditure for wages and salaries of 22½ per cent of their product. The wage cost of the product of the manufacturers of this country did not in 1905 exceed 20 per cent of the value of that product. These figures do not show the actual cost of production or the ratio of wages to that cost, as I have said, merely the ratio of wages to the value of product. Mr. Forstmann, to whose pamphlet I refer, told me, however, that in his worsted mills the labor cost was 25 per cent of the total cost. I have been furnished cost sheets from a large tin-plate plant which show a labor cost of $124 out of a total of $957, or 13 per cent of the total factory cost. Page 27 of Senate Document No. 31, the Tariff Board report on pulp and news-print paper industry, gives some facts on this point, also chiefly remarkable, however, for the variations of cost which I have already shown to this House to be usual and ordinary.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. REDFIELD. In a few moments.

That report shows labor cost to be sometimes as low as 10 per cent of the total cost. The Boston News Bureau for July 4, 1911, says:

> On cotton yarns, for example, raw materials cost is 19 cents; cost of manufacturing, 4 cents; and selling charges, 1 cent; making total net cost of 24 cents. This proportion of material is excessive, because of high price of cotton; but the small amount of labor cost is to be noted.

Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to ask, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's opinion as to what bearing the labor cost to the manufacturer has on the individual wage paid to the labor?

Mr. REDFIELD. The bearing the labor cost has on the individual wage is just this: That in proportion as equipment is modern, conditions good, and management wise, that high wages brings always a low labor cost, inevitably and always.

Mr. WEEKS. I asked that question because in making the opening statement the other day the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means used the argument that labor was not getting a suitable reward because labor cost was decreasing. It seemed to me fallacious reasoning.

Mr. REDFIELD. I am not concerned with that statement.

Mr. WEEKS. I think the gentleman agrees with me.

Mr. REDFIELD. I think I do.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. REDFIELD. When I have finished my statement.

Mr. HILL. It is right on that point.

Mr. REDFIELD. Returning again to the facts illustrating the law of high wages and low labor cost per unit under proper conditions, the records of our railways are significant because through the sworn data of the Interstate Commerce Commission exact comparisons can be made with foreign costs which are in this great industry available.

Between 1889 and 1909 the wages of all kinds of labor and the prices of most commodities used by the railways and their taxes as well increased. Yet 27 per cent more service was rendered by the railways per dollar of earnings to the public in 1909 than in 1889, and 66 per cent more service per dollar of capitalization. Every dollar of capital invested in American railways rendered four and a half times as much as in Great Britain, three times as much as in France, two and a quarter times as much as in Switzerland, and one and a half times as much as in Germany. For every dollar of net earnings the railways of the United States rendered two and a half times as much service to our public as did those of the United Kingdom and twice as much as did those of France, and, as compared with the Swiss and German railways, those of the United States rendered from one and a quarter to one and a half times as much service to the public. In other words, paying much higher wages in this country than elsewhere the cost per unit of product which, in the case of railways, is ton-miles, is vastly less than is the cost for like services in any European country, whether under private or State management. A railway company manufactures ton-miles. Those are its units of product, and here and now they are with higher wages but with modern methods more than meeting the competition of foreigners in producing the same goods, and their low cost per unit of product has been worked out simultaneously with an increasing average rate of wage.

Mr. HILL. Right on that point. How will the gentleman explain this fact, that piecework, identical with that on the other side—and much of our manufacturing processes are being carried on by piecework—the piecework wages are from two and a half to four times as high in the United States on identically the same proposition. How does the efficiency of labor and the high wage affect the output under such circumstances where the work and the whole industry is carried on by piecework?

Mr. REDFIELD. The gentleman has opened up a very large subject. It is impossible to answer that question in a——

Mr. HILL. Just a moment—if the gentleman will pardon me, because I know he can have all the time he wants and I think gentlemen want to have this question elucidated and the gentleman is perfectly capable of doing it—I have in my office in the office building the trade-union agreement in England with manufacturers in a certain line of industry, signed and sealed by both parties, so there is no question about the rates of wages that are paid. It is an industry which is done entirely by piecework, a work that is done in the United States, in England, and in Germany by piecework, and those prices are from two and a half to four times as high in Dedham, England, as they are in the United States.

Mr. REDFIELD. You mean the reverse, do you not?

Mr. HILL. Yes. How will the gentleman explain the equal cost in the first place?

Mr. REDFIELD. In the first place, the manufacturer who carried on his business that way did not know it. No one could tell what the limiting conditions are, because that would be limited by its machinery, power, space, and a hundred elements that you can not describe offhand. But I have made goods in America by piecework for years and have sold them in Birmingham and Berlin against English and German competition. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. I can cite a case in the very business the gentleman is engaged in.

Mr. REDFIELD. I am glad you can, but you will do it in your time and not in mine. I simply say this, that I took the order myself in Germany for sewing-machine parts to be finished up there by a German sewing-machine manufacturer, and made them in Brooklyn and shipped them to Germany right along. And I took occasion the other day to ask the concern, with which I severed my connection some time ago, how they were doing in their export trade, and they said that they were doing better than ever. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I can not be responsible for the ignorance, bad location, and bad equipment of manufacturers. I am not dealing with that, nor do I favor a law which puts a premium upon those things because they look to Washington for their help. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let us turn now to what the textile manufacturers say for themselves and see whither that leads us, for to use the words of the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association in the Tariff Bulletin No. 2, dated June 24, 1911:

> The effect of general agitation and discussion of the subject must be both wholesome and effective.

On June 22 the secretary of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers mailed me the pamphlet written by Mr. Forstmann, to whom I have already referred, saying:

> You will note that Mr. Forstmann gives specific figures, showing that the labor cost of production is considerably greater in this country than in Germany. Are you prepared to affirm out of your own knowledge of the textile industry that the factor of labor cost is no higher in this country than in Europe?

I replied in part:

> Two statements made by Mr. Forstmann impress me. One is when he says that American textile machinery is inferior or unavailable. I had not supposed he would put it so strongly. If the facts are as he states them, it constitutes a serious handicap to the industry. It would seem to be mechanically backward.
> I am also impressed by what Mr. Forstmann says about the poor quality of labor in American woolen industry. This, if true, is so unlike labor conditions in other American industries as to arouse wonder. Why is it that after many decades of development there is no large supply of high-grade American labor in the woolen industry? Is it possibly because our woolen manufacturers have sought the cheap rather than the economical and have been looking for a low wage rate, supposing that meant low labor cost per unit of product?
> I think Mr. Forstmann has made a serious indictment of our woolen industry, and that our woolen manufacturers are chargeable with having to remedy these defects or explain them away before they can rightly call upon the people of the United States to pay taxes to support them. Public opinion will not sustain stretching the protective theory to make it cover negligent or incompetent management. It forms no righteous part of the tariff law that it indemnifies errors of location, faults in equipment, or the lack of scientific management.

I asked him also to—> give a full and clear statement of the costs of labor in each of, say, 10 different woolen or worsted mills which keep accurate and continuing scientific costs of the labor, material, burden, and selling expenses as related to each process of manufacture. Let it appear what the actual cost per unit of product is for each of the four classes of cost named in each department of each of these mills. Your statement also should show these same items of unit cost at periods for two or three years, that the tendency of cost may appear. Costs should, of course, be taken on goods of the same kind and weight, and on like quantities of each.

I asked him also to—> state the cost in a like number of English or German mills making the same goods in the same weight and in like quantities and to reckon it the same way; that is, against the labor, material, burden, and selling costs as apportioned to the one operation of weaving in an American mill, place the same information respecting foreign mills. As against the like costs found to exist in the operation of spinning in an American mill, place the information from an English or German mill, in each case comparing like with like in kind, weight, quality, and quantity, and so proceed throughout the manufacturing process. Unless and until this is done there can be no comparison. A mere statement of estimated cost is as absurd for purposes of taxation as it is for purposes of economy.

I asked:

> How many woolen and worsted mills keep an accurate and scientific statement of costs, continued from month to month, for unless such cost records exist no statement predicated on cost has serious value.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire if the gentleman has found in his investigation that scientific management has made greater advances in Europe than it has in the United States?

Mr. REDFIELD. I believe not. I believe it has advanced more here than there.

Mr. WEEKS. I am quite in accord with the gentleman in regard to the benefit to be obtained from scientific management.

Mr. REDFIELD. That it is advancing here more rapidly than in Europe is my understanding.

I pointed out to him that—> textile manufacturers have combined in a thorough and continuous study of fire insurance, so that in 60 years the cost of it has been reduced 90 per cent, being in 1910 less than one-tenth of what it was in the decade 1850–1860. Has it ever occurred to the woolen and worsted industries to put a like searching and continuous study upon their costs of production, and if not, why not?

To this last question no answer was made.

His reply I summarize as follows:

> At this very time the agents of the Tariff Board in Washington, with the active cooperation of many manufacturers, are securing full and clear statements of costs of production in representative American woolen and worsted mills. I can not give you these statements now, because they are not completed. They are particularly valuable because they are being made up according to a harmonious plan in every establishment. These memoranda are being drawn up for exact comparison with costs of production in English or German mills. European manufacturers have been exceedingly secretive about their labor costs, and we on this side have never been able to secure satisfactory statements from them. However, much of the information of this kind which we have lacked may now be forthcoming in the official reports of the Tariff Board.

A great many woolen and worsted mills keep an accurate statement of costs, but there is naturally a lack of uniformity among them as to methods. This question of costs has been receiving increased attention from woolen and worsted manufacturers in the past few years.

The wool manufacture, as you know, is a very complex industry, unlike many other industries in that under one roof are often carried on all the processes of preparation, beginning with the raw, unwashed wool and going up to the most costly finished fabrics. Manifestly it is very much more difficult to keep an exact record of costs in such an establishment than it is in a factory where virtually only one process is carried out. Nevertheless the woolen and worsted manufacturers have been alert to modern needs and have made great, satisfactory progress in this direction. The agents of the Tariff Board express their gratification with the completeness and precision of the information which the woolen and worsted mills are being able to furnish.

I know and rejoice in the achievements of some lines of American manufactures in the export trade. But you are doubtless aware of the fact that only a very small fraction of our total manufactured product is exported, and that many of our greatest industries have almost no share in export commerce at all. Our cotton-goods market abroad is very small and precarious, and there is practically no export of woolen goods, except small quantities of ready-made American clothes, and chiefly to Canada and Mexico, and sold there to young men and women who like to dress in the American style.

He attributes the relatively low wages to operatives in the wool manufacture to the special severity of English competition, and, referring me to Mr. Forstmann's comparative wage scale, says that American manufacturers are presumably paying all they can afford. He asserts that they have made the same careful study of their industry that others have made; and if they have not been able to develop an export trade, it is a fair assumption they have had to meet difficult conditions. He points out that some American textile machinery is used in Europe and suggests that the reason for the inferior development of our textile machinery may be due to the fact that the wool industry has been the special target of political attack, and that men of business have hesitated to pursue it on that account. He states that the wool men "believe with apparent good reason that their management on the whole is the best in the world," and closes with a statement from a New York importer complimentary to our woolen manufacturers, but having nothing to do with their mechanical equipment or their factory management, and adds:

The Democratic attack upon American wool manufacture is being delivered against one of the most modern and efficient of our national industries.

He corrects a mistake in my letter to him as to the date when the wool schedules under the Wilson bill went into effect, and adds:

The list of industries in which a notable export trade has been built up is still a relatively brief one.

And mentions machine tools, agricultural implements, building hardware, railway material and equipment, sewing machines, kerosene oil, and musical instruments of a few kinds.

I have summarized this correspondence to bring its essential points before you. It is all available to any inquirer.

We may be able to judge the accuracy of all the statements made by what is said about export trade. Referring to the statement that our cotton-goods market abroad is small and precarious, I find our export shipments of cotton manufactures in the year ending June 30, 1911, were $40,800,000, an increase of $7,400,000 over the previous two years, or over 20 per cent, much larger than in 1908 and 1907, and exceeded only in substantial amount by the two years 1905 and 1906, prior to which time there were no years in which exports of cotton manufactures were as large as in 1911. Some days ago, watching a civic procession in New England, I saw a sign upon the float of a maker of paper-mill machinery, reading:

We make no noise, but our machinery is now running in all parts of the world—China, Japan, Russia, Sweden, Denmark, Norway, Germany, France, England, all over the United States of America and Canada.

The official statistics of the American Iron & Steel Association for the year 1909 showed exports of iron and steel products amounting to $157,670,000, exceeding 1908 by $6,500,000. Those for the year ending June 30, 1911, were nearly $200,000,000, of which machinery forms a large part. Included in this item in 1909 were 13,800 stationary engines, 295 locomotives, 64 fire engines, 5,800 safes, 30,000 cash registers, 56,000 car wheels, 800 traction engines, and so forth.

I have a copy of the American Exporter in which are 174 pages occupied by advertisements of American manufacturers selling their goods abroad, and the publishers write:

Our service is an asset to 600 manufacturers, who use it to broaden their trade in other countries.

An editorial from Printers' Ink is so pertinent that I quote it:

What happens when American manufacturers with spunk stub their toes against a domestic setback and turn their eyes on foreign lines is illustrated by the automobile export record of the last few years. In 1908 only 2,477 cars were exported, whereas cars are at present moving outside of this country at the rate of 1,000 per month.

How can it be possible that this is true of England, France, and Germany, when they are large makers of automobiles and pay such low wages? [Applause.] But the statement of the Bureau of Statistics issued July 21 is conclusive on this matter. For the fiscal year just closed our exports increased $304,000,000; of this increase manufactures were $140,000,000. The bureau adds:

The increase in manufactures is apparent in a large number of articles. Agricultural implements as a whole show an increase of about $8,000,000; mowers and reapers alone about $5,000,000; plows and cultivators about two and one-half millions; iron and steel manufactures as a whole an increase of about $47,000,000, while the details of iron and steel show for sheets and plates about $4,000,000 increase; structural iron and steel about $3,000,000; metal-working machinery about $5,000,000; wire about $2,000,000; electrical machinery about $2,000,000; mining machinery nearly $2,000,000; locomotives over a million; traction engines more than a million; automobiles show a gain of about $3,000,000; railway cars about $4,000,000; electrical appliances about $2,000,000.

Of our total exports, manufactured goods form in all 44.16 per cent, being taken as a whole—the largest item of export. The next is "crude materials for use in manufacturing," which is 36.58 per cent. These two make 80 per cent of our exports, foodstuffs being 19 per cent. So recently as 1880 our exports of manufacture were but 15 per cent of all. They are three times that now and growing. Their aggregate amount in the year just ended was over $827,000,000. Surely, how much our factories need protection. [Applause on the Republican side.] Against whom? Our own customers? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

A house in New York specializes in wearing apparel and furnishing goods for men and women for export, including such lines for men as negligee and work shirts, neckwear, belts and suspenders, collars, underwear, hosiery, caps, and overalls, and for women, hats, skirts, blouses, petticoats, and so forth, with a line of children's dresses. The proprietor says he has been able to demonstrate to foreign buyers that the lines enumerated are the equals, if not the superiors, of any similar goods made in Europe, and "when opportunity has been had to submit prices orders have resulted in spite of the strongest kind of competition."

In the month of April I was dining with a man, who was an American and manager of some large English interests, at the Hotel Langham, London, and he told me a good joke upon himself. He is interested in some Chilean railways, and when the question of material and supplies for the road arose shortly he made a strong bid to get half of the goods to be bought in America, and he succeeded in this respect, that they got the equipment and the supplies bought in America, but the English people insisted that the rails should be bought in England, and he had to yield. He received a report from the receiving department in Chile, however, a few months later, to the effect that the rails that were thus bought in London were marked "Pittsburg, Pa." [Applause.]

From the advertisements of Thos. Potter, Sons & Co., oilcloth manufacturers—protected 3 cents per square yard plus 20 per cent—I read:

April, 1908: A considerable shipment of Potter's table oilcloth to Amsterdam, Holland, in the face of the established English competition, illustrates that business for American goods can be had in any market. Practically the same situation exists in Australia, which buys annually a large yardage of Potter's table oilcloth.

September, 1908: Enamel goods of the Potter brand are the subject of numerous inquiries from carriage and automobile makers in various parts of the country and abroad.

A larger consignment than usual was shipped to Buenos Aires, Argentina, a few weeks ago.

October, 1908: The demand for Potter goods in Mexico, Panama, Hawaiian Islands, Australia, and India this season far exceeds that of any previous year.

November, 1908: Given a product that justifies its reputation, American goods find a market in any part of the world.

Potter goods have a steady and growing market in England and her dependencies, the shipments including all items of the Potter line.

It is a very interesting fact to me to know that in Worcester, Mass., there is a factory making corsets—I shall refer to that factory later on—which advertises openly that its goods are sold in 50 different countries.

In the Exporters and Importers' Journal for April 15, 1911, are 45 pages of 3 columns each devoted to detailed prices with illustrations of American goods for export, among which are neckwear, ladies' and misses' wash suits, trunks, furniture, cutlery, desks, cut glass, gasoline engines, lanterns, and other lines. The secretary of the wool association does not accurately express the facts respecting American export trade, and it is reaffirmed that this showing of American export manufacturers is a further evidence that not in few, but in many and increasing lines, American makers are in the markets of the world able to hold their own.

It is a great satisfaction to me to know that on the cotton gin manufactured by friends in Texas and operating on the Czar of Russia's private plantation in the heart of Turkestan are certain fans and boilers of my own manufacture which are transporting cotton. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This is in spite of the heavy handicap imposed upon American manufacturers by our tariff in raising prices of their materials. With this removed our exports could be doubled.

That statement is not my own. It is a statement made to me within a fortnight by one of the largest manufacturers of machinery. It is not labor costs which hold our exports back but material costs. The lines in which our splendid export trade exist are, many of them, those on which the rate of wages is relatively high.

Before discussing the reference made by the National Association of Wool Manufacturers to the Tariff Board and the results to be expected from the latter, let us look at our wool industries as they are described by two others of its exponents. Referring again to the pamphlet entitled "The Wool Manufacture in America and Europe," I quote from page 6:

When establishing our enterprise we were obliged, in order to be able to compete, not only as to price but also with respect to quality and technical perfection, with the best European mills, to import most of our machinery, because a great deal of American spinning, weaving, dyeing, and finishing machinery is not yet so highly developed as the European. This is especially true of the machinery used in what is known as the French system of worsted spinning, which is being adopted more and more each year. Also our entire woolen spinning machinery had to be imported.

A great part of our looms could be bought here, while others had to be imported on account of special requirements; but those purchased in this country were nearly as expensive as the imported ones, so that in buying them we had to bear our share of the protection of the textile machinery of this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield to my colleague another hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] is recognized for another hour.

Mr. REDFIELD. But those purchased in this country were nearly as expensive as the imported ones. I quote further:

Dyeing and finishing machinery used in our mill also had to be imported. In general, American manufacturers can buy domestic woolen and worsted machinery somewhat, but not very much, cheaper than imported machinery; but as the manufacture of woolen and worsted machinery, like the woolen industry itself, is younger and very much less developed in this country than Europe, such domestic machinery, especially that used for the production of finer goods, has not the same efficiency as the European, and consequently proves more costly in the long run.

I also quote from page 9:

The operatives in American woolen mills, in spite of the very much higher wages paid, are largely drawn from the ranks of unskilled labor. And whence does this unskilled labor come? There is little of it among native-born Americans. It is taken from the steady flow of immigrants into this country.

This same complaint about inefficient help comes from Philadelphia and from the southern mills. They should go to Worcester, Mass., to a corset factory employing 1,500 hands, mostly girls, of which a recent writer says:

One notices that all the employees—even the very youngest girls—show unusual intelligence, and the thought automatically suggests itself that this must be an unusually desirable place in which to work, a place workers would seek, a place which would not need to hunt for help when needed. On inquiry, we learn that there is usually a "waiting list" of applicants for work in the factory, and these the most desirable workers in a city of nearly 150,000 inhabitants.

The girls in that mill earn from $9 to $15 a week. That is the mill which I mentioned before as exporting its products to 50 different countries. And it is located only 40 to 50 miles from woolen mills that complain that they can not get sufficient help in America. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On page 2711 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for July 1, in the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES], I find the statement:

Nine-tenths of the worsted-spinning machinery is imported, because there is only one manufacturer of that class of machinery in this country.

And also the following statements:

In the woolen industry in Massachusetts there are 38,000 men and women, of whom 5,000 have native fathers, 33,000 have foreign fathers, so that 87 per cent are of foreign parentage or foreign born.

They come from Ireland, Canada, England, Germany, Scandinavia, Italy, Poland, Russia, Australia, and Scotland.

In the cotton business there are 89,000 men and women employed. Of these 7,000 had native fathers, while 82,000 were of foreign parentage. In other words, 92 per cent were foreign born or of foreign parentage.

Both these authorities admit that the American supply of textile machinery is not sufficient and not of the best quality. It would seem desirable, therefore, to remove the duty on such machinery, since it has failed to produce the manufacture of it in this country and is a heavy burden on our textile mills. Both these authorities also concede that the labor in our woolen mills is not American in its composition, but foreign, and that it is inefficient and therefore costly.

Mr. WEEKS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. REDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. Does that statement as to textile material apply to cotton machinery?

Mr. REDFIELD. Not to so great a degree.

Mr. WEEKS. Does it apply at all to cotton machinery?

Mr. REDFIELD. Not to so great a degree; not by any means. I shall be glad to go into that later on. It seems to me, on the statement of the woolen manufacturers themselves, that their industry is mechanically backward. It is, to use a colloquial phrase, 30 years behind the day, mechanically.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. AMES] asks in his speech: "Is it not absurd to suppose that crossing the water changes a man's efficiency." Surely; but methods differ. And that reminds me of a story. On this steamer that I mentioned coming from India was a large manufacturer of leather goods from the city of Philadelphia. He related the incident that on one occasion two young men who were leather finishers, we will say—I am not sure about the process, but it was a hand process in the manufacture of leather—two young Englishmen applied to him for employment, and he happened to go with them out in the mill where the work was done. He said he would be glad to take them on if they could do the regular stint of work. "Well," they said, "how many is that?" He said, "One hundred and twenty a day." "No, no," they said; "no man could do that and live." They had been accustomed to doing 50 a day in England, and that is all they could do, and all they thought any man could do. "Well," said the proprietor, "I am a practical leather man, and I will show you." And he took his brush there and worked an hour to illustrate, and when he had got done he found he had been working at the rate of 150 a day, and the two young men left because they were not willing to work up to the American standard of production.

I had the pleasure of spending the 14th instant in the mill managed by Mr. Forstmann, from whose pamphlet I have quoted. It is a large well-arranged mill, with modern equipment, good supervision, and, apparently, a good system of cost keeping. It is sharply differentiated from other worsted industries in making a class of goods of exceptionally high quality for men's and women's wear. Mr. Forstmann was told he could not succeed in making that class of goods in this country. He established his first mill in 1905 and has succeeded so well that about 18 months ago he put a second large mill in operation. He could not find American machinery suited for the peculiarly high class of goods, of which he seems to be the only, or almost the only, maker in the country, and his machines therefore chiefly are of German manufacture, some of English and French. In the purchase of these machines the tariff hit him hard, for he has paid over $500,000 in duties upon machinery alone. He says such machinery could not be bought here at all. He is handicapped also as compared with his German competitors, for he has few, if any, competitors in this country, by having to pay about 40 per cent more for his raw material than the Germans do. He said to me repeatedly that a most serious handicap was the prejudice on the part of customers for high-class goods in favor of imported goods; that he found it difficult, sometimes impossible, to overcome this prejudice. That Mr. Forstmann has succeeded under these handicaps is a tribute to his exceptional skill and power. His particular industry is not typical of the worsted industry, because he makes a more expensive type of goods, and he has been established but a short time, not long enough even to have a firm market for his products, because of the prejudice stated. He complained of his inefficient labor. It is almost all foreign-born and certainly not efficient. If I were to criticize a courteous host and an able man, I should say the weak spot in his management was on the labor side. If this were brought up to the high level of equipment and arrangement I think his need of a tariff would be small. I told him that what he needed in his business was less tariff and more Forstmann. [Laughter.]

While he could probably do nothing else at the start under his conditions than purchase foreign machinery, I told him, and believe it is true, that our machinery makers would agree, if given an opportunity and a fair chance at all his business, to equip him as time went on with American machinery, designed and manufactured for his service, equal or superior to the best foreign make, and finally I pointed out to Mr. Forstmann that I believed he was being used by other woolen manufacturers differently circumstanced to cover their inefficiency behind his exceptional circumstances and difficulties. It is fair to say that Mr. Forstmann did not come here for his health, but undoubtedly established his mill because the tariff permitted him to make a profit, and that his success is evinced by the erection recently of his second large mill. It is also right to say that other woolen manufacturers not far from him take a pride in the very high quality of labor, which Mr. Forstmann says he can not obtain. But it is an extraordinary condition of our law that it promotes such price for cloth to use as clothing as will permit a manufacturer to pay (as he says) 55 per cent more for his buildings, $500,000 more for his plant, 40 per cent more for his raw material than is the case in Germany, and with inefficient labor to boot, to still make a profit out of us.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, whom I have quoted above, stated in his address that—a woolen manufacturer, whom he cites as having a prosperous mill, made but 3¼ per cent, without counting in a charge for interest on the money invested in the plant—

And states that this is true of 99 out of 100 mills engaged in that industry. He says—that if their money had been placed in a savings bank those manufacturers could have sat idly by and twirled their thumbs and gotten more out of their investment than by working every day in the year.

It is a great pity that the Nation should be taxed that those woolen manufacturers should suffer in this way. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] If the net result of 50 years of high protection has been the absence of adequate and sufficient American machinery, the presence of an inefficient foreign labor force, and earnings of 3 to 18 per cent, then on the statement of the wool manufacturers themselves, protection has failed. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If this is to continue, they might indeed better close their mills, let their people seek more lucrative employment, allow us to buy our woolen goods where we can get them most cheaply, and profit themselves by putting their money in the savings bank, as the gentleman from Massachusetts suggests. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Yet I note discords in this sad harmony. Mr. Forstmann built a large new mill, and in the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts it is admitted that the American Woolen Co. claim to earn 9 per cent, and they have built two large new mills. Yet taking the statements made on this floor as a manufacturer by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and by the exponent of the Wool Association from New Jersey, it is conceded both that their industry has not built up an efficient working force and has not been able to develop a supply of adequate apparatus made at home. In this respect, and apparently in its earning power, it differs from other great manufacturing interests of the country. At the very time when our exports of manufactures have reached a point hitherto unknown and are still expanding, when the products of our factories are found around the wide earth, here rises up one of our oldest industries, nurtured by the law from our earliest days, for a bounty of 25 per cent was paid on textiles in Massachusetts as long ago as 1640, to say that it, and almost it alone, is feeble and needs the strong arm of taxation to support it.

But the record of all our textiles is not as bad as that of the worsted and woolen manufacturers.

I intended at this point to state the dividends, surpluses, and replacement values of some of our cotton-manufacturing companies.

That question of replacement values is very interesting. You will find a number of cotton plants in New England showing, let us say, a valuation on machinery of half a million dollars, and a statement made by their bankers here that the replacement value is two and a half million dollars. Somebody has been putting away a hidden reserve. Somebody has been making low valuations on machinery. There are several very interesting cases of that kind. It is a perfectly proper proceeding, so far as I know.

But I find a statement in the July circular of bankers dealing in industrial stocks that expresses the situation so sweetly that I prefer to use their words:

The past year has been a period of great financial uncertainty and of great depression in the manufacturing industries of the country. When we look back over the record of the stocks which we have offered to investors during this time it is very gratifying to see how their dividends have been maintained, and in many cases additions made to surplus accounts, while in a few instances the stocks have advanced to the highest prices at which they have sold in their history, and this record has been made in the face of falling prices for other securities.

At the present time investors are looking carefully into the dividend record of their investments and the safety of principal. We feel that the record of the mills we advise for investment this month is unique, and we especially wish to call attention to the date of the formation of each company. When you stop to think that mills which have paid dividends continuously for 35 to 40 years, have been through periods of panic and great stress many times, you must realize why we consider their stocks the most seasoned of securities. (Tefft & Co., New York City, N. Y.)

[Laughter on the Democratic side.]

There is here no evidence of poverty, nor is the mechanical end of the cotton industry as backward as that of the woolen mills is said to be.

From Cotton Chats, published by the Draper Co., I take the statement that in one mill with over 1,500 looms the weavers run from 16 to 32 looms each of the Northrop automatic type; in another mill, having both the Northrop and the common looms, the following facts exist:

They have 500 common looms, operated by 50 weavers; production, 87 per cent. On practically the same number of Northrop looms they had but 20 weavers; production, 97 per cent. There were three and one-half times as many seconds made on the common looms as on the Northrop.

Now, the Northrop loom is only adapted to certain kinds of goods, but I point out to you that where it is in use, in the same mill, the product is 97 per cent of the theoretical capacity of the loom, and with much fewer defective goods; whereas on the common loom the product is 87 per cent, with three and one-half times as many defective goods. And I say to you, gentlemen of the Democratic Party, that it ought to be shown here, when a cotton mill claims protection, whether it is in the 87 per cent and the bad class or whether it is in the 97 per cent and the good class, for it is no part of your duty to make good deficiencies in equipment. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Forstmann said that in his worsted mills the production was but 65 per cent of the theoretical loom capacity, but in German mills it was 85 per cent. The difference lay in the inefficient labor.

Another cotton mill claimed to be getting a production of 104 to 108 per cent of the theoretical capacity of their looms by running the automatic looms through the noon hour. In another mill 9 weavers were running 36 looms each. In another "a weaver on one common loom" made a cut of cloth at a weaving cost of $1.50; on improved looms, they were "getting better goods for 15 cents per cut," and, finally, it is stated that by reason of the greater efficiency of the more modern loom over the common type "this additional product either reduces the labor cost of weaving or increases the weaver's pay, or both." The words are those of the Draper Co., large makers of textile machinery.

On the subject of efficiency of labor in cotton mills, Gen. William F. Draper, himself a large manufacturer of cotton machinery and owner in cotton mills, once a Member of this House, tells the following story: When in England he asked a cotton manufacturer there why he did not use the Northrop looms, which Gen. Draper's concern makes. The Englishman asked him to go with him to his mill. He did so, and the English manufacturer showed him some cloth on the inspection board and asked Gen. Draper if they made cloth of as good quality on the Northrop looms. Gen. Draper said they did not, and to the question "Why?" replied, "Because we have not the mill discipline."

Mr. H. L. Gantt, in his recent book, Work, Wages, and Profits, tells his experience in a cotton mill. After establishing an accurate cost system and training the workers in their duties, it was found that the average wages of the workers increased 40 per cent. The product increased 80 per cent, and the labor cost per piece was but 60 per cent of what it had been, and there were other savings. On the whole, it would seem that the cotton industry is not in that low state the wool men by their own statements occupy, and that by supplying that mill discipline which Gen. Draper said was lacking and which in one mill Mr. Gantt established, they should be able to get along profitably with a much smaller tax upon the public.

Perhaps our textile people want more self-help and less boosting. In Denmark farmers raise an average of 42 bushels of wheat per acre on soil cultivated for 1,000 years. We, I think, hardly reach half that, yet no one believes the Dane an abler and better farmer than the American can be, or thinks that when the latter is aroused to the need of intensive farming he will not excel. The remedy would not be to tax American food on the basis of Danish cost, but to grow more here. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, let us turn to the Tariff Board. The American Protective Tariff League does not think well of it. On January 26 last it said:

We are unable to discover any valid reason for the existence of a permanent tariff board or commission. The effort to obtain facts as to production cost has signally failed, and in the nature of things must fail. This fact stands virtually admitted by the most ardent supporters of the tariff-commission scheme. Production cost in our own country is so widely variant as to be of little value, even if it could be accurately ascertained, while the impossibility of either inducing or compelling foreign competitors to disclose the truth as to their production cost is so entirely obvious that any effort in that direction would be time and money wasted.

One notices here the conflict between the Republican platform of 1908 and the Protective Tariff League. One urges the difference in cost as the basis for the tariff; the other says production cost is of little value, "even if it could be accurately ascertained." So let us inquire about the Tariff Board, who compose it, what its scope is, what has been done, and what are its limitations? We may then learn the value to be placed upon it.

The board is composed of 5 eminent gentlemen—2 of them economists, 1 a publisher of an agricultural journal, 1 a former officer in the Treasury, familar with tariffs, and 1 for 14 years a Member of this House and in the last Congress a member of its Foreign Relations Committee. The two economists were professors in Yale University and in the University of Virginia, respectively. It does not reflect upon the ability or character of these gentlemen to say that none of them seem to have had practical manufacturing experience. It is one thing to know a great deal about a subject, but it is another and a very different thing to have lived for years in the very handling of that subject, and to have learned by daily contact with it not so much things about it as the life of the subject itself, thus becoming able to grasp not merely the statistics concerning the subject but the deeper facts that lie behind figures and give rise to statistics. The Tariff Board can not speak from personal knowledge of the facts it presents. It must transmit what it receives. It must learn from others both facts and their relations, and this will be a limitation upon its work so long as its organization is of the present character.

The scope of the work of this board covers nothing else than an examination into the details of all American industries. They are charged to make "investigation of the cost of production of commodities covering cost of material, fabrication, and every other element of such cost of production." This is a large order, the word "commodities" itself is rather comprehensive, and to "investigate every element of the cost of production" is a serious task. A modern authority says:

No one man in the space of life allowed to him for preparatory work can assimilate complete knowledge of all the functions of a business.

Many an able man in the limited scope of his own business has for years striven to investigate "every element of the cost of production" without full success. There were 533,000 American factories in 1905, with a capital of about $14,000,000,000, and 6,700,000 employees paid over $3,600,000,000, making a yearly product of over $16,000,000,000. The task of the Interstate Commerce Commission is small compared with that of the Tariff Board, for though the railways have almost as much capital as the industries, they have but 1,500,000 employees and, compared to the infinite variety of products and processes in manufactures, the railroads' business is simple. The secretary of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers says "the wool manufacture, as you know, is a very complex industry," and there are others, but the scope of our Tariff Board covers them all.

Yet this is but half the task. Comparison must be made with the industries of all great industrial nations. Three times in one year I went the length and breadth of Great Britain among its manufacturing districts. It would be a serious task to study and report on the industries of that one nation, but that alone is not sufficient, for Germany and France, at least, must be investigated ere the work of the Tariff Board is complete. There is some reasonableness in what the American Protective Tariff League said in the quotation just made.

But not only is a colossal task set for the Tariff Board, but it must be done with peculiar care. The taxation of 90,000,000 people is to be based on it. The revenue of our Government is involved. Some say the prosperity of our manufacturers and the wages of our workingmen are dependent on it. The necessity, therefore, for accuracy and clearness is imperative and also the need for freedom from interested influences, from guidance by those who are to be beneficiaries, perhaps, of the taxes to follow. Here is no place for partiality, incompleteness, or approximations. The sincerity of the gentlemen forming the Tariff Board is not questioned, nor their ability nor their desire to serve the public. Indeed it may possibly do good to have their inquiries proceed, but it is too much to expect that their reports shall have serious value as a basis for taxation, for this is against the very nature of things. The cost of production is not a thing on which a tariff tax can be based. I do not wish to do the Tariff Board an injustice or to minimize their work. I think, however, more is expected from them than it is humanly possible to supply and that their very name is a misnomer.

But the Tariff Board is indorsed by the President of the United States in a message to this House, and the National Tariff Commission Association, comprised in large part of manufacturers, has approved it. The National Association of Wool Manufacturers refer me to it for information, yet with this limiting clause:

European manufacturers have been exceedingly secretive about their labor costs and we on our side have never been able to secure satisfactory statements from them. However, much of the information of this kind which we lack may now be forthcoming in the official reports of the Tariff Board.

The naive confession in the quotation that our woolen manufacturers have not known European costs is amusing, but why the reference to labor cost alone?

We are told manufacturers are cooperating with the Tariff Board, and that the latter have expressed gratification at "the completeness and precision of the information which the woolen and worsted mills are being able to furnish." Our hopes are not quickened by this harmony among the manufacturers. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] They are little likely to do themselves harm, and after their experience in fooling committees of Congress in the past the Tariff Board must indeed be wily and acute to steer its course straight. And here I remind the Tariff Board that figures are but the expression of facts and the statistical results in a mill may or may not be conclusive about that mill. The real facts lie behind and often can not be revealed, because the mill management is itself unconscious of them. Yet they may be, and often are, controlling facts as well as removable or manageable facts. For example, as a recent writer truly says:

Many industrial plants are seriously handicapped through the fact that the arrangement of their departments and equipment imposes operating expenses that are almost prohibitive.

We do not want to base a tariff on costs like that. Let us know, then, the conditions of cost, the causes of cost, that Congress may discriminate. If a tariff is to be based on costs, the prime factors operating to make costs must be made clear, else the cost itself merely misleads.

We are glad to know the Tariff Board are not undertaking all their duties at once. They are, papers sent by the President assure us, confining themselves to Schedules M, paper and pulp; A, chemicals; I, cotton manufactures; and K, woolens and worsteds; or 4 out of 14 schedules, together with a glossary covering 12 schedules, which, the President says, "will be a mine of information for Congress and the people on all statistical subjects relating to the tariff." We are glad the Tariff Board is undertaking no more now, and as respects the glossary, which will translate the tariff into plain English, this will be as welcome to the Democratic Party as it may prove inconvenient to some manufacturers. [Laughter.]

We can, however, judge the services of the Tariff Board in their relations to taxation by their report entitled the "Pulp and News-print Paper Industry" (S. Doc. No. 31), of which the report sent by the President says it "can properly be regarded as a specimen of the work which the board can accomplish." Let us look at this pamphlet. The papers sent by the President say:

The essence of it is contained in Tables 4 and 5, on page 28, and in Table 17, on page 52.

And that—the facts contained in these tables afford a sounder basis for intelligent action by Congress than has ever heretofore been available, although the report is replete from beginning to end with useful and enlightening data.

Recalling that the American Protective Tariff League said, on January 26 last, "production cost in our own country is so widely variant as to be of little value," we note with interest the further statement that "one of the significant facts brought out is the wide discrepancy in plant efficiency." But how can it be said that this discrepancy in plant efficiency is brought out by this report when the American Protective Tariff League four months earlier pointed out the variation in cost, a commonplace fact known to every cost keeper and thoughtful manufacturer. The report sent us by the President suggests that—this should have a wholesome influence in stimulating all owners of plants of low efficiency to secure the obvious benefits to be obtained by conforming them to the best modern practice.

This is true, but the manufacturers knew it before, and every manufacturer with sense has known it for years. The manufacturer having a plant of low efficiency who does not know that the benefits of modern practice were obvious would be a curiosity. The stimulus to improve his plant are his own high costs and consequent lack of sales or profits. Technical papers have for years been full in almost every line of industry of the importance of modern and efficient equipment and the need of watching and reducing costs. There are publications devoted to the science of costs. The statement which the President sends us is the merest truism, and the facts behind it neither were brought out for the first time by the Tariff Board nor are confined to the particular industry of which it has treated, nor are they clear now. We are not told the causes of these facts and the cause is the essential thing. What is here said has been as obvious and as well known in the manufacturing world as that 2 and 2 make 4.

The report through the President would have been more accurate had he said that this particular report made it clear that it will be impossible to base a tariff upon such facts. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Four of the tables which are said to contain the "essence of this report" show that in making ground wood pulp manufacturing labor varies in cost per ton of product from 98 cents to $5.90; that what are called "other costs" vary from 30 cents per ton to $6.83 per ton; and that material cost—that is, wood—varies per ton from $6.90 to $13.33. Similar facts are shown about sulphite fiber and news-print paper, and while labor in making sulphite fiber varies in cost from $2.09 a ton to $6.51 a ton, in making news-print paper it varies from $2.19 a ton to $7.26 a ton, in both cases showing a variation in the single item of labor cost of over 300 per cent. An average is shown in the tables, but what use is it? You can not fix a tax on an average, for in so doing you pay a bonus on all below it, and if protection be sought you do not get it for those above the average. How in the name of common sense are these facts available as a basis for taxation? Will you base your tax on the lowest cost? Then what becomes of your protective theory for those working at the higher cost? For it may well be that your element of lowest cost comes in some one mill well located, equipped, and managed, and to take its cost as the basis might, from the protective theory, close up the other mills, force them to sell out, and create a trust. Contrariwise, if you base your tax upon the highest cost, you may be putting a premium on inefficiency and taxing the Nation for incompetency. In all sincerity, I can not see that the table named takes the least step toward enlightening Congress as to how to base a tariff tax on the country. It seems to me to show plainly that a tariff tax based on the cost of production is ridiculous. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is an interesting piece of clerical work; it is no more. It contributes nothing to the science of costs.

Turn now to Table 5, to which the report from the President refers. In it the lowest cost of ground wood pulp (under $10 per ton) is confined to two establishments, while 22 operate at a cost of from $16 to $20 a ton. Similar facts appear respecting sulphite fiber and news-print paper. Table 6 deals with the labor cost, and the minimum of 98 cents per ton in ground wood pulp appears in but one establishment, while 16 operate at a labor cost from $1.50 to $2, and 11 have a labor cost of $2.50 to $3, and others higher. Similar facts exist in sulphite fiber and news-print paper. The report shows that the variations in labor cost are principally due to change in available water power, and in this and other respects may make clearer, perhaps, to the country what the Democratic Party urges, viz, that the cost of production has so many varying, conflicting, and complex elements that it is an absurdity to make it a basis of a tariff tax.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REDFIELD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LENROOT. I will ask the gentleman whether the amount of revenue to be derived from any given duty does not depend to a large extent upon the domestic cost of the production of that commodity?

Mr. REDFIELD. I do not know why it should necessarily; it may or it may not.

Mr. LENROOT. In other words, if the revenue duty be in excess of the difference in the cost of production between foreign and domestic, does it not become prohibitive?

Mr. REDFIELD. Yes.

Nor does the table on page 17, to which the report from the President refers, help. It shows the "efficiency of labor by paper machines of given sizes and capacities" and these vary from 82 cents per ton minimum to $1.84 per ton maximum, or over 120 per cent on a single operation in the manufacture of paper. What does this do but emphasize the absurdity of a fixed tariff on a variable cost? Truly one begins to realize why the American Protective Tariff League is not interested in production cost, because the more that is known about it the more candid men see that the only logical basis of tariff taxation is one that takes into account chiefly the revenue to be derived from it. If the papers sent us by the President indorse the Tariff Board in showing the tariff plank of the Republican platform of 1908 to be absurd, then we concur with him, for it has done just that.

But the Tariff Board do not know and can not show certain fundamental facts going deeper than their figures. Every one of the costs they have given must change. Any one of them may have changed before their report was printed; there is no assurance that the facts are to-day as they were on May 15. To one backward mill has come an able manager perhaps and its costs have gone down; the skillful head of an efficient mill has died and its costs have gone up. Management is a controlling factor in industries. In another mill a master mechanic has invented something, and by its use the costs are altered. It is altogether probable that in the most efficient mill the costs are lower than they were because their present efficiency is a measure of their ability to add to that efficiency. The whole thing is and must be in a state of flux, and one or more of the different classes shown in the tables may already have ceased to exist.

Take a simple illustration: Let each of the costs ascertained by the Tariff Board be represented by a little block such as children use to play with; set these blocks in a row upon the table in the Ways and Means Committee room in the order they occupy in the Tariff Board's report; gather about the table and proceed to base your tariff tax upon them. But wait, for while you are taking your seats the blocks commence to move among themselves and by the time you have discussed No. 1 it has moved in between Nos. 3 and 4, and No. 5 has become No. 1, and Nos. 10 and 12 have ceased to exist at all, or a new number has come in at the farther end, and you have before you a dancing series of costs, so to speak. "Where are you at?" This represents what the American Protective Tariff League meant when they said, "Cost is widely variant." To take an example from current business: Would a cost on cotton yarn taken from a Tariff Board report based on costs to-day be fair with cotton at its recent price, or would you take your cost next year based on a bumper crop, and would either have value unless you knew conditions?

At best the report of the Tariff Board can only be a preliminary one of progress—rather like one scene in a vitagraph show. A worsted manufacturer who has furnished them data told me that to make the report exhaustive would require five years. I have looked over the blank forms used by the Tariff Board in its investigation of the wool and worsted and the cotton industries; they are complete so far as to show the facts of record, but lack precisely the element which it is essential to have and which the Tariff Board can not get, viz, those controlling factors which are not and can not be recorded. In any industry the personality of the management is felt all through the mills; its prejudices, its weakness, its strength, are reflected through the enterprise. There are cases where personal power has made good defects in equipment and methods; but in several mills reported by the Tariff Board how can they show the action of this force? It may be the chief factor, but it is not a factor of record. I know of two such cases. In one a man who had accomplished great results was for other reasons allowed to go, and the costs of those two mills sprang upward with his going. In the other the man went to another large works, and with his advent the costs began going down.

Take some examples from life:

Two woolen mills are located not far apart. One takes pride in the character and efficiency of its working force, speaks of it with enthusiasm, but keeps no costs and is badly equipped; the other has an accurate system of costs and fine equipment, but complains it is seriously handicapped by the inefficiency of the working force. One mill is scientifically planned; the other is an accident. Again, two large mills pursue one of their leading processes in different ways; from it one saves a large by-product, paying the entire cost of the process; the other says it does not pay to do so. In another shop the policy is adopted of a man to two machines, running same slowly to save repairs and keep down labor; in its competitive shop on the same work two men are running one machine, which is designed and made as perfectly as possible and speeded to full limit. Here is a radical difference in policy of carrying on the same process.

If the cost of production is to be made the basis for the tariff, then the tendency of that cost should appear. Suppose the labor cost of a yard of cloth is stated at 50 cents; that means one thing if it is the upward end of a series reading 40, 45, 50, and another thing if it is the downward end of the series, 60, 55, 50, and still another thing if it has run along for one or more years at just 50 cents. It is an axiom that "Costs can not be charged on a basis of a short period." Therefore the Tariff Board, to give an intelligent picture of an industry, should show its past as well as its present and in some practical way indicate it future. This they have not done, and I doubt if it is feasible to do it.

It is essential also that in judging of costs one should know what the relative efficiency of the management is, as shown, for example, in such matter as stoppages of machinery. In a southern cotton mill they got as high as 104 and 108 per cent of the theoretical capacity of an automatic loom; in a northern mill they got 87 per cent. The owner of a large woolen mill told me that the best his business permitted was 65 per cent. From the point of view of taxation it should be shown not so much whether 65 per cent was the fact, as it doubtless was, but whether that fact could not be improved, for we have no business to base a tariff on a policy which may be inefficient. I do not find in the blank forms used by the Tariff Board anything that covers factors of this character.

Nor do I find in their forms any call for facts from the second and third parties in interest of whom I spoke at first, viz, the workers and consumers. And I submit that no industry can be fairly judged on statements made by the owners and managers alone. There have been mills and times where and when the workers' point of view did not at all agree with that of the owners, and the workers have as intimate knowledge of many details of mill operation as anyone. I think it is a defect of the report upon the pulp and news-print-paper industry that no one speaks in or through it for the workers in those mills. What they have to say might alter the looks of things or change the relations of facts, and if the Tariff Board shall report upon the wool and worsted industries without reflecting facts submitted by those who represent the workers in the mills, or those who buy the goods made by the mills, it will be partial and perhaps misleading. It is the owner's business by means of the worker to supply the consumer, and no true picture of the industry can omit the viewpoint of each. A tax based upon any one of the changing items of cost might sadly affect the consumer, and it may be found that another of the statements of cost was inconsistent with the health or the reasonable comfort of the worker. Congress should know all that, and it all forms part of the charge upon the Tariff Board to consider "every element of production."

I do not find in the blank forms of the Tariff Board any provision whereby it can be shown whether separate departments or processes in a textile mill pay a profit or make a loss, yet to this very end does modern accounting point. Nor do I see how a manufacturer can direct his economies with the best intelligence until this is known. If in a mill four operations pay and two do not, clearly attention should be put on the two. If one does not know that these two exist in this condition, he can not directly economize on them. Yet we should not want to pay a tariff tax based on his costs if the latter by proper accounting could be corrected.

This leads to the one service the Tariff Board have rendered, viz, that of teaching manufacturers the necessity of keeping costs and how to keep them, for they have discovered that many manufacturers have no cost system and that their statements of cost have been guesses. Their eyes are opened by the forms the Tariff Board use, and they have in some measure adopted these forms for future use. This has real value to industry, but it is a far step from it to basing a tariff tax upon what these costs shall come to be when the manufacturers learn how to keep them. Meanwhile, how shall the Tariff Board convey to you and me that which the manufacturers do not know themselves? Again, among the factors affecting costs are such matters as location, the character and arrangement of buildings, their lighting, the proper routing within the mill, methods of transporting goods, and so forth. The report of the Tariff Board will be incomplete unless accompanied by explanations as to how far in actual cases these factors have influence. A company had two mills on opposite sides of a river. It cost a good deal to haul the goods back and forth. One day a trolley overhead conveyer was erected, and this cost nearly disappeared. We do not want to base tariffs on elements of cost that may be or have been evolved out of existence.

Nor will it be sufficient that the Tariff Board show to us that goods of the same weight, width, and character cost so much made in this country and so much abroad. It will be necessary to show that the quantities made at the time these costs were taken were alike, and also that the mills were alike in equipment, management, and other conditions affecting cost. A comparison made between an American mill badly located as respects power, transportation, with poor equipment and inefficient labor, can not properly be compared with a foreign mill superior in these respects, unless it is shown that none of these conditions are alterable. And if the conditions in the foreign and domestic mills, whose goods are thus compared, are unlike as to burden costs, this should also be shown. It is customary in our factories to distribute burden cost so as to place it where it is most easily borne. Conditions frequently make it impracticable to charge its full share of burden to one line of goods, so the burden is apportioned, and a lighter share is put upon one line and a heavier elsewhere. The report of the Tariff Board should, of course, determine where such factors exist and to what extent, else a tariff based upon a relative cost might be misleading and even avoided possibly by simply changing the method of accounting.

It must be clear that there is not, and in the nature of things can not be, any fixed line of domestic costs or any fixed difference between foreign and domestic costs on which a finger can be laid. Cost is so essentially variable in time and in other conditions that the very data on which a report is based will alter before it is printed. On page 25 of the pulp and news-print paper industry report the Tariff Board says:

> It appears that the costs in a single mill vary greatly from month to month of a given year; if the margin between selling price and manufacturing costs were taken on the basis of the best month it would give an entirely wrong impression of the facts.

It is unfair to say goods cost so much without saying the conditions under which these costs prevail. Nor is a total or average statement of any kind accurate. It must be resolved into elements and their relations shown. To say that in England the labor cost on certain goods is 50 cents per yard and in America 80 cents per yard may mean little or nothing. Before anything can be inferred from it further facts are needed. Are the goods standard or special? Are they alike in material, character, and weight? Is the quantity made at one time the same? Is the machine on which it is made the same, and, if not, how does it differ? Does it run at the same speed and with the same percentage of stoppages? What are the methods of handling goods in each case? What is the proportion of "seconds" in each case? What is the relation of the management to the worker in each case? What are the conditions of light and power, of space and arrangement, of sanitation and ventilation? What are the relative charges for repairs and other elements of burden?

You can not offset a well-disciplined German against an ill-disciplined American mill until you have shown that good discipline is impossible here. The Tariff Board may perhaps render a service by establishing standards to which our industries may gradually approach, but when this shall have been done and our industries developed to the fullest output with the most perfect apparatus and arrangement there will remain small need for protective tariffs.

As a final suggestion of certain unseen but important elements in the cost of production, I suggest that the Tariff Board should give us such facts as these: What is done by the mills in the way of time study; that is, to learn and teach the easiest and quickest way of doing the work? Do they determine the personal characteristics of their workers as to eyesight or quickness of perception or action, for one person moves more slowly than another, one person sees more quickly than another. Do they take care that their operatives are selected by their special fitness for their line of work? What is the amount of absence for sickness? How frequently do the workers change? What variation exists as to the loss of time? Among different mills what amount of time is lost in accidents? What are the deductions from wages, and how are they made? What is the percentage of defective goods made? Can they show the daily history of, say, 100 looms of each, say, 10 textile mills? What is done in the way of well-directed effort toward a definite result, or is it merely a matter of surpassing previous achievements?

I have said little about the relative rate of wages per operative, because what this rate of pay is per person or per day affects the inquiry only in a minor degree. We all agree in believing this rate of daily pay per person to be larger in America than elsewhere. We wish to keep it so; but the Tariff Board is concerned rather in what the labor cost is per unit of product; and if the higher wage paid here does not appear greater in efficiency and productiveness, a field is opened for searching study. It will not suffice to report merely that labor is paid more per person and leave the crude and ignorant inference to be wrongfully drawn that it therefore costs more per unit of product, for this is known not to be so in many, perhaps in most, industries. And they are chargeable with the duty of finding whether it is so in textiles and, if so, of saying why. And it is because of the direct bearing of other matters than the wage rate on this labor cost that I have gone so fully into them. Are we then to have no inquiry into the costs of production? Why do we need it at the hands of a public body? If the National Association of Woolen Manufacturers, or similar body, would appoint with broad powers a permanent committee on the reduction of costs consisting of practical commercial and mechanical experts in their line, assisted by any well-known firm of certified public accountants, their annual verified reports, if made full and clear, would convey more than that of any nonexpert body could.

Neither in this or in any other form do I object to the fullest inquiry. All knowledge is helpful. But to predicate in advance the purpose for which the knowledge is to be used before the knowledge itself is gained seems to me absurd, and to make our study of costs a basis for taxation is, I think, to found our financial house upon the sand.

And now, gentlemen, as I began with the human interest I close with it. Both sides of this House agree in the patriotic desire for the welfare of our people. Beside this no tariff tax, no investigation, has serious relative importance. I believe it is clear that a tariff can not be placed upon a supposed difference in production costs, and that logically a tariff for revenue is the only practicable thing; but no one, and least of all the Democratic Party, intend that the lot of the worker shall be worse; nay it must be better, else we have all sadly failed. Better I mean as a general and permanent growth and condition rather than worse as a result of the scare and caprice of some frightened employers. As I also said, can we translate into terms of human happiness the laws of business and of taxation? I believe we can, for if our industries shall learn that when well equipped, well housed, well managed, the higher wage is the only course productive of low labor expense, then shall we be cutting away the very roots of poverty. Therefore I would have the Democratic Party take strong and affirmative ground; would have it to say to manufacturers: You shall have no more special privilege, you shall equip your mills with the best apparatus, you shall house your workers in the best way, you shall manage your labor by the most scientific methods, conserving your men better than you do your machines, and you shall pay them and treat them justly and wisely because it is sane and profitable so to do. And to the worker we shall say: Do your best, for where that is done under the best conditions and with the best tools and equipment the result will be a higher wage for you and a lower cost for you and your fellow workman. And to the consumer we shall say: You will profit as the owner and the worker profit by the combination of good equipment, proper buildings, wise management, and high pay. One of the first acts of creation in the oldest of books is said to be the great command "Let there be light," and if the great Democratic Party can throw the light of this industrial truth into the dark industrial places there shall be in very truth a new creation. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and Mr. CULLOP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12812 and had directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent, I would like to make a suggestion to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. I would like to close general debate when we adjourn to-morrow. I understood from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that there would be no objection to dispensing with Calendar Wednesday to-morrow. I ask unanimous consent to close debate to-morrow; and if it is agreeable to the gentleman from New York, I will now ask unanimous consent to take a recess until 7.30 o'clock this evening, for debate only, and to meet to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Alabama, if he will permit, that the hour of meeting to-night better be made 8 o'clock.

Mr. PAYNE. I have no objection to that program, Mr. Speaker, but I do not want to be caught in this way by some Member raising an objection to-morrow to dispensing with Calendar Wednesday. I think in that event the debate ought to close on Thursday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then we will let that portion of the request go over until to-morrow.

Mr. PAYNE. Very well.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the regular order fixing 12 o'clock for the hour of meeting be changed so that the House will meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the order that the House meet at 12 o'clock noon be changed to-morrow, Wednesday, August 2, 1911, so that the House will meet at 11 o'clock. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock to-night.

Mr. PAYNE. One moment, Mr. Speaker. I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that he embody in the agreement that there be no other business transacted this evening except debate on this bill in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask to make it a unanimous-consent order. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock to-night for the purpose of general debate on the cotton bill, and that no other business be transacted except general debate upon that bill.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know but that it would be a good thing, if we could make it effective, to have included in that an agreement that the point of no quorum may not be raised.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That would not be effective, I think.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock to-night, and that the session to-night be for general debate only upon the cotton bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Accordingly, at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m., the House stood in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

AFTER RECESS.

The recess having expired the House was called to order by the Speaker.

COTTON SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12812) to reduce the duties on the manufactures of cotton.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12812) to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton, with Mr. CULLOP in the chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from New York desired to consume some time first this evening and intended to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, by virtue of the authority vested in me by the ranking member of the minority of the Committee on Ways and Means I should like, if possible, to come to some understanding with the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee as to the division of time. I know of no one upon this side who desires to speak except the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My understanding with the gentleman from New York was that he intended to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I do not know what time he intended to yield, but if the gentleman will state the time——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He intended to yield one hour, and upon his departure he observed that he wished the gentleman from Pennsylvania would look out for the interests of this side of the House, and that is the reason I ventured to see if we could come to some understanding.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The order of the House was that the time shall be equally divided. When the gentleman has concluded we will probably have some one to speak on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, we have proceeded far enough into this extraordinary session of Congress to have it made perfectly plain to every citizen who has money to invest in industrial enterprises, and to every workman who obtains his livelihood in industrial occupations, as to what they may expect if the Democrats, who have obtained control of this House, succeed in controlling the country. If the plans of the Democratic leaders do not miscarry there is to be a complete change of our tariff policy to a revenue basis, and, in the language of the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], coming fresh from the Democratic caucus, "there is to be no protection in it." It is not sufficient that spectacular investigations after "malefactors of great wealth" are to harass and annoy the general business interests, we are to have such a revision of the tariff "from top to bottom" as will bring every American enterprise to a European basis, notwithstanding the great disparsity in the cost of production and the scale of wages at home and abroad.

Evidently, as the situation is viewed by our Democratic brethren, we have gone forward with too rapid strides in our Republican desire to make the United States the most progressive and prosperous of all the countries of the world, and must now submit to a lowering of the gates, which will permit our splendid markets to become the chosen field of our European competitors. Viewed solely from the standpoint of the cotton grower, who has a virtual monopoly of his product, it may not seem so serious a problem as it does to the great mass of the people who are dependent upon the industries for their support.

EASY TO FIND FAULT.

It is true that a great wave of misrepresentation as to industrial conditions has swept over the country in recent campaigns, and that there has been a growing tendency to criticize the existing order and to find fault with the party in power. It is easy for the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], as he did in presenting his cotton bill on Friday last, to declare that "the Republican Party has bankrupted the country." The statement is politically alluring, and finds easy access to the press of the country, but it is not so easy after the sensation has done its deadly work to catch up to the legion of readers with the simple truth that at the close of business on July 1 last there was in the Treasury for the fiscal year 1911 an actual excess of receipts over disbursements of $45,859,673.59. Anyone who takes the trouble to examine the statement of the United States Treasury can satisfy himself as to the accuracy of these figures, notwithstanding all the maledictions that have been hurled at the Payne tariff bill and the Republican Party.

CUTTING DOWN THE REVENUE.

Although this extra session of Congress was called for the specific purpose of considering reciprocity with Canada, and might well have ended with that, the eagerness of the Democratic leaders to make known their purposes with regard to tariff legislation has been emphasized from day to day. In no instance have we heard a word in favor of constructive legislation. On the contrary, distrust of prevailing conditions, the desire for investigation at Federal expense, and a general tendency toward oppressive and destructive legislation have been the rule. With an enthusiasm bordering upon exuberance, the Democratic leaders, intrenched behind their bales of cotton, and far removed from the borderland of Canada, gloried in the prospect of Republican dissension and the loss of $5,000,000 of revenue in the reciprocity bargain. Then they came forward with their farmers' free-list bill, proposing a direct slap at the manufacturing industries, with an incidental loss of $10,000,000 of revenue, saved chiefly upon factory products made by cheap labor in India and essential to the packing and shipment of southern cotton into foreign lands.

CLEVER MOVES TO EMBARRASS REPUBLICANS.

And then, with a cleverness that does credit to a leadership intent upon the acquisition of national control, they came forward with their bill for the revision of the wool schedule, hoping further to rend Republicans asunder by drawing the line between the farmer and the manufacturer, with the incidental thought of reducing the latter to the level of his European competitors. By the adjustment of the duties in the wool bill it was proposed to cut down the revenue about $1,300,000. And now, as the very acme of Democratic complacency, we have the bill for the revision of the cotton schedule, proposing a further reduction of revenue to the extent of $3,000,000. Should this extraordinary session continue at much greater length and these measures evincing Democratic intent upon a helpless country continue to be presented, it certainly would not be very long before we would be reduced from a protective to "a revenue basis," with the complete elimination of the Republican surplus of $45,000,000, reported to be in the Treasury on July 1 last. But even so, we shall not despair, for it is possible the people, who have been the chief sufferers during the progress of this remarkable Democratic program, will sooner or later awaken to a full understanding of its significance, and shake off the burden of direct taxation which, in lieu of the tariff, it is proposed to place upon them.

REPORT A REMARKABLE DOCUMENT.

It was a remarkable report which accompanied the cotton bill submitted by the gentleman from Alabama, a report evincing much historical and statistical research, covering no less than 539 printed pages, a credit to the industry of the committee and its compiler; but one will search in vain through its many pages for testimony from the mills and the men who work in them as to the wisdom or effect of a reduction of duties in the cotton schedule. Indeed, we are informed that although numerous appeals for a hearing were made to the chairman of the committee by the vast army of American citizens who have their money invested in cotton mills and allied industries, and from workingmen and working women who obtain their livelihood in these American establishments, there was no heed to the call—nothing but history, statistics, and theory behind the closed doors of the committee room.

Even the committee of the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association, made up largely of southern men, and Democrats at that, were denied a hearing. Bulletins have been published by this association, inclosing the correspondence between its officers and the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and are now in the possession of the Members of Congress. The following letter from the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee best describes the attitude and conclusion of the committee with regard to public hearings:

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 6, 1911.

Mr. R. M. MILLER, Jr., Charlotte, N. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee had its first meeting on the cotton schedule this morning. After looking over the facts before us and the briefs, they concluded not to go into general hearings on the subject.

I am in receipt of the brief you have already filed with the committee, and it will receive careful attention. Should you desire to place further facts before us, I will be glad to receive them personally, or by letter, as you desire. We will probably be at work on the cotton schedule for the next 10 days before reaching any final conclusion in reference to the matter.

Yours, very truly, O. W. UNDERWOOD, Chairman.

HEARINGS BY BRIEF.

Failing to be heard, the Manufacturers' Association submitted its protest and argument in writing. It is important that this statement should be preserved, as bearing upon the attitude of the committee, and I incorporate it herewith as a part of my remarks:

CHARLOTTE, N. C., July 18, 1911.

Mr. O. W. UNDERWOOD,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: As instructed by the tariff committee of the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association, which met here in Charlotte to-day, I have the honor to reply further to your favor of the 6th instant, stating our position on proposed legislation relating to Schedule I, cotton manufactures, as follows:

(1) We are opposed to any revision that will increase the percentage of importations to total United States cotton manufactures that now exists.

In figuring percentages of importations to manufactures we call attention to the fact that importations under the cotton manufactures schedule were 17½ per cent of the total cotton manufactures for the year 1910, including laces and other such luxuries that are not as yet made in great quantity in this country, although it is interesting to note that the manufacture of laces in the United States increased in value from three and one-half millions in 1900 to nearly ten millions in 1910.

We believe that any way it may be considered, that the present importations are sufficient to protect the consumer by regulating prices, for there is no monopoly or restraint of trade, but, on the contrary, the keenest competition among cotton manufacturers of the United States.

We do not believe that anything more regulative of prices can be secured, however much importations may be increased, for American manufacturers are already down to cost; and without radical cutting of wages which is not believed could or should be effected, the chief result of legislating more foreign goods into this country would be only to transfer that work to foreigners, for the importers do not usually undersell a local market except enough to bring in their goods.

We believe that the cotton schedule bears its share of the customs revenue for the support of the Government, and that there is no call for increasing the amount collected under it.

(2) We are opposed to revision without adequate data.

(3) We offer our assistance in obtaining such data.

(4) We are in favor of such revision as will protect all classifications under the schedule primarily in proportion to their labor costs, and are especially in favor of simplification of the schedule.

(5) We are opposed to any revision that does not take into account differences in other conditions as well as labor costs, particularly on account of southern mill conditions.

(6) We are opposed to reductions of duty on machinery and other items entering into the cost of mills, except such as will keep them on a parity with our own industry as to labor and other costs at home and abroad. We do not want our property depreciated, nor do we want broadly to injure other industries to help our own. Let each case rest on its merits and benefit equally.

(7) We are opposed to personal hearings; too often it has been alleged that unfair advantage has been taken that way in making the tariffs of the past.

(8) We are in favor of publicity and record and of the freest and most open discussion and consideration of everything relating to tariff making.

(9) We demand that the data upon which revision is based be made public and a matter of record, except with such concealment of names that good faith dictates with those furnishing data. If publicity is good for other things, and we believe it is, it certainly is desirable in such a vitally important matter as the tariff.

We also demand a definite statement as to just what it is intended by its makers that the revision shall accomplish:

(a) What measure of protection is it intended to afford to American cotton manufacturers—equality in labor cost only, equality in cost of production, or what?

(b) How much relative increase or decrease is intended in importations, which means how much more or less competition is it intended to impose upon us?

(c) If more competition, how are we expected to meet it?

(d) If we are expected to cut labor, how is that labor to be compensated for the reduction, and what can it definitely expect in lesser cost of living to offset the cut?

(e) What amount of revenue is the new tariff on cotton manufactures expected to yield?

(f) What reduction is expected, if any, in the cost of articles of cotton manufacture to the consumer at retail stores?

We ask consideration of the above in the spirit in which it is offered.

We intend no reflection; we merely ask to have our way pointed out by those who make the way.

We beg to have it borne in mind that our industry directly concerns 2,000,000 people, and indirectly many more; that we are not simply manufacturers and employees asking protection for our property and our labor, but that we are consumers and that we are citizens, most of whom voted for the party proposing this revision and who expected not only that any revisions would be made with as much prudence as would be exercised in private business matters, but also that they would be conducted with all the publicity that was generally promised among other reforms.

We beg to remain, respectfully, yours,

R. M. MILLER, Jr., Chairman.

MANY SOUGHT TO BE HEARD.

Not only the associated manufacturers sought to be heard, but a large number of individuals acting upon their own responsibility implored a hearing. They wanted to show that there was no good reason for a reduction of tariff duties on cotton manufactures, and that the advantage of such a reduction, while it would operate against American industries, would be wholly in the interest of the foreigner. They wanted to show that the man who invested his money in industrial establishments, as well as the man who made his wages therein, was not responsible for the increase in the cost of living, but that if the prices were high, they were due to middlemen or importers, and not to the protective-tariff system. Here is a copy of a letter forwarded from New Orleans which serves to elucidate this question:

ALDEN MILLS,
New Orleans, La., June 20, 1911.

Hon. O. W. UNDERWOOD,
Chairman Ways and Means Committee,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have taken the liberty to submit to you, under separate cover, samples of a cotton sock and stocking manufactured by us, and which are commonly known as "10 centers."

The figures attached to these hose tell their own story. At the present time there is over 100 per cent profit to the jobber and retailer.

When we first commenced to manufacture these goods, some 10 or 12 years ago, we received 27½ per cent more than the present price. This 27½ per cent has been absorbed by the people who were most active in the last campaign against the hosiery tariff, and who have absorbed this 25 per cent from the American manufacturer and have not given any portion of the benefit of the same to the consumer, as the price on this hosiery to the consumer is the same to-day, namely, 10 per pair.

"Will a further profit for the middleman reduce the price of the article to the consumer?"

Yours, truly,

W. H. MCLELLAN, Manager.

WROTE TO SOUTHERN REPRESENTATIVES.

To his Representative in Congress the writer of the above letter, W. H. McLellan, wrote more fully and more earnestly, as follows:

ALDEN MILLS,
New Orleans, La., June 20, 1911.

DEAR SIR: Under separate cover I have taken the liberty of forwarding you prepaid samples of what is known as 10-cent hosiery; these socks and stockings are sold to the consumer at 10 cents per pair. We are at the present time delivering these to the various jobbers throughout the country at 4.98 cents per pair for the hose and 4.69 cents for the socks, leaving a profit of over 100 per cent to be divided by the jobber and retailer.

For your information would say that we commenced to manufacture this particular line in 1901, at which time we received 27½ per cent more for this identical stocking and sock than we are getting at the present time. Prices to consumer at this time was 10 cents, the same as it is now.

We have been able to absorb this 25 per cent loss in two methods; first, the increase of our business, the volume of which reducing the overhead charges. The second, by the installation of the most modern and improved machines at an outlay of several hundred thousand dollars.

Should the tariff affecting the low end of hosiery, which is a necessity to the working people, be changed I fail to see where it will reduce the price to the consumer, for a reduction of over 25 per cent has not had the desired effect of benefiting the consumer.

I therefore trust that you will consider this matter wisely before plunging and consider the effect of your act upon the 400 to 500 hands employed by our factory in New Orleans as well as the large amount of money invested.

Please bear in mind that the last active campaign against the tariff on the domestic hosiery was engineered and financed by two of the largest jobbers and retailers in this country, who, from the figures on the hosiery submitted to you by me, show that, notwithstanding the fact that they have forced a 25 per cent reduction on the price of these articles, they are still levying the same money from the consumer.

Yours, truly,

W. H. MCLELLAN, Manager.

THE PLODDER AND THE MIDDLEMAN.

Speaking for another mill doing busines in Meridian, Miss., the same writer makes the following statement, which ought to appeal to those who believe it commendable to start enterprises in the South and give them a chance to live:

PRISCILLA MILLS,
Meridian, Miss., June 20, 1911.

DEAR SIR: As suggested by our esteemed favor of May 4, I have taken the liberty of submitting prepaid under separate cover a sample of the sock and stocking manufactured by our concern. The sock we manufacture in New Orleans and the hose is made exclusively at the Meridian mill.

The figures attached to these stockings tell their own story.

For your information would say that we have been manufacturing this line for some 15 to 20 years, these particular numbers for 12 years. When we first commenced to manufacture these numbers our price to the jobber was 27½ per cent above the present figure, at which time the consumer purchased the stockings at the same price they pay to-day, namely, 10 cents per pair.

Notwithstanding the fact that the middle man has obtained a reduction from the manufacturer of 27½ per cent, the price to the consumer has remained the same.

This readily explains why the last campaign which was so actively waged against the reduction of the tariff on hosiery was engineered and financed by two of the largest jobbers and retailers in the United States. Having forced a profit of 27½ per cent from the manufacturers these jobbers realize how easy under the cloak of free trade an additional amount of profit can be obtained.

But at whose expense? The consumer will hardly receive the benefit of it if up to the present time he has not received any benefit from the 27½ per cent reduction which American manufacturers have been able to make on the price of their goods through the installation of the most modern and improved machines which represents an enormous amount of money; in our case very near $500,000.

Now, if you will stop to think that this little plant at Meridian employing some 150 people and manufacturing 1,200 dozen pairs of ladies' stockings daily (which are being placed on the sidewalk of the jobber at a cost of 4.98 cents per pair), each dozen of these stockings consuming 1½ pounds of cotton what chance is there for the American manufacturer should the cheap labor of Europe and Asia be brought in close competition?

For your information would say that our pay roll at the Meridian mill (and by pay roll I mean money paid to people living in Meridian) amounts to from $44,000 to $45,000 a year. Our local bills paid in the city of Meridian runs to very near $10,000 a year, and aside from the business done with Marks Rothenberg and Winner, Klein & Co. this entire amount of money is brought from north of the Ohio River, from sources which never before entered into Meridian.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if those manufacturers who have been writing here are the same ones who pay their labor an average weekly pay of $4.10 per week in this era of high protection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman kindly tell me where he gets the figures $4.10 a week?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN] makes the statement, and I suppose, being from that part of the country, he knows what he is talking about.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not like to discuss haphazard figures which come forward in that way, which I fear can not be substantiated.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have a statement from the Department of Commerce and Labor of North Carolina saying that the average wage scale is $4.90, and in South Carolina it is $4.60, and the cotton-mill scale is still lower than that.

HARKING BACK TO CLEVELAND.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the wage scale in those States is as the gentleman says, I can only express my regret that higher wages are not paid there. But if the gentleman will wait a little while I propose to take up the wage question, and I will be delighted to discuss it with him on any line he proposes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I wish to state that if the charges made there that the leader on this side of the House will not allow the manufacturers to write this tariff bill were made in my district, it would result in strong support in favor of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] for President.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to make the argument to the workingmen of the gentleman's district on that basis, and will go if the gentleman will extend me an invitation to do so.

The gentleman, writing from the Priscilla Mills, in Mississippi, said further:

My experience in the Cleveland administration was most bitter, and I sincerely trust that the present Democratic House will not repeat and force the country to experience any such period as we had at that time.

Those are pleasant recollections for those who like to discuss the labor questions as of now and then.

In conclusion, he wrote:

I trust you will pardon the length of this letter, but I feel confident that you will give the matter serious consideration and will not jeopardize the interest of your city "by a grand-stand play to the galleries," and that the blame for the high cost of living will be squarely put on the shoulders of those who should carry the burden.

Thanking you for your kindness in this matter, I remain,

Yours, truly,

W. H. MCLELLAN, Manager.

THE MANUFACTURER TAKES THE RISK.

I also desire to introduce a voice from South Carolina. There is an appeal in this letter which seems to say, "We invested our money in good faith; we are losing upon our investment; we merely ask that we be permitted to do business and that the bread and butter be not taken out of our mouths:"

HETRICK HOSIERY MILLS,
Walhalla, S. C., June 30, 1911.

Mr. GARNETTE ANDREWS,
Care of Richmond Hosiery Mills, Chattanooga, Tenn.

DEAR SIR: We trust that you will pardon the liberty that we are taking in writing you in reference to the tariff on hosiery and the necessity of maintaining the present tariff rate in event of a new cotton schedule being framed at the present or any future session of Congress. Being engaged in the manufacture of hosiery, even though in a comparatively small way, yet the experience we have had in the matter enables us to say without hesitation that the manufacture of hosiery in America needs the small modicum of help and protection which it obtains in the present schedule. We can scarcely live as it is, and if you will study the manufacture of hosiery in South Carolina, or, for that matter, in any portion of the United States, you will readily perceive that there is no great margin of profit in the business of manufacture. In our own State it is estimated that not more than one mill in five of the several that we have started in the last 10 or 15 years is now running. One of the four mills in the State has recently closed, and at present there are only three mills in active operation, to wit, one at Union, one at Spartanburg, and one at Walhalla. We learned that the mill at Landrum suspended indefinitely last week.

Under the present schedule the tariff rate barely suffices to prevent the large importers in Chicago and New York from flooding the country with foreign hosiery, principally the product of cheap and underpaid European labor.

As you doubtless know, our Mr. Jaynes has been connected with the hosiery plant here in a financial way ever since the old Oconee Mill was started in 1904. Instead of his investment proving profitable, his loss has been at least 50 per cent of the total amount invested in the old plant. And such has been, in the main, the history of the manufacture of hosiery, not only in South Carolina, but throughout the South, in the last 10 years. This fact alone should invite serious investigation before making any change in the present schedule.

We believe that every Member of Congress wants to do right and promote the general welfare not only of its individual constituents, but of the whole body of American people. When you come to study this question carefully, we are sure that you will become convinced beyond the shadow of a doubt that the principal profit in the hosiery business in the United States to-day is going into the pockets of the importers and jobbers, and a very small per cent into the pockets of the bona fide manufacturer, and it is the manufacturer who will be hurt by the reduction of the rate. He is to-day practically between the upper and the nether millstone, and being ground to pieces. The high price of cotton yarn and other raw material that go into the manufacture of a pair of stockings, plus the labor cost, very nearly equals the price at the best goods can be sold for to-day. We invite your careful study of this matter, and wish you and your associate Congressmen and the Senators from our State to be correctly and fully informed upon the matter before you allow any reduction of the present rate on hosiery.

NEED HELP IN THE SOUTH.

This is one of the infant industries of the South, and it certainly needs help. We also believe that it is to the vital interest of the whole South to insure the hosiery manufacturers the reasonable protection which it now obtains. While the South has the monopoly of the cotton plant, yet a pound of new lint cotton to-day is worth only 15 cents, and it has been ranging for the last five years from about 10 to 15 cents per pound. But we can readily see the great advantage the South would enjoy if the cotton grown by it could be converted into the finished article here. The hosiery that we put on the market to-day makes this pound of cotton worth from 75 cents to $1.75. The ideal condition industrially would be to foster the enterprises which converts this raw material into the finished product, and, instead of getting 15 cents for it and shipping it out of the South, keep it at home and manufacture it into a product that would make that pound of cotton worth from 5 to 15 times the price of the raw material. For this reason, in the main, it seems to us at the present time the South is more interested than any other section of the country in maintaining the present tariff rate on hosiery.

If we are wrong in this view we would be pleased to have you set us right. You doubtless know that the manufacture of hosiery enjoys a very high reputation for clean, healthy, and desirable work for girls and women. At present fair wages only can be paid. We certainly wish we could pay more, and live, for we really desire to pay our help more if we could; but under the prevailing price of the finished product and the price of the raw material the labor cost can not be increased. A fair daily wage for operatives is now about $1 to $1.25 per day. You know this is not too much, and we think you will agree with us that if the tariff rate should be reduced this wage scarcely could be maintained and the manufacturers continue in business. This is putting it to you plain and is an honest confession, but it is so.

We beg to submit that the present tariff rate on hosiery is not inconsistent with the time-honored Democratic principle of a tariff revenue only. It is certainly necessary to raise money to defray the necessary expense of the Government, and there is no better or easier way to raise the revenue than by a reasonable hosiery tariff, and more especially so when it is protecting home products.

In this connection it is well to bear in mind that a reduction of the rate on hosiery would not benefit the consumer. There would be no reduction in the retail price of a pair of stockings. Such was the experience in the German-American agreement signed by President Roosevelt a few years ago. The result of that agreement was the excessive importation of foreign hosiery by the importers, who still maintain the market price of hosiery, and the retail price was maintained. The effect of the agreement was to drive the American manufacturer out of the business legally and to transfer the manufacture of hosiery to foreign countries, thus depriving our own people of a legitimate business. If the person who buys and wears a pair of stockings would be benefited by a reduction of a tariff rate there would be some reasonable ground for asking a reduction, but in the light of past experience we know this would not be the case.

AMERICANS MAKE GOOD HOSIERY.

The American manufacturer is now putting on the market as fine and durable a class of stockings as can be made out of cotton yarn, and the consumer is getting full value of his money. We flatter ourselves that we now have here at Walhalla and in the Piedmont section of South Carolina a hosiery plant that to-day is turning out as fine a grade of hosiery as can be made from cotton yarn. While a portion of the loss which our Mr. Jaynes sustained on the old Oconee plant was doubtless due to the lack of technical manufacturing skill of the persons in charge of the plant at first, yet two years ago he formed a connection with William A. Hetrick and Charles F. Hetrick, of the city of Philadelphia, Pa., who were brought up in the knitting business in the best mills of that city, which may be reckoned as the home of the knitting industry in the United States. They removed their plant from Philadelphia to unite with the plant already here and have made it over into a practically new mill. The Hetrick brothers are expert manufacturers, and yet with their technical skill it was a struggle to keep our heads above the water and make buckle and tongue meet. We earnestly desire not to be driven out of the business. Somebody had to be pioneer in the manufacture of hosiery in this section of the South, and it fell to the lot of our Mr. Jaynes to assume the roll of such a pioneer. It can be safely said that the existence of the mill here to-day has been due to his nerve and grit in standing by the plant and maintaining it, even though it involved at one time a financial loss of $50,000. It is doubtful whether any other man in Oconee County would have stood by the enterprise year in and year out while it continued to lose money, but he firmly believed it to be legitimate business with the proper men at the head of the manufacturing department. He believes that a kind Providence guided his steps, and that at last the right men were found in the Hetrick brothers, of Philadelphia. They have been induced to leave their homes and kindred and friends in the "City of Brotherly Love" and make their home with the people of South Carolina, believing that in time they could achieve a reasonable success in the manufacture of hosiery at Walhalla; but we realize that it is still going to take a long time to secure the success of the enterprise, and that so far as our individual fortunes are concerned, and not ours alone, but also the welfare of the operatives in our mill, any reduction in the rate would be extremely hurtful. For these reasons we appeal to you to stand between us and disaster, believing that we have in you a strong champion to our rights.

Please let us hear from you with full expression of your views, because we wish to talk this matter to a finish and have a thorough understanding of the situation.

Awaiting your early advice, we beg to remain,

Yours, very truly,

HETRICK HOSIERY MILLS.

PROTECTION ASKED IN KNOXVILLE, TENN.

I do not intend to prolong the argument as to whether or not the Ways and Means Committee acted considerately in refusing to hear the American citizens mostly concerned in a revision of the cotton schedule, but I think it is fair to the House that we should have a few more extracts from letters which show the widespread interest in this Democratic measure and the fear that holds in the business mind with regard to it.

I quote from a letter on behalf of the Knoxville Knitting Mills Co., of Knoxville, Tenn.:

We are vitally interested in the cotton schedule affecting hosiery and other cotton products. You will appreciate the fact that the South is now becoming the center for the manufacture of cotton goods, and especially has it grown very rapidly in the manufacture of cotton hosiery.

We are using our home products, which are raised in the South and are giving employment to our southern people, which adds greatly to the development of the country and works for the good of all.

Without protection on cotton hosiery the southern mills can not compete with the foreign goods, which are made with labor which does not cost one-third as much as ours and under different conditions entirely, where living is on a different basis.

You will appreciate the fact that since a tariff has been in force the retail price on hosiery has not been advanced to the consumer in a single instance. You can still buy a 25-cent hose for 25 cents, or a 50-cent hose for 50 cents, and a 10-cent hose for 10 cents, and when you compare the value with the price you pay for same you will concede that every wearer and every user is getting his money's worth on the goods that are being offered to-day over the retail counters. In fact, a better quality of goods is to-day being given for the price than were ever offered before.

The margin of profit to the mills on hosiery is very small, and we now must have a very large production to make any profit on the business.

If foreign hosiery is allowed to come in and compete with ours, it simply gives the field to foreign goods, benefits foreign labor and foreign conditions, causing serious injury to our home people and bankrupts our home trade.

Inasmuch as it is necessary to raise a revenue, is there any better or easier way to do this than by protecting the hosiery business? In doing this you do not in any way affect the retail price of the goods to the users, but simply preserve a living margin for the manufacturers, enabling us to give employment to our home people, which, we believe you will agree, works for the good of all.

But what is the use? The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means would not listen to these gentlemen when they wanted to present the facts to the committee to prevent the striking down of this industry, which has been developing so rapidly in the South.

STARTED IN A SMALL WAY.

Here is a copy of a letter addressed to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] by the Richmond Hosiery Mills, of Rossville, Ga., June 13, 1911:

I have taken the liberty of wiring you as per the inclosed copy of telegram, as I understand a subcommittee is now at work drafting a new cotton schedule.

As manager and stockholder in four knitting mills situated as Rossville, Ga., Clinton, Tenn., Rockwood, Tenn., and Chattanooga, Tenn., I am very vitally interested in this subject. Fifteen years ago we started with $5,000 in Chattanooga in a small way in the hosiery business. We have gradually secured additional capital, nearly every dollar of which is local capital, until now we give employment to over 2,000 persons.

Our strongest and hardest competition is from Germany, and to give you an idea of how strong this competition is we have a man in our mill from Germany whom we employ as boss dyer and to whom we pay $50 per week, while in Germany the highest he ever received was $10 per week. These are facts. We have knitters in our mills who earn as high as $2 per day, while some earn as high as $2.50. This latter figure is an exception, however. On finer work than what we make knitters earn as high as $6 and $7 per day, according to their skill and ability.

When we started in we made the very coarsest and cheapest grade of goods, and people said fine goods could not be made in the South; but our help has gradually evoluted with the line of merchandise that we wanted to manufacture, and to-day we make as fine-gauge goods as are found in the North and East. We only started 15 years ago, and it is only a course of time when we can equal any country in the world making hosiery. Remember, we have only been in business 15 years and are one of the oldest mills in the South, whereas in Germany they have been in business for generations, and this is the competition that we are up against.

The present rates in the hosiery schedule are in reality not high enough, but we will take our chances with them. You can see the revenue that is being derived by the Treasury Department on the hosiery schedule is quite an important feature in the revenues of the Government.

WHEN ONE'S OX IS GORED.

If it would do you or your committee men any good, I should be pleased to send you samples or boxes of our merchandise, with prices at which we sell to the jobber, and if your committee desires it we will give you an itemized cost sheet, sworn to, showing you the cost of these goods. I do not believe anything could be fairer than that. We have nothing to hide; we are perfectly willing to give you any information that you may desire regarding the hosiery business, so far as in my personal power.

For the past 15 years there have been hundreds of little hosiery mills springing up all over the South, and especially in the Piedmont region. They have given employment to that class of people who heretofore have been unable to get steady work, and it would be a calamity to have this means of employment taken away from them or their wages reduced.

I have been raised in the South; born in Georgia; my father was a law partner of JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, and I ought to have nothing but low-tariff ideas in my head; but my neck is being gored now, and the anticipation of the goring is anything but pleasant, and for that reason I necessarily come before you seeking the protection that we require. We are no longer an agricultural community per se, but conditions have changed here in the South, and we are gradually becoming as much a manufacturing section as any other part of the country.

And I wish the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD], who made his speech here a little while ago, giving us picturesque experiences of his travels around the world, were here to listen to this statement with regard to the cost of labor at home and abroad.

$50 A WEEK HERE; $10 IN GERMANY.

You will note that the writer says:

We have in our mill a man from Germany, whom we employ as boss dyer and to whom we pay $50 per week, while in Germany the highest he ever received was $10 per week.

The cost of labor equalized between this and foreign countries! The cost of labor higher in foreign countries than it is here! Here is the testimony of men who are endeavoring to build up industries in your own environment and who are obliged to pay $50 a week for labor that was content in Germany to work for $10 a week.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Does the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Do you class an expert chemist as a laborer?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This employee is a boss dyer. I suppose he is a specialist, but he is a workman in the mill.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. He is an expert chemist from Germany. I know the very case the gentleman refers to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am glad the gentleman knows it, because it does not confirm the statement made by the gentleman a little while ago in his own speech in regard to the cost of labor at home and abroad. If he knew that this boss dyer received $10 a week in Germany and receives $50 a week in America, he must have known there was something awry when he indicated that the cost of labor was no higher in the United States than it was in foreign countries.

Now, we will get away from the boss dyer and will take up something closer to the labor end.

You will note they say further:

We have knitters in our mills who earn as high as $2 per day, while some earn as high as $2.50.

These wages are paid in the mills in Georgia and Tennessee that I have just referred to.

Somebody has been fooling the House with regard to the cost of labor in the cotton mills of the country. Somebody has just been upon the outskirts listening to those who know nothing of the business. They have not gone in to examine the books, to ascertain the prices at first hand.

SOUTHERN MILLS SPEAK OUT.

The Marietta Knitting Co., of Marietta, Ga., despairing of a hearing before the Ways and Means Committee, wrote as follows:

We have written the members of the Ways and Means Committee. Most of them make the usual promise of "due consideration." The Republican members, as a rule, tell us to put in our work on the Democrats, who are wholly in control of the Ways and Means Committee work. * * *

To the Democrats we are saying, Why reduce the tariff on hosiery when the Government is in need of the revenue and the people don't want cheaper hosiery, as they are now buying most freely hosiery that is high in price and poor in wearing quality? We refer to the sheer silks that are so popular at this time. We don't object to people buying this class of stuff if they want to, but we insist that they could get hosiery that would wear better at a cheaper price, which would be much more economical. On the idea of reducing the cost of living there certainly is no occasion for a reduction in the tariff on hosiery.

From the Orion Knitting Mills, of Kingston, N. C., I submit the following:

We agree with you that there should be no reduction, as there are too many foreign goods coming into this country already under the present schedule. The importations are so heavy that our own mills have been making very little, if any, profits for the last year or two on account of the overproduction; or, rather, the secret of it is that the consumption is too largely of foreign goods, which importers are able to bring in, even under the present schedule. To put our business on a profitable basis again there should be a slight advance in the tariff on the medium-priced goods.

UNDERWOOD BILL FAVORS THE RICH.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], in his address this afternoon, referred to 150 mills that were closed down in North Carolina yesterday because of the drought. I am presenting to you mills that are closing down because of competitive conditions, not because of an act of God such as prevailed yesterday in the Catawba country.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CULLOP). Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he does not think there ought to be a revision of the cotton schedule, so far as hose is concerned, as a matter of fact?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not think there should be any reduction in the hosiery schedule.

Mr. FOWLER. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if it is not a fact that during the year 1910 the poorest people of this land paid 91.23 per cent duty on their stockings, while the richest people of this country paid only 55 per cent during the year 1910? [Applause on the Democratic side.] I will ask the gentleman now if he does not think that that is so unfair to the poor people of this country that it ought to be changed?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman does not come from a hosiery-manufacturing district, evidently.

Mr. FOWLER. I will ask the gentleman if my figures are not correct?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I shall not attempt to confirm the gentleman's figures, nor shall I undertake to deny them, because I do not know whether his figures are correct or not. But I will say this to the gentleman: That this attempt to revise the hosiery schedule by the Ways and Means Committee is in its comparative results in favor of the man who manufactures the silk stockings as against the man in the South who has been making the 10-cent stockings for the poor. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FOWLER. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the poor people do pay 91.23 per cent.

DO NOT WEAR SILK STOCKINGS.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am one of the poor people who has not paid more than 25 cents for any pair of stockings he has worn within his recollection. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FOWLER. I am not talking about 91 cents. I am talking about a duty of 91.23 per cent.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And I do not think I shall ever desire to wear stockings at 91 cents. However, if the gentleman, coming, as he does, from an aristocratic section of Illinois, wants to wear stockings at 91 cents, evidently he has advanced to the silk-stocking class. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I regret I can not yield. I have gone thus far and covered the 91-cent proposition [laughter], and I desire in the time allotted to me to go forward and make progress. The gentleman from Illinois, I know, is going to come at me later on, and I am trying to reserve my time and my strength in order to cope with him. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York rose.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Later I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Now, I will read a message from the Richmond Spinning Co., of Chattanooga, Tenn.:

If these conditions keep up as they are, we could not make an honest dollar in a thousand years, and if the tariff is reduced on cotton goods, we believe it will put at least one-half of the cotton industry out of business.

Listen to this from Augusta, Ga.:

THE AUGUSTA FACTORY,
Augusta, Ga., July 31, 1911.

Mr. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Kindly use your influence as to letting the tariff on cotton goods stay just at it is, for God knows it is hard enough on the mills without any changes to their disadvantage. It is impossible for any mill in the United States to compete with the English mills in the manufacture of cotton goods, for the following reasons: Money is cheaper in England, labor is cheaper, machinery is cheaper, and the hours of labor are longer. The country using their goods is subject to secret adulteration as to the manufacturing. The Government subsidizes ships carrying the goods to their own colonies or territories. Cotton mills are losing money every day, being less protected by the tariff than any other manufacturing industry in the United States, and the only salvation for this large industry, in my opinion, is an export duty on every bale of cotton that leaves the United States. This idea may not be popular with the farmers, but is, nevertheless, a fact.

Yours, very truly,

STEWART PHINIZY, President.

And to this from Rock Hill, S. C.:

WYMOJO YARN MILLS,
Rock Hill, S. C., July 31, 1911.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE, M. C.,
Philadelphia, Pa.

DEAR SIR: We respectfully invite your attention to Bulletins Nos. 1, 2, and 3, recently sent out by the committee on tariff and legislation of the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association, of Charlotte, N. C.

The movement to reduce the tariff on cotton goods at this time is a most inopportune affair, for we are just now in the midst of a depression that has existed for more than two years and which bids fair to last until the consumption of American-made goods catches up with production. We can not conceive of how a reduction can be reasonably made under present conditions.

It is our honest opinion that a reduction in the tariff at this time would mean financial ruin to our mills, for we have not made any money for over two years.

Thanking you for your attention, we are,

Yours, truly, WYMOJO YARN MILLS.

From Carrollton, Ga., I have this:

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As you no doubt know, the cotton mills of this country have traveled a rough and rocky road for several years, and this year has been the worst of all. Cotton has been very high, with yarn and cloth low in comparison. The mills are perfectly willing to pay high prices for cotton if they can make a legitimate profit on their finished product. Labor is much higher and harder to get than ever before. Several times during the past 12 months we have considered shutting down our two mills, but would not do so on account of the men, women, and children who are looking to us for a living. If the tariff on cotton goods is reduced, it will hurt not only the manufacturer, but the laborer as well.

Yours, very sincerely,

MANDEVILLE MILLS.
J. A. MANDEVILLE,
Division Manager.

And from the Echota Cotton Mills, Calhoun, Ga., this:

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: If the cotton bill now pending to reduce the duties on cotton goods passes, what do you think will become of the cotton mills in the United States? What do you think will become of the several million people that are employed in the cotton mills? We can not compete with foreign labor; we do not feel that we pay our help what they should have now; but if other countries are allowed to ship their cloth into the United States at a reduced duty, what can we do but reduce wages?

The mills have had a hard pull for several years; we have been forced to run short time. Why? Because there was no demand for our goods at even money. How much cloth do we ship to Canada? Very little. How much will Canada ship us if her duty is reduced? Who of us will it hurt if we pay double the price that we now pay for cotton goods? Will it break any of us? I think not. Will it hurt the cotton-mill help if Congress forces us to reduce their pay? Will it break the mills to force them to close down?

My dear sir, I think we need more protection. We should not cause several millions of people who are depending on the mills for their bread and meat to suffer to benefit a few. I have been in the mills for 19 years, and up to a very few years ago our wages were so low that we could hardly live. Now that mill help are able to make an honest living, if this bill passes, the mills are going to be forced to cut pay.

For heaven's sake, give the poor cotton-mill help a chance to make an honest living and the mills a chance to at least play even by voting that bill down. I am a southern man, but I know what that bill will mean to the cotton mills of the United States and to her people.

Look at the wealth that is tied up in the cotton mills; look at the people that are employed by the mills.

Very truly, yours,

ECHOTA COTTON MILLS,
J. F. CLARK,
Manager and Superintendent.

A DEMOCRATIC PROTECTIONIST.

My attention, Mr. Chairman, has been called to numerous other appeals from the Southern States, but I know of none more characteristically expressive than this. Here is an extract from the copy of a letter written by a prominent Georgian to his Congressman:

I am a Democrat, but I can not afford to sit up and watch my business disappear without a strong protest * * * so you can see that sometimes we Democrats get a protection bee buzzing in our bonnet out of necessity.

Our country is developing very rapidly from a strictly agricultural country to where the manufacturing interests form quite a large and component part of our wealth, and we have reached the point where we need the same impetus to our prosperity that the New Englanders had before us. We hope you can see it in your way to safeguard our interests in the Ways and Means Committee. * * *

We don't ask you to follow the Republican doctrine of protection to equalize foreign wages and a reasonable profit. Just leave out the reasonable profit and give us the protection we need to equal foreign wages, Germany and Japan being the principal offenders—Germany right now and Japan in the future.

I know and highly respect the distinguished Member from Georgia to whom that letter was written, and I firmly believe that if free from the obligations of the Democratic caucus he would have been only too glad to respond to the call of his constituent, voicing, as he knows it does, a firm and permanent development of the Southern States.

PROFIT NOT MORE THAN 10 PER CENT.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. WARBURTON. I should just like to ask the gentleman if he believes that the whole labor cost in the mills is equal to 25 per cent of the selling price of the manufactured cotton?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do, and having posted myself somewhat on the hosiery end of the cotton business, I will say to the gentleman that so far as the manufacturing side of it is concerned, it can safely be stated that the profit does not exceed 10 per cent.

Mr. WARBURTON. The gentleman does not quite get my question. I will try and make it plainer: Will the labor cost of manufacturing cotton goods in the mills equal 25 per cent of the price that the manufacturer receives at the mill?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have no definite statistics upon that subject, but I will say to the gentleman, having analyzed the cost of a suit of clothes that cost $40, that labor gets the major portion of the entire cost of the suit.

Mr. WARBURTON. That is not quite an answer to my question. What I want to know is if all of the labor in the mill costs 25 per cent of the selling price of the finished garment at the mill?

Mr. UTTER. That depends upon the style of cloth.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I should like to have the gentleman amplify his question to this extent, that when he asks for the proportion of labor cost, he should include also the cost of labor from the time of production to the finished garment, and then I would say yes, that the proportion of the labor cost is much in excess of half the value.

NO DUTY ON RAW COTTON.

Mr. WARBURTON. The gentleman understands that there is no tariff on raw cotton.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is no tariff on raw cotton.

Mr. WARBURTON. The cotton is landed at the mill at home as cheaply as at the mill abroad.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think it is safe to say that our friends in the South can ship their cotton to Germany or to England more cheaply by vessel than they can send it by rail to New England.

Mr. WARBURTON. But there is no tariff on the cotton itself.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is no tariff on cotton.

Mr. WARBURTON. Then the labor cost would be confined solely to the labor cost at the mills, would it not?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If you are discussing simply the labor cost at the mill, I presume so; but I am going to deal with the labor question in a moment or two. I do not care to have the gentleman divert me from my argument just now. I am coming to that as soon as I get through with these communications.

SHORT MESSAGES FROM THE NORTH.

A few more extracts from the expressions of those who could not obtain a hearing before the Democratic Ways and Means Committee before I proceed.

George F. Hoffman, of Hoffman-Corr Manufacturing Co., Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, writes:

Every cotton mill in the South has lost money for the last two years. Cotton can be shipped from the South to England as cheap as it can be shipped to New England and can be made into goods cheaper there than it can here. There must be protection. It is a question of labor.

There is an answer to the gentleman's question now.

Joseph Feldenheimer, of Philadelphia, chairman knitted cotton underwear tariff committee:

Our particular industry (knitted cotton underwear) is not a large one and can not be regarded as a factor as a revenue producer, but the rates which we enjoy at the present time under the Payne law, and which are exactly the same as the Dingley rates, are absolutely essential to the continued existence and progress of manufacturers engaged in our particular line.

The largest manufacturers of our class of goods are located in Massachusetts, but knitted cotton underwear is manufactured in more than one-half of the States of the Union. It is just now beginning to obtain a strong foothold in the South; as an instance, the Mayo Mills, Mayodan, N. C., are erecting at this time a mill with a capacity of 2,000 dozen underwear daily.

Brown-Aberle Co., Philadelphia:

Should the tariff be reduced on hosiery it would cause a stagnation in this business, resulting in great loss to the employer and employee alike.

Chipman Knitting Mill, Easton, Pa.:

During the last agitation of this schedule the hosiery manufacturers declared that should we be given the advance in tariff that it would not affect the price to the consumer. This declaration has been made absolutely good, as at the present time the consumers can buy better hosiery and cheaper hosiery than they have ever been able to do in the history of the business.

German-American Hosiery Co., Philadelphia:

We know how familiar you are with conditions in the hosiery industry, and that you realize the necessity of such action as much as anyone else, without going into further details on our side. The hosiery import statistics alone furnish sufficient proof how urgently our industry is in need of all the protection we now have.

Harry C. Aberle & Co., Philadelphia:

Rates of duty on hosiery in the Underwood bill will destroy the hosiery industry in this country.

Brown Knitting Co., Philadelphia:

Business on staple goods is dead and all mills are complaining since the cotton bill was reported; it is getting worse; no jobber will buy, only what he has to.

E. SUTRO & SON CO.,
Philadelphia, August 1, 1911.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We wired you this morning the rates of duty on hosiery in the Underwood bill will entirely destroy the hosiery industry in this country.

We can not make our statement any stronger, so only repeat what was stated in our telegram—this undoubtedly means destruction for all of the hosiery manufactories in this country.

Very truly, yours, E. SUTRO & SON CO.

AN EXPRESSION FROM NEW YORK.

I think it well also at this time to introduce the following letter from Hinchman, Vezin & Co., of New York, representatives of a number of concerns in Pennsylvania and elsewhere:

HINCHMAN, VEZIN & CO.,
New York, July 29, 1911.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to say that you can state without the slightest danger of refutation that the effect would be not less disastrous than the following state of things: The closing down of three-quarters of the hosiery mills in the United States and the ruin of the owners of such mills, for their machinery and general outfit would be so much junk. If any mills at all managed to survive it would only be after a most radical cut in the wages of the operatives. The above would be the direct results. You can imagine the indirect results, how this would affect dyers, yarn spinners, makers of all the trimmings, machinery, etc., going into the manufacture of hosiery, also the indirect effects on business in general by the paralysis of this single industry.

This proposition is so obviously intended to put Mr. Taft in a hole by forcing him to give it a veto that it is a most transparent political trick, but it is a trick that works untold injury to a great industry on account of the distrust that it creates as to what may come next.

Very respectfully,

CHARLES VEZIN.

ADVANTAGES TO THE IMPORTER.

Here is a manufacturer's view of certain advantages to the importer in the matter of foreign-made goods:

THE KILBOURN KNITTING MACHINE CO.,
New Brunswick, N. J., July 31, 1911.

DEAR SIR: One advantage the importer has over the domestic manufacturer, which may not have been pointed out to you, is due to the Government bonded-warehousing arrangement, through the operation of which, we are informed, the importer may delay paying his duty for a period not exceeding three years, in addition to which he gets cheap storage for this product.

For example, the domestic manufacturer whose business requires a stock of 100,000 dozens, costing $150,000, has the latter amount tied up in capital requirements for stock alone. The importer, however, who carries the same amount of stock, costing him, duty paid, the same amount of money, pays out less than $1 a dozen to the German manufacturer and conducts his business on less than $100,000 of capital. He does not pay the duty until he takes the goods out of bonded warehouse for delivery to his customers, which, of course, is not until they are sold, and his capital requirements are consequently considerably less to do the same amount of business—a somewhat hidden advantage in favor of the German manufacturers. Even with a duty of 50 per cent, he would only require approximately two-thirds the capital that would be required by the American manufacturer to conduct the same business on goods of the same value in this country, as you will see from the above.

Very truly, yours, JOHN WYCKOFF METTLER,
Vice President.

THE WEST HEARD FROM.

Here are resolutions passed by the Middle States Textile Manufacturers' Association, Cannelton, Ind.:

MIDDLE STATES TEXTILE MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION,
Cannelton, Ind., July 26, 1911.

In convention assembled at French Lick Springs, July 19, 1911, the Middle States Textile Manufacturers' Association passed the following resolution:

"First. The continued agitation of the tariff question is detrimental to the interests of all manufacturers and merchants.

"Second. That Congress should appoint a permanent tariff commission and leave the adjustment of rates entirely in the hands of this commission."

The textile interests of the United States have enough troubles to contend with without being made the goat in the revision of the tariff merely to gratify the personal ambitions of professional politicians. It is up to every manufacturer to do his part in securing a reasonable and sensible handling of tariff questions.

Yours, for action, LEE RODMAN, Secretary.

NO APPLAUSE FOR THE INVESTORS.

These quotations and letters, Mr. Chairman, might be extended by the hundreds. They fairly represent the feeling of that great body of industrialists who have undertaken in the United States to utilize the chief staple of the South. In the census reports it appears that these men represent a combined investment, in establishments and machinery, of approximately $800,000,000, which establishments in the various branches of cotton manufacture give employment to 370,000 wage earners, a large proportion of whom are residents of the cotton-growing district. And while the Ways and Means Committee's report traces with pride the development of cotton production in the United States and glows with description of the process of manufacture and the growth of allied industries, there is no response to the appeals of those active and progressive forces in our industrial life who purchase the raw material and for wages and for profit fashion it into the form which brings it back to the consumer. There is, indeed, on page 5 a recital of the struggles of the Colonies to manufacture cotton and of the methods subsequently employed to protect the Colonies against England's rapacious eye for cotton and the right to knit it, but there is nowhere a sign of recognition for the Democrats and the Republicans alike, who were venturesome enough to invest their money and encourage labor in these commendable American enterprises.

WHO IS FOOLING THE WORKINGMAN?

And perhaps the reason for all this may be traced to the Democratic caucus, that caucus which has agreed to act as one man for the overthrow of the "robber baron" of industry and for the election of a nonprotection Democrat to the Executive chair. I can not quote him literally, for his speech has not been printed, but the House will recall the gallant charge of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] upon the breastworks of the Republican Party when he asserted that it was only "by fooling the workingman" with the pretense of protection that we had been able to maintain political supremacy in the United States. Have we been fooling the workingman by enacting legislation that has aided in providing employment? In the report presented by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], on page 6, there is an interesting table, which gives a comparative summary of cotton goods in the United States for the 30 years from 1879 to 1909. With the exception of the Wilson-Gorman period, these were protective-tariff years. Says the report:

This table indicates a remarkable increase in the capital invested, the number of wage earners, the amount of wages paid, value of products, the number of spindles, and the amount of cotton consumed—all combining to show the actual progress of the industry. The steady and continuous increase in the number of wage earners, spindles operated, and the quantity of cotton consumed are the best indices to the progress of the industry and especially worthy of notice. The United States now consumes approximately two-thirds of its cotton crop, which is about equally divided between the mills of the Northern and the Southern States.

A TELLTALE TABLE.

The summary is so interesting that I reproduce it in full. It is a Democratic confession that under a protective tariff system the manufacture of cotton has developed successfully both North and South; that capital invested has quadrupled in 30 years; and that the number of wage earners has doubled:

FOURFOLD INCREASE SOUTH.

And I am sure every Republican will rejoice at the additional committee statement that in the Southern States there has been a great proportional increase in manufactures, which is conceded by this report to be 657 establishments in 1909 as against 161 establishments in 1879. The capital invested in these southern enterprises in 1879 was $17,000,000, and the capital invested in 1909 was $350,000,000. The gentleman from Alabama in his report shows some degree of pride in this southern development, notwithstanding the drastic action of the Democratic caucus in refusing a hearing to the cotton manufacturers, for on page 8 he says:

To show the almost incredible increase which has taken place in the industry in the Southern States it may be stated that the figures of this table indicate that the capital invested has increased more than 1,900 per cent since 1879, the spindles more than 1,750 per cent, looms at about the same rate, the value of products more than 1,300 per cent, and the quantity of cotton consumed about 1,200 per cent.

Prior to 1880 there was relatively little cotton manufacturing south of the city of Washington, but that year a cotton exposition at Atlanta gave it a great impetus, which has continued almost uninterrupted to the present time. For example, in the three decades from 1879 to 1909 the increase in raw-cotton consumption for the world was about 150 per cent, that of the United States more than 200 per cent, while that of the Southern States increased more than 1,200 per cent. During the decade ending with 1909 the capital invested in the industry in these States increased about 185 per cent, the number of spindles about 142 per cent, looms over 500 per cent, the quantity of cotton consumed 66 per cent, and the value of products 143 per cent. The marvelous progress in recent years is the most striking feature of this great industry in America.

SOUTHERN DEVELOPMENT SURE.

Mr. Chairman, no man in this House desires more than I do to see the South develop both industrially and in the matter of agriculture. The resources of that section of our common country are rich and practically unlimited, and the surface of its wealth has only been scratched. That it is developing, and in spite of all traditions and handicaps, will continue to develop is best shown by the wonderful progress of industrial establishments in every one of the Southern States during the five years between 1904 and 1909. I append herewith extracts from such recent census reports as I have been able to obtain, showing the increase in the number of establishments and the increase in capital invested in various Southern States:

THEIR OWN FUNERAL.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. AKIN of New York. I notice in the quotation of letters from various portions of the United States you did not quote any from Amsterdam or from Albany, N. Y.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; I had a private conversation with the gentleman from New York, in which he told me that the mills of that section had no interest in the coming bill.

Mr. AKIN of New York. And the gentleman did not quote any letters from there upon that point?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; I did not seek any.

Mr. AKIN of New York. And the gentleman has not got any?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; I presumed they have no concern about it, and it is their own funeral.

THE SUPPLY OF RAW COTTON.

So it is admitted that the cotton fields of the Southern States were attractive to both capital and labor, which gradually moved down from the old manufacturing centers of New England and the Middle States to be the better enabled, through proximity with the supply of raw material, to compete in the American market and for the world's trade.

The world's production of raw cotton is shown by diagrams to depend chiefly upon the production of the United States. That is to say, the world's production of raw cotton for mill consumption in 1910 was in excess of 19,000,000 bales of 500 pounds, of which the United States produced approximately 11,500,000 bales. Another census table in the report shows that of the total supply of cotton produced in the United States for the six-months period ending February 28, 1911, 49 per cent was exported, 19 per cent was consumed in the United States, and 32 per cent remained for export and domestic consumption. For the year ending August, 1910, the proportion of the total cotton production consumed in the United States was only 39 per cent, while 52 per cent was exported and 9 per cent remained for export or local consumption. Our exports of raw cotton to be fabricated in foreign countries vastly exceeds the raw cotton sold in the United States for domestic use, but our imports of foreign raw cotton are insignificant, being for the six months period ending February 28, 1911, only 136,000 bales.

From this hurried perusal of the committee's statistics, it may be set down as definite, first, that the Southern States which grow cotton, having a monopoly of the domestic market, are disposed to maintain their trade relations with foreign manufacturers by reducing tariff duties so that manufactures of American cotton in foreign mills may profitably return to the United States market. These are material factors which may help to determine the attitude of the Democratic Ways and Means Committee toward the American manufacturer who has had the temerity to invest his money and employ labor in the hope that he might rival his foreign competitors at least in his own country.

SPINDLES INCREASING; ALSO KNOCKS.

And yet on page 4 the Ways and Means Committee, with some degree of satisfaction, tells of the success of the American manufacturer in pushing himself into the competition. True, he does not begin to equal the foreigner in the extent of his output, but in 1900, the report says, the number of spindles in the United States was 19,472,000. This number had increased in 1911 to 29,189,000, and yet, with a virtual monopoly of raw material at our own door and with the American industrialist endeavoring to draw closer to the market for raw material, the number of spindles in the United Kingdom had grown to 53,000,000 in 1910, while in Continental Europe they had increased to 40,700,000. The proportional increase in the number of spindles was greater in the United States than it was in Great Britain or in Europe, showing an evident desire upon the part of the American worker to take the product of the South and to work it up under American conditions for both the home and the foreign market. The committee reports this progress of the hustling American industrialist, but lays in wait for the "robber baron" with a "tariff-for-revenue" club that proposes to hit every spindle in the United States and discourage every man who has gone into the race for the cotton-goods trade.

ARE WE HEADED BACKWARDS?

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is inconceivable that Representatives of the cotton-growing section should seek to choke off the domestic industries that tend to create a wider market for raw cotton. Surely we are not going backward, nor is the spirit of unrest which sometimes gives occasion for doubt as to the perpetuity of our institutions, headed toward the confiscation or destruction of property. Nor can it be our purpose, no matter what our national advantages in certain sections, that we shall labor for those whose allegiance is elsewhere, as against the interests and welfare of our own citizenship. The Democratic leaders contend that protection has served to fool the workingman. With raw cotton sure of a market, they have denied a hearing to those who are vitally interested in the cotton schedule. They have acted in seeming disregard of the workers in the mills, boldly asserting that their revision of the tariff is not for the protection of anybody, but is solely for the purpose of raising revenue. As I understand it, the revenue which runs a government comes from the body of the people, and is contributed alike by the rich and poor. By levying duties at the customhouse against foreign-made luxuries and commodities, Republicans have promoted employment for American workingmen and placed the burden of taxation, not upon the poor, but upon those who preferred to spend their money in foreign countries rather than in the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

WHEN HEARINGS WERE OPEN.

When the Republican Ways and Means Committee had its hearings in 1908, there were many spokesmen from cotton-growing States who appeared in favor of a duty upon cotton. They sought, in particular, to have a duty levied upon foreign imports of cotton with the view of developing sea-island cotton. They told the country of the deplorable wage conditions that prevailed in the cotton fields, and they pleaded for the retention of such duties as would widen both the demand for cotton and cotton manufactures. Now, in spite of all the progress that has been made and of the protection sentiment that has been attracting capital and industry into the Southern States, we are told by the Democratic leaders that we must have more imports of foreign commodities and less domestic manufactures.

WORKINGMEN DEMANDED INCREASE.

I well recall a meeting in my own district when the effort was made to increase the Dingley law rates upon hosiery. We had undertaken to rival the German and British makers, but owing to their cheap and superior facilities for manufacture and partly because of an existing trade agreement in which they had the best of it, the American market was being flooded with hosiery from abroad. Our mills were running upon half time, and at the meeting referred to no less than 2,000 working men and women appeared, many of them coming as representatives from the mills in New England and the South. They asked then that the rates of duty be increased so that the difference in overhead charges and labor cost might be covered and the American workman put in a fair way to compete with the foreign workman. Their sentiments were subsequently embodied in a petition which bore 10,000 signatures, which they brought to Washington as a demand for protection against wage reduction and slack work.

But the gentleman from Alabama declares that the Republican Party has kept itself in power by deceiving the American workingman. We have insisted that the protective system has advanced the wage of the American worker and has given him a better standard of living than his foreign competitors enjoy. The taunt of the gentleman from Alabama has been echoed by many speakers upon the other side, who demand the overthrow of protection. It is therefore fair to present to the House some facts which the gentlemen upon the other side do not apparently desire to present to the workingman of the country.

SOME SERIOUS LABOR FACTS.

In the bulletin of the Bureau of Labor for March, 1911, is an abstract of the British Board of Trade report to the Government. It gives the predominant range of weekly wages in certain selected trades in England and Wales, Germany, France, Belgium, and Great Britain. A perusal of these figures will help to explain the reason for sending American cotton abroad to be made up into cheap garments to be returned for consumption in the United States. I append them herewith:

Reduced to plain English which every one of us may readily understand, this compilation means that on the average the workingman who receives $2.43 in the building trades in the United States receives $1 abroad; that the man who receives $2.13 in the engineering trades in the United States, receives $1 abroad, and that the man who receives $2.46 as a printer or compositor in the United States, receives but $1 abroad.

COMPARISONS CARRIED FURTHER.

These figures which come from official British sources are so plainly indicative of the necessity for an American barrier to protect labor "that he who runs may read." But this British board of trade report goes into the relative cost of living, and the housing conditions of the working people of the several countries specified, and what the London Times had to say upon this phase of the question is illuminating. I quote the Times as follows:

The broad upshot of the reports dealing with European countries, including our own, has been to show that in regard to the conditions investigated the artisan in this country has, in a varying degree, the advantage over his fellows in Germany, France, or Belgium. He earns somewhat higher wages, works somewhat shorter hours, and pays somewhat less for the necessaries of life. Without going into qualifying details or minor distinctions we may accept that as the broad result. But when we come to the United States the picture is turned almost completely around. From the abstract which we publish to-day the reader will see that the workman in America enjoys an enormous advantage over his fellow in England, an advantage far greater than the latter enjoys over the German or the Frenchman. He earns more than two and a quarter times as much money and works shorter hours for it; so that his hourly rate of earnings is as 240 to 100, or pretty nearly twice and a half as much. Against that enormous difference in wages there is something to be set in the way of expenditure. Rent is twice as high and food is about one-third higher than in England, but the cost of living altogether is only as 152 to 100, or about half as much again.

Now, these facts completely dispose of two widely current misconceptions or misstatements. One is that the higher wages admittedly paid in America are all swallowed up and more by the higher cost of living, which is believed to surpass the standard of this country in regard to the necessaries of life by an enormous amount, and to constitute an intolerable burden. The present report explicitly states the contrary at the conclusion of a long, elaborate, and extremely careful comparison of the two countries. In the United States, it says, a much greater margin of earnings over cost of living is available, even when allowance has been made for the increased expenditure on food and rent. "The margin is clearly large, making possible a command of the necessaries and conveniences and minor luxuries of life that is both nominally and really greater than that enjoyed by the corresponding class in this country."

WHICH WOULD YOU HAVE?

Which would you rather have, my friends on the Democratic side, the English, French, or German system? These are authentic figures carefully compiled by a great nation. Supplementing this official statement, I challenge a denial from any man in this House who has been in England and observed for himself. I never have seen in the streets of New York, Philadelphia, or Savannah conditions of the human kind so deplorable as those I have seen in London, Liverpool, and Manchester. Choose for yourself. The workingman is able to choose for himself, and it is the secret of his desire to leave the old country and come to this.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will, although my time has nearly expired.

LABOR CONDITIONS IN TEXAS.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I understand the gentleman to take the position that laborers in the industries not protected are doing as well as those in the industries that are protected. Does not that show that protection does not favor the laborers to any extent?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Our contention is that everyone is benefited by protection. When we have protection, we benefit the Democrat in spite of himself, and also the Socialist.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. It is easy to contend that; but is it not a fact that the laborers in the industries not protected are in a better condition than those in the classes that are protected?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In some trades, yes; in some trades, no. In the building trades, if you say they are not protected, I say to you they are better paid. If you will take up the cotton fields, where they have no protection upon raw cotton, I will say they are not so well paid.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Is it not a fact that the trouble with the cotton mills in the South is the labor is so much better paid on the plantation than in the cotton mills that they can not keep their employees?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, so long as the gentleman has raised the question, I will take occasion, although I had not intended to do it, to read from the hearings of the old Ways and Means Committee, page 4455, a statement by Mr. John C. Cawlfield, of Stockdale, Tex., asking for a tariff upon cotton. He said:

We see by the tariff that almost every branch of industry but the cotton raiser is protected against pauper labor. Those engaged in producing cotton consist of millionaires—

MILLIONAIRES DOWN SOUTH.

Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to say this and have it repeated in this House, because the inference has always been—and these are my own words—that the only millionaires were the men engaged in the industries, but here is a gentleman who actually observes that—those engaged in producing cotton consist of millionaires, who own thousands of acres of land, down to the man who is so poor that he does not own a weeding hoe.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Is it not a fact then——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman does not want me to read this I will cease reading, because I had not any desire to read it.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I judge from what the gentleman has read that the witness states that those who produce cotton are some of them millionaires and some of them so poor they hardly own a hoe.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the way I interpret it.

Mr. RANDELL OF Texas. All classes, so far as wealth is concerned, are engaged in cotton raising.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I so interpret it. I understand the witness to say that——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. That would not be in order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, being in control of the time on this side of the House, as I understand it, I will extend the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania for an indefinite period, and I hope he will not be too long. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania will understand that we would be very glad to stay here and listen indefinitely to him, but there are gentlemen on this side who desire to be heard to-night.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I endeavored to get an agreement from the gentlemen on the other side before we began this discussion, but was utterly unable to do so, and so I proceeded ex parte.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I will inform the gentleman that we ask for only one hour on this side this evening.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman surely would not close me off on a discussion about so important a matter as this when we have just reached the cotton fields of Texas.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I would not do it if I had the power, but I hope the gentleman will remember that there are gentlemen on this side who desire to be heard and that he will not be too lenient in extending time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Much of my time has been taken by questions which I tried to answer, although I did not answer the gentleman from New York on one occasion when he asked me to yield. I will try to get through in half an hour.

I was saying to the gentleman from Texas that it was a surprising statement to those of us who come from the northern tier—and I say that, of course, without sectional feeling—to find that there were in the South, which so belabors certain other sections of the country where men acquire wealth, certain people who were classed as millionaires.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

KNOWS BUT ONE RICH MAN.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I know of but one millionaire cotton raiser in Texas—there may be others—and he is the distinguished brother of the President, and he does not live in Texas.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am delighted that the brother of the President has the good judgment to go down to a fertile country and work his way up in it. I am endeavoring to get other men to go there, and all that I ask is that they be properly protected when they go there. I do not think I shall pursue this discussion about millionaires, but I will quote a little further from the testimony of this gentleman who came up from Stockdale, Tex., asking protection for cotton. Now, getting away from the millionaire question, he said, and it is only fair, since the question has been raised, that this should go into the RECORD:

The laborers who actually produce the cotton do not receive on an average more than 75 cents per day for men; women and children, 37½ cents per day.

WOMEN IN THE FIELDS.

Now, we hear a great deal about women and children working in the mills, but it now appears that they work in the cotton fields and get 37½ cents a day. The witness further says:

The children of these families in scholastic age do not attend school, on an average, more than two months in the year, which the enrollment and daily-attendance roll will show.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. As a matter of fact I am a farmer myself and I know that statement in reference to wages is entirely false. The fact of the matter is the cotton fields take the labor away from the cotton mills in my district. They take away the workmen from the mills in the spring and fall when they chop and pick cotton. The labor is taken away from these mills and that is the main trouble.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have hesitated to bring this statement forward, but the gentleman raised the question himself. If the gentleman tells me that the statement is false I accept it, but I expect him to accept my statement that much of this talk in regard to poverty wages paid in the North is also false. Let us be fair with one another. [Applause on the Republican side.] Now, let us go on.

I was beginning to quote from the Bureau of Labor showing the increase of wages in the United States and the reduction in the hours of labor. I know some men who preach the labor doctrine, some men who claim to be the best friends of the working men, some men who stand out always in the limelight and have an awful time lifting the "iron heel of the tyrant from the neck of the wretched," may dispute these figures, but I think the sensible, everyday working man, whether he belongs to the union or whether he does not, will accept the statement as it comes from the Bureau of Labor with regard to the improved conditions which prevail in this country over those that prevail in others.

ALL CLASSES BENEFITED BY PROTECTION.

Nor is this all there is to be said upon the subject. The Republican Party has not deceived the working man, but has closely watched his interests in every protective measure. The bulletin of the Bureau of Labor for July, 1908, presents an article showing the gradual increase in wages in the United States and the gradual reduction of hours of labor from the average rate paid in the decade between 1890 and 1899, and the year 1907. These were all protection years and it will be noted in the table presented herewith that so-called nonprotected trades shared proportionately with the so-called protected trades, thus demonstrating the general benefits and advantages of protection:

Per cent of increase or decrease in wages per hour and in hours of labor per week in 1907 as compared with the average for 1890–1899, by industries.

ADVANCE IN LABOR'S WAGE.

This is a long list of specified occupations which have been beneficiaries of improved labor conditions in the United States, due to the operation of the protective tariff system, due to the influence of the labor unions, due to the consideration of the lawmaking bodies, and due to the tolerance and the consideration of the employer of labor, and the average increase in wages in all these trades during this period of years was 28.8 and the average reduction in hours was just 5 hours per week. Is there such a condition, may I ask, Democrats or even Republicans, prevailing in any country in the world as prevails in the labor field in the United States? And these conditions are the product of protective-tariff years.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to his colleague?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I understand that the gentleman takes these figures from the report of the Bureau of Statistics relative to wages during the past 10 years?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Bureau of Labor, July, 1908. Wages increased, hours of labor decreased during the average as between the decade from 1890 and 1899 and 1907—substantially a period of 17 years.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Did the gentleman at the same time take from the same source the average increase in the cost of living? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am very glad some one on that side applauds that statement, because I have just quoted the British Board of Trade report showing that there is an increase in the cost of living on that side. I am sufficiently informed upon current events to say that the increase in the cost of living has not been special to the United States, but has been world-wide and every country has been equally affected. [Applause on the Republican side.]

INFLUENCE OF LABOR UNIONS.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman knows that the same report he quotes from in regard to the average increase of wages also makes statements relative to the average increased cost of living during the same period of time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand the gentleman's question, and I think I have answered it. I say that the increase in the cost of living has not been special to the United States, but has been world-wide. But I will say to the gentleman that while I intend to say a little more about the cost of living before long, there is no country in the world where the people have been buying such fine hosiery, such luxuries, such good clothing, and where they have been living so well, and where they have been using up so many automobiles as in the United States.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The gentleman also quotes the average increase in wages and the average reduction in hours in various trades in the United States. Does the gentleman know of any trade in this country where the hours of labor have been reduced, whether a protected trade or otherwise, where a labor organization has not been responsible for the decrease in the hours of labor?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman, before I answer his question, how many working people there are in the United States?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Do you mean wageworkers?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I mean people who earn their living by the sweat of their brow. How many of them are there altogether? We have 92,000,000 of population; how many of them earn a living?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I have not the figures exact as to the number that earn a living.

WORKERS ORGANIZED AND UNORGANIZED.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman is an expert in labor matters, and I respect his opinion. I appreciate all he is doing for labor. I would like to know, because he ought to know, how many men and women there are in the United States who work for a living.

Mr. BERGER. Thirty-one million.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania accept those figures?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I do not know how many men and women work for a living, but I do know that the great bulk of men and women and children over 12 years of age work for a living in the United States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Suppose we accept 30,000,000 as the actual number who work for a living in the United States and use that as the basis, will you tell me how many people are enlisted under the banner of organized labor in the United States?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. There are somewhere in the neighborhood of 3,000,000 wage earners who are in labor organizations.

Mr. BERGER. Two and one-half millions.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. There are over 2,000,000 who are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and then there are, in addition to that, a number of trade unionists that are not affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, such as the railroad employees. There are about 3,000,000 of them. The point I ask the gentleman is this: Does he know of any trade in this country where the hours of labor have been reduced except through the efforts of a labor organization?

LABOR'S RIGHT TO ORGANIZE.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman, because I am as much a friend of the labor unions as he is, although he is much more active, that his answer to my question answers his own. If there are but 3,000,000 organized laborers in the United States and there are 30,000,000 laborers, it does not follow that the increase in the wages or the decrease in the hours of labor have been wholly due to the influence of the 3,000,000. But I will say this to the gentleman, that wherever the 3,000,000 have had their influence, and wherever they have been wisely organized and kept within proper bounds, observing the law, following out those principles for which they were organized, going about it upon a reasonable basis, they have contributed to the reduction of the hours of labor and they have contributed to the increase in wages. And I will say more to the gentleman; if self-respecting laborers, organized for the purpose of mutual benefit and advancement, were to organize more thoroughly and stand together more compactly, which they have an equal right to do, with the manufacturers or employers in the land, and proceed in order, they would succeed in further improving the labor conditions in the United States, in increasing the wages, and in reducing the hours. But the gentleman knows as well as any man upon this floor that it is because of lack of organization, it is because of leadership that often becomes selfish and arrogant, it is because after an advantage has been obtained by one separate union, or for one man in a union, and the dues begin to fall off, the union falls back and loses its power. The gentleman knows full well that where the union goes forward and conducts itself in lawful manner and acts with reason it can improve and does improve labor conditions.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield further to his colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. WILSON?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do.

ATTITUDE OF EMPLOYERS.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact that manufacturers as a rule, or employers as a rule, will not pay any higher wages or give any better conditions of employment than the market conditions of labor compel them to give?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That may be conceded, but I have had a long-standing belief that organized labor sometimes fixes at a minimum the earning capacity of a member of the union, because it prevents his individuality and incentive from making itself known to the employer, and instead of the union being a real factor in enabling him to advance and improve his condition, he is by reason of his very environment and his obligation to the union, making himself a mere cog in the wheel, and establishing a low standard, from which by his union he is prevented from rising, except as all rise in a body—this especially as to unskilled labor.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The gentleman knows from personal experience that in any large industrial establishment, even where there is no labor organization in existence, the employer himself makes a uniform standard for the different grades of workingmen, irrespective of what the capacity of the individual workingman may be, and the union has to deal with that uniform standard when it comes to make a wage scale with the employer.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not always. I think that where the representatives of the union confer with the employer, the committee stands for the body of the workingmen and fixes the terms, and thus the workingman accepts them with the knowledge of the union, and each individual becomes part of the machine, subject to the committee, and thereby sinks his individuality to that extent.

TARIFF HELPS THE EMPLOYED.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman knows anything about the making of wage agreements, he must know that the labor organizations do not insist upon a uniform rate for the men, but that they do stand for a minimum rate and do not care how much above that the employer pays.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And I presume by the same token that the committee representing the union stands for the maximum and then accepts a compromise.

Now, I think, as my time is passing rapidly, I had better proceed. I want to say, however, just one more word to my friend from Pennsylvania, and that is that while the labor conditions in the United States are better than they are abroad, due to the tariff, the unions, and other conditions, still, laboring men, so far as the influence of the union to improve their conditions is concerned, are better organized in Great Britain than in the United States. Hence I ask, Why is not their condition better in Great Britain than it is here?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman want me to answer his question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman desires an answer I will give it to him.

ENGLISH LABOR ORGANIZED BUT POORLY PAID.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I must go on if I am to get through in the 10 minutes that are left to me. If the gentleman will reply to my question in a single answer, I will yield to him. Is it not a fact that in proportion to population the men organized in the unions of Great Britain are better organized than those in the United States?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. There are two parts to the question. They are better organized in England than in the United States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then why is their condition not better there than it is here?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Because in the United States the average productivity of the workingman is $2,400 per annum, while in England the average productivity of the workingman is $556 per annum. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman for that statement, because it refutes statements and assertions repeatedly made by gentlemen on the other side with regard to the relative efficiency of European and American workingmen. I call on gentlemen to witness the testimony of a half dozen Members who have spoken on the other side, who have asserted that the skill of workingmen abroad was of a higher grade than that of workingmen in the United States. I thank the gentleman, because he speaks with authority, from the standpoint of the union man.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield further to his colleague?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I regret that I must hurry along.

AMERICAN WAGES SWORN TO.

And while we are considering the action of the Democratic Ways and Means Committee in refusing hearings to interested parties, let us recall the many months of public hearings accorded in 1908 by the Ways and Means Committee of which the Republican, Mr. PAYNE, was chairman. Hundreds of witnesses appeared and thousands of communications and petitions were considered before the committee framed its report. Among other important data to be found in those proceedings are a series of affidavits, not mere petitions, but sworn statements, as to the cost of labor in the hosiery trade in the United States. It is not necessary to reproduce all of these affidavits—they may be found in volume 32 of the Tariff Hearings of 1908—but I shall present two of them which show the American standard of wages, which is twice that of England and two-thirds more than that in Germany. Let these affidavits speak for themselves:

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA,
County of Philadelphia, ss:

Personally appeared before me, a notary public, residing at Philadelphia, in and for said county and State, Reinhard Huettig, secretary and manager of the German-American Hosiery Co., a corporation of Philadelphia, Pa., who, being duly sworn according to law, says that the following list of wages paid at the present time at the hosiery mill of the above corporation at Philadelphia, Pa., was copied from the weekly pay roll of the said German-American Hosiery Co., and are true and correct both as to the weekly averages and piecework earned by the different classes of operators; that to the best of his knowledge and belief there is no material difference between the wages paid for the same kind of work in the different sections of the United States, and that the following schedule of rates for piecework and the list of weekly averages constitute a fair basis for calculating the cost in the hosiery factories of the United States of such lines of goods as are coming in most direct competition with foreign, and especially German, goods:

(1) Average weekly wages paid:

[SEAL.] GEO. E. GRIFFIN, Notary Public.

That is enough to show the average, and I am going to ask the gentlemen upon the other side who worry about the wages paid in the mills to compare those wages paid to women working in the mills with the wages of school-teachers in the common schools, who have to acquire an education to teach the young idea of this country its duties in citizenship.

DECLINED TO VISIT THE MILLS.

So far as the hosiery branch of the cotton business is concerned, I desire to say that, notwithstanding the special assaults that have been made upon the Payne rates, even an invitation to members of the Ways and Means Committee to investigate the cost of production at the mills was not accepted. The Knitted Cotton Underwear Association was equally desirous of being heard, and, if need be, investigated. I submit a brief which this association laid before the committee:

Hon. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD,
Chairman Ways and Means Committee, Washington, D. C.

SIR: The knitted cotton underwear manufacturers' tariff committee of the National Association of Hosiery and Underwear Manufacturers submit for the consideration of the Ways and Means Committee the following pertaining to their industry:

The present tariff rate under the Payne-Aldrich law is exactly the same as under the Dingley law, there having been no change or increase of rates whatsoever.

At the time of the tariff hearing before the Committee of Ways and Means in the House of Representatives, Sixtieth Congress, our committee stated the following facts, which we deem worthy of repetition.

"There has never been a trust or combination formed by the manufacturers of knitted cotton underwear for the purpose of controlling either output or selling price, the nature of the business being such that it can be engaged in by small manufacturers with limited means in almost any community.

"The average rate of wages paid to skilled women sewing-machine operators in the United States varies from $1.50 to $2 per day. The same class of labor in France, Germany, and Switzerland receives from 30 cents to 50 cents per day.

"Wages paid winders or spoolers in the United States varies from $1.50 to $1.75 per day. The same class of labor in the countries named receives from 35 cents to 40 cents per day.

"Wages paid knitters in the United States varies from $1.25 to $2 per day. The same class of labor in the countries named receives from 35 cents to 75 cents per day.

"The items of labor entering into the manufacture of cotton knitted underwear, over and above the actual cost of the staple, represents fully 75 per cent of the total."

For some years past the bulk of imports of knitted cotton underwear has been comparatively small, owing to the rapid development of the industry in the United States as well as the steady improvement of the domestic product.

The number of concerns engaged in the making of knitted cotton underwear having practically doubled in the past 10 years, has brought about the keenest and strongest possible competition, and as a result the consumer has been enabled to buy superior domestic-made garments and has never suffered to the slightest extent as a result of the existing tariff rates, which we believe are as low as they should be with the existing American standard of wages.

As an example, we cite the chief item of import, which is represented by a garment sold to the consumer at 50 cents each. These goods are sold in France at 12½ francs, or $2.50 per dozen, and can be landed and sold at any eastern port of entry in the United States at $4 per dozen. Similar goods made in the United States are sold, plus a profit of 7½ per cent, at about $3.85 per dozen, illustrating the small factor of safety left to the domestic manufacturer.

This committee is in a position to demonstrate that the difference in the cost of labor between the foreign and domestic articles mentioned is at least $1.35 per dozen, whereas the protection afforded by the present tariff law amounts to $1.45 per dozen.

It is our firm belief that it will be to the best interest of the consumer and the wage earners employed in our industry, and to the knitted-goods manufacturers in the United States, as well as those engaged in the spinning of cotton yarns in the South, and other dependent industries representing nearly every State in the Union, that the present schedule of duties should be maintained.

Respectfully submitted.

RESOLUTIONS FROM COTTON STATES.

To this plain statement of the inequalities of foreign and domestic manufactures and wages may be added the following resolution, which comes up from the Carolinas and Virginia:

CAROLINAS AND VIRGINIA HOSIERY ASSOCIATION,
Raleigh, N. C., June 30, 1911.

At a meeting, held June 24 at the Monticello Hotel, of the Hosiery Manufacturers of North Carolina, Virginia, and Tennessee, the following resolutions were adopted:

"Resolved, That a reduction in rates of duty on hosiery would add another burden to those we now have to contend with, such as high price of cotton, strong home competition, and depression resulting from tariff agitation.

"It is the sense of this convention, composed of hosiery manufacturers in North Carolina and Virginia, that cotton should be used in our mills instead of going abroad to provide employment for foreign workers, which would be the case if duties were lowered.

"For these reasons we respectfully request the Members of Congress and of the Ways and Means Committee especially not to disturb the rates of duty on hosiery."

C. McL. CARR, President.
ERNEST MARTIN, Secretary.

THE HOSIERY TRADE AFFECTED.

In the hosiery trade, to which the foregoing communication applies and to which I shall direct the attention of the House for a few moments, we find upon consulting the report of the Ways and Means Committee (p. 55) that the imports of the popular makes amounted, under the Payne bill, up to June 30, 1910, to over $6,000,000. The duties exceeded $4,300,000. The chairman of the committee insists that the rate of duty, which was equivalent to 71.57 per cent, was too high, and yet, in spite of the fact that on certain grades of hosiery the unit foreign value per dozen was 87 cents, the labor value alone in the United States would have been 74 cents. To prevent the American manufacturer from making any profit between his labor cost of 74 cents—to say nothing of all the other charges—and the 87 cents of foreign selling value, the gentleman from Alabama proposes to lower the duty from 71.57 per cent to 35 and 40 per cent ad valorem, so that importations may be increased and the duties reduced. In other words, the Underwood bill proposes to cut off $3,000,000 of revenue on the entire cotton schedule by increasing the importation of foreign hosiery from $6,000,000 to nearly $8,000,000 of value; and, on hosiery alone, to reduce the revenue from $4,300,000 to $3,100,000, a net reduction on this item of $1,200,000.

SUPPRESSING THE HOSIERY MAN.

I append the Democratic plan of suppressing the American manufacturer, and commend it most heartily to the careful consideration of the American workingman as well as to the American taxpayer:

On stockings, hose and half-hose, selvedged, fashioned, narrowed, or shaped wholly or in part by knitting machines or frames, or knit by hand, including such as are commercially known as seamless stockings, hose and half-hose, and clocked stockings, hose and half-hose, on all of the above composed of cotton or other vegetable fiber, finished or unfinished, 40 per cent ad valorem. On men's and boys' cotton gloves, knitted or woven, 35 per cent ad valorem.

Item.	Present act—Results for year ending June 30, 1910.	Proposed act—Estimated results for a 12-month period.
Imports	$6,059,663.64	$7,972,500.00
Duties	$4,336,858.86	$3,168,800.00
Equivalent ad valorem rate.....per cent..	71.57	40 and 35

CONSUMERS' PRICES DO NOT CHANGE.

It is commonly stated in the trade, and I believe it to be true, that there is little variation in the price of hosiery to the consumer at any time, tariff or no tariff, so that there is no warrant in attacking this item because of increased living cost. In fact, it is asserted that the 1911 prices are somewhat lower than they were in 1901, notwithstanding the increase of about 100 per cent in the cost of yarn and a general advance in wages. The accompanying statement is intended to show the relationship of the manufacturer of hosiery to the jobber and consumer with respect to price:

Prices at which seamless hose are sold to the consumer, per dozen:

The selling prices of the retailer never change, always being 25 cents, 35 cents, 50 cents, 75 cents, and $1 for fashioned hose, and 10 cents, 12½ cents, 15 cents, 20 cents, and 25 cents for seamless hose.

GERMAN INROADS CHECKED.

Without attempting or desiring to confuse the House with regard to the technicalities of the hosiery schedule, I shall explain, in the plainest possible language, one or two features of the transition from the Dingley bill to the Payne bill which the country ought to understand. In the first place it was contended by manufacturers and workingmen alike that the Dingley rates were not sufficient to protect this country against the manufactories of Chemnitz and other foreign hosiery manufacturing centers. On certain popular grades which were largely imported under the Dingley law a barrier of 50 cents per dozen, with an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent, was raised at the customhouse. This barrier, taken for purposes of illustration, was not sufficient to check foreign imports enough to enable the American mills to run full time. Our workmen were given half time, or slack work, under this law. The Payne law raised the barrier from 50 cents per dozen plus 15 per cent ad valorem to 70 cents per dozen plus 15 per cent ad valorem; that is, the barrier was raised just 20 cents per dozen on these popular grades.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not wish the gentleman to interrupt me until I finish this illustration, and then I will yield.

Mr. FOWLER. All right.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The German cost of overhead charges being about one-half of those of the United States, and the labor cost being about one-third, we could not make hosiery upon this side of the water without a corresponding reduction in the cost of production. Under the Dingley law the unit foreign value of the popular grade of hosiery to which I now refer was 95 cents per dozen. The tariff barrier raised the value of those goods when imported into this country to $1.59 per dozen on their arrival here.

That is to those of you who do not wear silk stockings, and to myself. [Laughter.]

It goes without saying, therefore, that if the German manufacturer could make these goods and deliver them on the other side for 95 cents per dozen, and the importer could pay the duty, bringing the value up to $1.59 per dozen, when they came into competition with American makes on this side of the water it would not be long before every American manufacturer and every workman employed by him would be out of business and the American market would be given over to those who can the more readily make cheap hosiery upon the other side. Now that was the reason for the insistent demand for an increase in the rates upon hosiery.

BUT THE GERMAN KEPT GOING.

Because of the inroads German-made goods were making upon American mill productions, and in response to the demand of the American mill workers, the Payne law gave the additional barrier of 20 cents, raising the duty as it now is to 70 cents per dozen plus 15 per cent ad valorem. Now, let us see how it affected the situation. Did the German manufacturer cease to send his goods into the United States? No; he did nothing of the sort. Still keen for the American market, and fully aware of his advantages over the American manufacturer, he reduced his own cost of production and incidentally the already miserable wages paid his employees in order to meet the new tariff conditions.

He met us when our prices went up by putting his prices down. He met us when we tried to pay our help more by reducing his labor pay, and through the connivance of the great importers of this country he still continues to get his goods in, and that is the reason why under the Payne law the hosiery mills have not been doing much more business than they did under the Dingley law. We attempted to protect, but we did not protect enough.

BARRIER NOT HIGH ENOUGH.

The barrier was not sufficiently high. They met us upon our own ground. They came in under the fence, and they are here to-day, and the rates under the Payne law, which you call iniquitous, are still insufficient to bar the ill-paid foreign-made hosiery. Customhouse figures, which I now have before me and which I shall insert in the RECORD, clearly indicate that the moment the Payne law became effective the foreign manufacturer at once prepared to meet the new American conditions, and that on the particular grade of hosiery which we are using for the purpose of illustration, he cut down the foreign selling value from 95 cents, as it was under the Dingley law, to 87 cents. At least, this was the price to which he had gone down in June, 1911. And it is an interesting fact that while he cut the foreign selling value from 95 cents under the Dingley law to 87 cents under the Payne law, cutting his profits 8 cents on the dozen, the importer who paid the duty and brought the goods into this country to compete with American-made goods brought them in at $1.59 under the Dingley law and rose only to $1.65 per dozen under the Payne law. In other words, while the foreign value was cut 8 cents a dozen the importer's value was cut only 6 cents a dozen, while the price to the consumer in the United States remains at exactly the same figures under the Payne law as it was under the Dingley law.

Mr. FOWLER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER]?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How much time have I, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has control of the time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to keep my agreement with the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used and hour and thirty minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield for one question.

MORE ABOUT HOSIERY.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] says that the Payne law raised the tariff on hosiery as it was fixed in the Dingley law. I ask him now if it is not a fact that that raise was made on the first three grades of stockings, and if on the first of them, which cost not above a dollar a dozen, that raise was not made 20 cents a dozen; on those that did not cost above $1.50 a dozen, if that raise was not made 25 cents a dozen; and on those which cost over $1.50 and not over $2 a dozen, if the raise was not made 20 cents; and on the other three grades, the rich grades, there was no raise made at all?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman that the duty was raised upon these grades that go into competition with the manufacturers of the United States; the duty was raised with a view of enabling the American manufacturers to compete with the cheap-made goods from other countries.

Mr. FOWLER. That was on the poor grades?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; the poor grades have been taxed by the Underwood bill and the higher grades lowered.

Mr. FOWLER. I am not talking about the Underwood bill. I desire to be honest with the gentleman about the matter. I want to know if it is not a fact now that these three poor grades of stockings were not raised in duty, as I have indicated?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I say the raise was made on the grades wherein the Germans had the advantage of us in competition; wherein our workmen were being put out of employment and our mills prevented from operating on that grade of goods. We raised the duty so as to make the terms equal, and so that the American manufacturer could compete with the other countries.

Mr. FOWLER. I want to say one thing and then I am done.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I shall have to ask the gentleman to excuse me. I am cutting this materially in order to be fair to gentlemen on the other side.

PROFIT PER DOZEN EXPLAINED.

It is obvious, therefore, that the Payne law did not increase the price to the consumer, although it did bring increased revenue to the Government, and gave additional impetus to American capital and industry. And to this statement should be added the further information that, because of the reduction of the cost of production in German mills and the threat of a Democratic revision of tariff, the American mills have not been able to work to their full capacity at any time since the Payne law was enacted. Before leaving this subject I should also say that, whereas on the popular grade of hosiery to which I have referred, the German manufacturer can produce and deliver in Germany, at 87 cents a dozen, the labor cost alone to the American manufacturer making similar goods is 74 cents. It does not require a great stretch of imagination nor much mathematical calculation to understand why a manufacturer employing labor in this country at 74 cents demands the protection of a tariff barrier against a foreign manufacturer who can build his mill, buy his machinery, provide the raw material, work up the yarn into the finished product, pay his labor and provide for pensions—as they do in Germany—all within the limit of 87 cents.

PRICE OF RAW COTTON COUNTS.

It is said that 1¾ pounds of cotton will make a dozen pairs of hosiery such as I have described. If cotton is worth 15 cents a pound, 26 cents is at once to be charged to the American price for a dozen pairs of hosiery. But raw cotton, like raw wool, must necessarily be treated and spun into yarn before it is available for knitting. All this requires outlay for plant, machinery, and labor. American manufacturers have gone forth in good faith to provide American consumers with an American-made article. They have appealed to the Ways and Means Committee to be allowed to continue their business on terms that will enable them to compete with foreign manufacturers. They have more than $800,000,000 invested in the various industries allied with cotton production, and in the manufacturing branch have employed more than 370,000 men and women. These are considerations which an American Congress ought not to deliberately ignore.

NO MARKET FOR KNIT GOODS IN CANADA.

Mr. Chairman, we ought to hold the American market for hosiery and knit goods. We have little chance to compete with Germany or with England in the European market, and Japan is rapidly preparing to take care of the market in the Orient. We have done little in the way of expansion in the Latin-American Republics, and we have practically no chance to compete with Canada. The Ways and Means Committee is slightly concerned about our prospects in the territory "adjacent to the Red Sea" (p. 10), but upon this subject I believe the House will be content, as the committee is not, to await the report of the much ignored but busily occupied Tariff Board. The Canadian condition, however, is worthy of comment. Here is a report from the American vice consul general at Halifax, Nova Scotia, which shows clearly why we are denied the Canadian market. They have a tariff there and know how to use it against us, despite reciprocity in other things.

NO MARKET FOR KNIT GOODS IN CANADA.

There is practically no trade in American knit goods in Halifax. This is accounted for by the fact that the Canadian tariff on such articles is high, and the dealers consequently find it cheaper to buy from Canadian and English manufacturers.

The only knit goods from the United States that are sold in any quantity are novelties. However, when a demand for these novelties has been created, Canadian manufacturers soon produce a similar article and capture the market. American knit goods are not well known in this territory, as representatives rarely call and the American houses do not advertise their goods or in any way endeavor to get in touch with the local dealers.

On the other hand, representatives of Canadian and English manufacturers frequently confer personally with their prospective customers. Some Canadian concerns furnish the stores with placards for window displays, car advertising, and the like. Since the withdrawal of the surtax on goods of German origin last spring, more German salesmen are entering Canada. One dealer who has handled some American knit goods states that English manufacturers pack their wares more carefully than American manufacturers do, although the English concerns invariably charge for the boxing.

In order to establish themselves in this country, American manufacturers of knit goods must overcome the obstacle of a high tariff. Persistent personal representation, backed by goods of a high quality, is also a factor of prime importance in extending their trade here. Knitted goods of every description imported into Canada for the four months ended July, 1910, amounted to $2,269 from the United Kingdom and $1,214 from the United States.

WHY REDUCE WAGES?

In the correspondence heretofore submitted it is patent, I think, that increased importations are not calculated to reduce the cost of living in the United States, especially if those importations mean a curtailment of American enterprise and a displacement of American labor. I have never heard a Representative of a wheat-growing State demand lower prices for wheat, and I am equally sure I have never heard a loyal Representative of the South demand lower prices for cotton. We are great consumers of both wheat and cotton in the thickly populated districts, and we must have a purchasing power, which comes in the form of wages, to buy these commodities. If cotton goods which we manufacture are manufactured at one-third the cost in foreign countries, how can we continue to make the wage necessary to pay the existing prices for cotton or for wheat, and why should we have lower wages anyhow? The answer of the gentleman from Alabama, that we are deceiving the workingman, or that the manufacturer unduly profits by the tariff, is not convincing. The gentleman knows that the importer and the middle man are always between the manufacturer and the consumer. The high prices of which the people complain are due not to the wage earner nor, generally, to the manufacturer, but to methods and expenses of manipulation and distribution. Take the Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association, which for a long time made its headquarters in Birmingham, Ala. Wherein did the tariff have anything to do with "the gentlemen's agreement," which prevented the consumer of foodstuffs from obtaining his necessary supplies, except at such prices as were fixed by the association? That the tariff had nothing to do with this method of increasing the actual cost of living and that the manufacturer of the foodstuffs was also out of it is best shown by the two suits for damages, one of which, in Birmingham, resulted in a financial settlement which involved a thousand dealers who were neither wage earners nor manufacturers directly protected by a tariff.

WHO IS TO BLAME FOR LIVING COST?

And that this subject of the increased cost of living in its relation to the tariff may be better understood, I append this extract from the personal letter of an official of the Government, who has been making some experiments of his own with regard to prices here and abroad. If the shoe pinches in any particular, I regret it, but this simple communication throws a great ray of light upon the maladroitness of the Democratic orators in charging up to the tariff the modern increase in the cost of living. My correspondent, whose name is reserved for personal reasons, writes as follows:

When I lived in Washington I saw at ——— an Austrian linen tablecloth and 12 napkins for it, which I fancied very much. This firm asked me $40 for the tablecloth and napkins. Later I was in New York, and I found that the same articles could be purchased at ——— for $33. I then corresponded with ———, of Oxford Street, London, and from him I purchased identically the same articles, and after paying a duty of 50 per cent they cost me $26.64. ———, however, is on the west side of London, and I am informed that the tradespeople there charge from 25 to 33⅓ per cent on the wholesale price of the article. Last January I purchased from ———, in London, a dozen towels, and after paying duty and postage they cost me $13.32. The price of these towels in Boston is $18. I bought at the same time three towels to complete a set, and after paying ———, the customs duty, and the postage these towels cost me at the rate of $16.20 per dozen. The retail price of these towels in New York and Boston is $24 per dozen.

I was lately in London and I went into an establishment and bought a dozen handkerchiefs. I told them I wanted the same quality as the handkerchief I had in my possession, which cost me $9 per dozen at ———, in Philadelphia. The cost of these hankerchiefs was so low that after paying duty I find the total cost to be $4.90 per dozen, or slightly more than half price. As the house I went into was a linen house, I presume that they gave me the same quality as ——— sold me. At the time I bought the hankerchiefs I bought a tablecloth, and after paying duty on it the cost was $14.72. The price of identically the same tablecloth at ———, on Chestnut Street, was $21, and the price in New York at ——— was $20. I have also purchased abroad underwear, and after paying duty the cost is about $2 per garment. The same articles cost in Philadelphia $2.50 each.

When I represent these facts to my friends they simply can not understand the situation since ———, of Philadelphia, and ———, of Washington, buy at the wholesale prices abroad and the duty is calculated at these wholesale prices, whereas I buy at the retail prices abroad and I am obliged to pay duty on such prices. I confess that I do not understand why the retail prices on these articles should be so high here. I know that Washington is an extortionate place, and I have found out that ———, on F Street, Washington, charge $20 for a set of glassware which I can purchase from ———, of Philadelphia, at $13.50.

I am sure you will agree with me that the retail merchants are charging the consumer too much profit on imported articles.

THOSE WHO REQUIRE SERVICE PAY.

I have another letter which will help us to a better understanding of this problem:

SCHRACK & SHERWOOD,
Philadelphia, July 11, 1911.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
Philadelphia, Pa.

DEAR SIR: The textile interests of Philadelphia and, in fact, the whole country, are in a very bad condition, as you know and appreciate, owing to the tariff agitation, and I have read with interest your speeches in the House of Representatives in favor of the present Republican tariff, especially one of June 20, 1911, entitled "The tariff on a suit of clothes."

In connection with this subject I wish to hand you the inclosed advertisement and to supplement your arguments. In this case you will note the retailer (who is probably a strong supporter of Democratic tariff revision) buys a suit at $16.75 and sells it to the consumer at $30, making a gross profit of 79.1 per cent. Mr. W. H. Dixon, whose letter you read on June 20, gives in same an itemized statement of cost, which, in merchant tailoring, I think is a fair one, and he figures a gross profit of 21.5 per cent. He further states that a department store will not try to do business on less than 25 to 33⅓ per cent gross profit, and the above is an instance of where they have made 79.1 per cent on a suit of clothes, and, I warrant you, were that same suit, sold for $30, dissected and tabulated down to the mill that made the cloth that the manufacturer was glad to get a gross profit of even 20 per cent, if he got that.

It is the manufacturer of yarns and cloth who will suffer, and not only he himself, but the thousands dependent on his investment for their daily bread. For example, we will suppose that the tariff on cloth is reduced so as to give the foreign manufacturers an even chance of selling in this market. Would such a condition benefit the consumer? I say positively no. The cloth would be bought in England. The suit would be made in England, sold wholesale for $16.75, and resold in Philadelphia for $30 just the same. The result to the consumer would be the same. To the manufacturer of the suit and his labor it would be the same. But as to the manufacturer of the cloth and his labor, the business would go to England, and he is out of business and thousands of mill operators are out of work. The money which should have been kept in this country and paid to the weavers, winders, and spinners goes to pay that labor in another country.

Most people believe that to cheapen an article, such as clothing, the proper way is to get after the manufacturer of the cloth, mainly because foreigners with cheaper labor conditions can sell cloth in the United States duty free cheaper than the home manufacturer. The manufacturer stands as an exposed target to all guns, his business with its territorial extent is subject to foreign (outside United States) competition and needs protection, while the retailer's business is local and not subject to foreign competition. Take one item alone in the past year, that of the so-called hobble skirt; this has meant a reduction of at least 25 per cent in the demand for dress goods, and the manufacturer who has money invested in his business must stand the loss, and the consumer pays just as much for a skirt with 5 yards of goods in it as she does with 8 yards in it.

It is a mistaken idea, from any business man's standpoint, to try to down the manufacturers of this country by taking off the tariff; they should realize that the more money kept right here on our shores means business for everybody, but if you send money away the people do not have it to spend.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will yield to the gentleman, although I did not know I was trespassing on his territory when I referred to the hobble skirt. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to ask the gentleman a question. Yesterday the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN], if I recollect correctly, said that 90 per cent of the laborers in the New England mills were foreigners. Is that true?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. For the sake of the argument I will admit that that is true, and I will explain it by saying that it is the best tribute in the world to the wages paid in the United States, since if these foreigners could not get better wages in the United States they would have remained in the countries from which they came.

Mr. HEFLIN. If that is true, is it not a fact that the southern mills are the only ones that furnish full employment to American labor?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If that is true, I regret to have heard it said on that side of the House during this discussion that the poorest-paid labor in the mills of the country was in the South. God help the Anglo-Saxon of the South! I do not want free trade to bear him down. I want to help improve his condition.

Mr. HEFLIN. The New England mills manufacture a finer grade and a more costly grade of goods than do our southern mills. You pretend to protect the American laborer's product from competition with the product of foreign labor. Let me ask what are you doing to protect the American laborer in his right to occupy a place in the American mills and not be driven out by the cheap labor of Europe?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We are attempting to prevent the Democratic Ways and Means Committee from putting into a law that which will create an influx of foreign commodities and labor, that will displace the labor to which you refer. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HEFLIN. That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think it is.

Mr. Chairman, I am coming now to a point which I thought the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] was about to inquire into. I continue to read from the letter of Mr. Albert G. Sherwood, of Philadelphia, which has in it some references which I desire to apply now to my distinguished and handsome friend on the other side, and I hope it will receive that consideration which it merits.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to know——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. O, Mr. Chairman, I speak now of my handsome friend from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to know whether the gentleman withdraws his charge that I am an expert in hobble skirts?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, I do now.

Mr. FOWLER. If he does not, I wanted to deny that proposition.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Since the arrival of the gentleman from Alabama I withdraw everything I said about the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. Sherwood's letter continues:

Now, a word as to the consumer. He feels that he is the one and only one who is oppressed. In one sense of the word he is, but only in certain cases, like the one above, where he has to pay $30 for a suit that cost wholesale $16.75, or where a monopoly is formed to restrain trade. The consumers do not realize that for the most part manufactured articles of all kinds are sold at a less profit and at a cheaper price to-day than they were 10 to 15 years ago. They do not realize that the farm productions—the things they eat—have not kept pace with the enormous growth of the cities. This naturally makes the demand greater than the supply and the prices higher. The States as well as the National Government know this, for they all are at great expense trying to increase farm production and efficiency.

Now, I invite the attention of the good-natured gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

The trouble—

Says Mr. Sherwood—

as far as I can see, is not with the tariff; it is the enormous growth and lack of economy. There are about twice as many inducements to catch the dollars of to-day as there were 15 years ago. Many a man to-day owns an automobile with a mortgage on his house, and of course it goes hard to buy clothes or any other necessity when he puts the money into luxuries.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, that does not refer to the gentleman from Alabama. [Laughter.]

A few years ago if a person wanted to buy anything, it was necessary to go to the stores and buy it, while now a man can sit at home, with a telephone on one side and an electric fan on the other and bring a hundred comforts to his very feet, but it all costs money, and that money should not be considered a part of the market value of the goods he buys, and if the people must have service, they are paying for service and not for the goods, and they should not blame the manufacturer for the high price of service.

There is a lot in this letter that does not pertain to tariff, but in closing I want, as a manufacturer, to commend you for your fight.

To take the tariff off, will injure all.

To leave it on, will injure no one.

Let us straighten out our internal questions of labor and economy before we let in foreign manufacturers and their products to further complicate the conditions.

Very truly, yours, ALBERT G. SHERWOOD.

TRIBUTE TO KING COTTON.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I want to return to King Cotton. I have listened to the graceful eloquence of our southern friends, who have a just pride in the supremacy and world-wide influence of their great staple. They have watched it in their rich climate as nature brought it into bloom, and they have extolled it in prose and in poetry. It has been their treasured asset, and every true American has rejoiced with them in their proud possession. It has been of great commercial value to them and has stood by them in their hour of need. They have found it agreeable to market much of this great product abroad; some of them have encouraged the advance of American manufactures into the cotton field; and as encouragement has been given, capital has come forward and labor has been employed in shaping the fiber into artistic and useful articles of apparel. Tremendous expenditure of American money, earned by American enterprise and labor, is now so engaged. If proper encouragement against foreign competition were not denied, there is good reason to believe that the spirit of progress and enterprise would continue until the great new South shall no longer be a cotton-producing or agricultural country only, but a thriving, busy, prosperous manufacturing center as well.

SOME MAY BE SATISFIED.

It may be that, because of local conditions, some of our Democratic brethren are content that the South shall depend upon its cotton and its field labor, and that it shall be satisfied with the British and German gold which comes back into its banks from cotton sold abroad; but the more natural, if not the more patriotic view would suggest a closer alliance with capital and labor at home and a maintenance here of a higher standard of life and order. No American workingman, whether he labors in the field or in the factory, will be content to receive less than his modern wage, nor will any statesman deliberately strive to lower the standards or ideals of American life. If foreign wages be low, and we continue to encourage them by sending our raw material to be manufactured abroad, we must necessarily depress our own labor at home. If we had assurance that the encouragement of foreign manufactures would tend to advance the wages or standard of living in foreign countries, there would be some satisfaction in the thought that we were contributing to the general welfare of humanity, but there is no such assurance, and so long as foreign industrial conditions remain as they are, we can only depress the higher wage standards of the United States by forcing our workingmen into competition with low-priced labor abroad; or, worse than that, displace it altogether.

COURTIERS AT THE THRONE.

And after all it should be remembered that King Cotton is only one of the great American kings, all of whom pay tribute to him and some of whom, in the more rigorous regions of our country, pay him greater tribute than do those in the balmier climate where he reigns supreme. His subjects are as widespread as civilization and should not be oppressed by him where civilization has reached its highest standard. As in Holy Writ we are told that he is worse than an infidel "who provideth not for his own house," so we may say of King Cotton that he is unjust if he persisteth in providing for the competitors of his own house and bringeth distress upon those who sustain him. I do not believe King Cotton, that great allegorical figure that stands out so proudly with King Coal, King Wheat, King Corn, King Iron, and other towering giants in American progress, would give his official sanction to the bill we are now considering if he understood the havoc it would work upon his loyal subjects; but as it is in humankind, so it may be figuratively, Mr. Chairman; the courtiers reaching out for political dominion, seeking favors at the foot of the throne, play upon the susceptibilities of the monarch and inconsiderately sweep the masses into subjection. In the dim distance loom up the rich political possessions of 1912, and it may be that some of the flatterers of the mighty King Cotton are laying plans to profit at the expense of his benign and better judgment. Let us hope it is not so—that no cabal of the courtiers lurks behind the measure for which the support of the king is sought. If it does, Mr. Chairman, let us hope that it may be detected and overthrown before disaster follows in the wake of progress. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HUGHES].

Mr. HUGHES of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, at the very outset of my remarks I want to say that the pending bill commands my unqualified and most earnest support, not only because it is the product of a Democratic Committee on Ways and Means, not only because it has the indorsement of a Democratic caucus, not only because it is strictly in the line of pledges in the platforms of our party and in harmony with the best traditions of that party, but because I conceive it to be a measure that is democratic in the broadest significance of that term—working the largest good to the largest number. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If I did not firmly believe that its ultimate effect will be to benefit the cotton producer, as well as the cotton manufacturer, if I did not feel sure that the consumer of cotton goods will be benefited by it, if I were not convinced that it will be a long step in the direction of giving us new markets for our wares, I would not appear in advocacy of it.

Being a cotton grower in the State of Georgia, living on my plantation, operating and directing it, I feel that I am justified—nay, that it is my duty—to speak to this House in behalf of my fellow farmers all over this country, but especially those of the South; to plead, not for special privileges, but for equity and justice in dealing with this greatest of all industries, the fountain head, the very source from which flows the material prosperity of the Nation. It is more than a trite saying—it is a monumental fact—that agriculture is the foundation rock upon which a nation's wealth is built. [Applause.]

The farmer's prosperity is the electric motor that sends the life-giving current into every nerve and artery of the business community. When the farmer flourishes, all flourish; when his pocketbook is empty, there is decided ebb in those of other pursuits. Agriculture in its highest, in its best estate sets a people as a mark upon a hill. That has been its history since first the command went forth, "Let the earth bring forth fruit!" From the day when the first plow was a stick with a nail at the end of it to scratch the soil it has held this undisputed sway; and in our own time and generation it is the truest exponent, as it is the clearest result of brawn and brain and science. It is the creator of wealth. [Applause.]

So important a factor in the economic life of the people has a right to demand that in the matter of legislation it be treated with absolute fairness. The greatest glory of the farmer is that he has never asked for special privileges or favors. [Applause.] He requires none. He asks nothing except that, in the adjustment of economic relations, he be not discriminated against. When tariff bills have been in the course of incubation no delegations of farmers have thronged the committee rooms, nor have farmers sent high-priced lawyers to Washington to make specious arguments for special concessions. "The square deal" has been his shibboleth always. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If that is true—and it is true—of the farmer in general, it is markedly so in respect of the southern farmer. It was strikingly illustrated in word and action by Representatives of southern agricultural districts during the consideration of the Canadian reciprocity bill in this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am serving, Mr. Chairman, one of the most important and prosperous districts not only in Georgia, but in the South. Georgia is properly rated the Empire State of the South—first in peach production, second only to Texas in cotton production, high among the leaders in all fruits and all cereals, second only to Alabama in iron ore, among the first in all minerals, leading all in general variety of all the sources of wealth and the elements of progressiveness.

My district is second to no district in Georgia as to cotton and cereals. From this great agricultural district there did not come to me a single plea to oppose the Canadian reciprocity bill; on the contrary, I received many earnest requests that I give it my cordial support.

That bill, though emanating from a Republican President and urged in the Senate of the United States by "stand-pat" Republicans with such good grace as they could command, was supported in this House and in the Senate by the Democrats, because it represented a vindication of economic principles for which Democrats had pleaded for years in State and national platforms. It was the actual manifestation of "a Democratic principle and a Republican conversion. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It was amusing, Mr. Chairman, almost to the point of pathos, to hear on the floor of this House the plaintive appeals that came from our friends on the other side in behalf of the farmers—a class whom Republican legislation has insistently discriminated against by granting special aid and comfort to infant industries of corporation maturity with accumulated millions in their coffers. [Applause.] During all the years that the Republican Party has been in power in every department of the Government it has never given much consideration to the needs of the farmer, but rather has ignored him throughout. Instead of guarding his birthright of fair-dealing, it has sought to keep him quiet with such a mess of pottage as import duties on corn and wheat and cabbage—agricultural products in which we lead all the world.

The farmer needs no protection; certainly the southern farmer does not. He not only raises that which sustains life, but also that which clothes the bodies of nearly 70 per cent of the people of the world. Next to the corn crop the cotton crop is the largest item in the money value of the products of the farm. The southern farmer needs no protection other than that of "a fair field and no favors." He is more than willing to have the price of his products regulated by the law of supply and demand. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The farmer only demands that his cotton shall no longer be the gamblers' sport and stake. He demands that this great staple no longer be permitted to be the shuttlecock in the hands of speculators and manipulators, who for years have saddled it with fictitious values below the actual market value. I am tempted to quote briefly right here from a report of the commissioner of corporations, made a few years ago, on the subject of cotton "futures":

> The matter may be summed up as follows: The abnormal depression of the future contract price, caused by improper exchange regulation, taken with the system of "buying limits," frequently draws down with it and away from the standard of true values the prices which the farmers receive for their cotton. The mental effect of these erroneous quotations serves to mislead the farmer to his injury in setting his crop. The disturbance of the hedging function by improper exchange conditions has placed an added cost on the merchant, which must necessarily fall, at least in part, upon the producer. The basic defect of the fixed difference system is that it inevitably causes the promulgation and practical use of false quotations of a great staple. "Future" contracts should truly represent actual cotton. If they do not, if the two lines of prices are divorced, the two chief functions of the exchange, the hedging system and the quoting of standard prices, are nullified, and the exchange loses the prime characteristics which distinguish a real market from a gambling place.

I am glad, Mr. Chairman, that this House has set the stamp of its approval upon the kind of protection the cotton growers need by passing in the second session of the last Congress a bill, H. R. 24073, prohibiting gambling in futures, and I regret that that meritorious measure failed of favorable action in the Senate. But I confidently look forward to a renewed attack upon these cormorants, who feed upon the life blood of the thrifty farmer, and trust that the next one may be carried to a successful conclusion. If it should fail to be carried into enactment, it will surely become an issue before the people in the presidential election of 1912, and the great army of tillers of the soil will have no difficulty in placing the responsibility where it belongs and vote accordingly.

In some quarters it is objected that the lower rates of duty on imports of manufactures of cotton which this bill proposes will cause a flood of importations of cotton goods made by Europe's cheaper labor that will enter into disastrous competition with the products of our mills. Such apprehensions I regard as not based upon existing facts. The very comprehensive report of the Committee on Ways and Means accompanying this bill states:

> It is estimated that in 1910 the imports of all manufactures of cotton were only about 8 per cent of the domestic consumption.

There is no doubt about that, as the report says:

> Our manufacturers are well equipped to supply the domestic market, and should gradually become better equipped to supply foreign markets.

These last few words point to the really important feature for the manufacturer of cotton goods in this country to consider. His home market is practically secure to him. He will have no difficulty in holding his own there; in the future he will supply, as he has supplied in the past, our own people with practically all they require in the way of manufactured cotton goods.

In dealing with this subject it is not amiss to turn for a moment from generalization to specific facts. While pretty nearly everybody knows that the United States leads the world in cotton growing, it is of interest to note that we produce 59.9 per cent, or three-fifths of the world's supply. British India is next with 18.3 per cent; then Egypt with 8; Russia is fourth with 4.7 per cent; China fifth with 3.8; Brazil sixth with 1.9; and all other countries supply the balance of 3.4 per cent. These figures are taken from Census Bulletin No. 111.

Our cotton crop has grown from a few thousand bales in 1800 to the present enormous figure of more than 12,000,000 bales. The average annual production of cotton in the United States for the past five years has been 12,175,867 bales, of which Georgia has about 15 per cent to her credit. Georgia's largest crop was in 1908—1,980,610 bales. In 1910 the South produced 12,005,888 bales of 480 pounds each. The average value of lint per pound, upland, was 14.7 per cent. In 1909 we produced 10,315,382 bales of an average weight of 475 pounds, and it was sold at an average price of 14.3. We consumed 4,559,002 and exported 6,491,843 bales. We imported only 151,395 bales, or 1.47 per cent of our home production—truly an almost negligible quantity.

The cotton-manufacturing industry of the country has forged ahead with enormous strides. A preliminary report of the Census Bureau shows the following percentages of increase from 1899 to 1909: In number of establishments, 63.8; capital invested, 184.5; spindles, 141.8; looms, 508; bales of cotton consumed, 66.1; value of products, 143.1.

On the other hand, let us glance at the statistics bearing upon the importation of cotton cloth and wearing apparel. The Government publication called Commerce and Navigation of the United States, 1910, issued by the Bureau of Statistics, makes this showing, pages 546 to 550:

	1907	1908	1909	1910
Cloths, unbleached	$11,496,734	$6,930,007	$12,381,384	$10,098,985
Cloths, bleached	2,240,431	1,529,057	2,146,117	1,351,040
Cloths, dyed, colored, or printed	7,502,082	5,809,019	7,165,579	8,521,466
Clothing and other wearing apparel—knit goods	(1)	1,482,751	1,016,325	1,175,147
All other	4,794,226	3,218,728	3,230,342	4,549,921
Total	26,033,478	18,969,562	25,939,947	25,696,559

[1] Clothing and wearing apparel was included in "all other" prior to 1908.

While the United States grows nearly 60 per cent of the world's cotton, we manufacture only a little over 25 per cent of the world's supply of manufactures of cotton.

Right here is where the ingenuity of the American manufacturer of cotton goods must stand the test. His home market is safe; but if he would expand his business, if he would consume more raw cotton, so that less may be shipped abroad, he must find ways to push more energetically into the world's markets. He must contend with British and German manufacturers for the trade in countries where little else than cotton goods are worn by the natives. He can not afford to sit supine and allow these markets to be practically monopolized by foreigners. I shall make bold right here to say to our American manufacturers that if they will but cater to the notions of the Chinese or South Americans or Africans in regard to the manner of putting up his wares instead of consulting merely his own tastes, he will have taken a long step forward toward getting his proper share of their trade. Feeling superior to these customers—and our people are superior in many ways—our manufacturers have failed to respect their views and desires as do the European manufacturers. We must sell them what they want; not what we think they should have. We must pack it or fix it up like they want it; not to suit our own pleasure or convenience. The reports of our consuls to foreign countries continually emphasize the advantage won by Europeans over Americans in competition for foreign trade by catering to the customs, notions, and desires of the purchasers. That our merchants and manufacturers will soon learn this, I do not doubt.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, the American manufacturer has nothing to fear ultimately from the legislation which we are now considering, for in the end it will stimulate trade and increase the large total of his profits. Nothing is more certain than that lower prices will increase consumption, and the greater the demand for his goods the greater the number of his employees.

Best of all, Mr. Chairman—and I shall take no pains to conceal my pleasurable anticipation—best of all is this, that the increasing demand for cotton goods must work to the benefit of the cotton planter. Nor shall I hesitate to express intense satisfaction at the prospect of seeing more and more of New England's cotton manufacturers transplanting their mills to the South, near the fields where their staple grows.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is the logical concomitant of the revised woolen schedule which I hope to see coming forth from conference unscathed and submitted to the President for his approval. They say he will veto it. So much the worse for him and his party if he does. For he himself has said:

That Schedule K of the Payne-Aldrich Act is indefensible.

How, then, would he justify before the people of the United States his veto of a measure that aims at remedying, in some degree at least, the legislative crimes in the act upon which the President himself has set the seal of his condemnation? Pardon the digression.

This bill is not the hasty product of undigested material handled by careless or nonobservant legislators. Every detail has been carefully considered. It commends itself to the "common man" by its simplicity. It does away with the confusing compound duties. Every man can understand the ad valorem method of laying import taxes. Any schoolboy will know that if a given article costs a dollar and the tax is 25 per cent, the duty to be paid on that article is 25 cents.

Under the previous arrangement of the cotton schedule, with its ramifications as to so many threads to the square inch and sundry and diverse other complications, it takes a Philadelphia lawyer or a tariff expert to say what import duty a given article must pay. This is an additional reason why I favor this bill, though its chiefest merit, of course, is the cutting down of the iniquitously high rates of the Payne-Aldrich tariff. Why, Mr. Chairman, if this bill becomes a law we need not be afraid lest our socks wear out too soon, for it will not take a small fortune to buy more.

I experience especial satisfaction also in the passage of the farmers' free-list bill. If that is placed on the statute book it will give our farmers what they have desired and deserved for years and years—ever, in fact, since the Republican Party joined hands with the International Harvester Co.—which means the Agricultural Implement Trust. They will get cheaper plows, cheaper reapers, cheaper binders, cheaper farming machinery of every kind.

Farming can not be carried on to-day without improved machinery. The mountainous tariff that is now laid on such machinery practically prohibits its importation. The worst of it all is—and that is what galls our farmers, Mr. Chairman—that while they have to pay these exactions to the trust the manufacturers ship these same implements abroad and sell them to the farmers of foreign countries at prices lower than are paid on this side of the water. So the American farmer is mulcted for the benefit of the foreigner. The farmers' free-list bill will go far toward doing away with these discriminations and injustices.

The protection the farmers need is against the gross injustice perpetrated upon them by and under the sanction of the Government, which compels them, through high-tariff exactions, to pay millions every year, not to augment the revenues of the Government, but to pile upon and over the already bursting coffers of greedy monopolies. I am unable to understand, Mr. Chairman, how any Representative can justify himself before his people in opposing by speech or vote legislation like this bill designed to make up for these inequalities.

Mr. Chairman, the farmer has already been the "goat" too long. While to others have been given the soft places, he has been riding on the rocks. It is high time that he should have a change of treatment. Long enough has he been in the uncomfortable position between the upper and the nether millstones.

According to the National Grange, the farmer gets about 35 cents for every dollar's worth he produces and the middlemen get the 65 cents. Might it not be well if the farmer got the 65 cents and left the 35 cents for the middlemen? The Independent gives other examples:

During the fall of 1910 apples were largely purchased from the farmer in the orchard at $1.50 a barrel; but these very apples were sold in our city markets at $6.50 per barrel and were retailed for over $9 per barrel. During this same fall the orange crop of Florida was bought up for 85 cents per box, but in the market was scarce at $2.50 to $3 for the common grades. The egg case is just as one-sided, when the producer gets but 20 cents while the consumer pays 40. Of course, the farmer who has cold storage of his own can command the highest prices, provided he also be prepared to directly reach the consumer.

The farmer has been whipped with the scourges of an outrageous tariff and tortured with the scorpions of an equally outrageous system of "futures." He has been the football of the New York and New Orleans Cotton Exchanges, and when they got through with him he would have given up the ghost if he had not been a farmer, and an American farmer at that. His grit saved him, and that is why he has not been wiped out altogether.

To show that in the expression of my own views I am reflecting the views held generally by the good people from whom I come, I quote a brief editorial from a Georgia country weekly:

[McDuffie Progress, published at Thomson, Ga.]

WHO IS SELLING THE COTTON?

If Attorney General Wickersham desires to do a real service to his country, the southern people as well as the Nation at large, he will now direct his attention to the New York Cotton Exchange, where more cotton has been sold in the last 10 days than the crop of 1911 will aggregate. It may be that no national law has been violated, but the Attorney General could find out that a great damage was being done to the financial interests of his country and he could recommend to Congress such legislation as would put to an end forever the nefarious practice of people selling in enormous quantities that which they do not possess nor for which they have any contract, right, or title.

As a matter of fact, it is well known the world over that the cotton exchanges have been maintained and are still being maintained for two purposes, viz, to afford a place for gambling in futures; and secondly, to afford a place where the bear element, representing the spinners of the world, can fix the prices of cotton at the lowest possible point.

There might be some inducement for the Attorney General to desire the price of cotton to go low and remain low were it not for the fact that the cotton crop is the principal crop that brings the gold of Europe to America and keeps the balance of the trade on this side of the waters. Cut it out and in a few short years the gold coin of the American Government must be turned in a steady stream across the Atlantic, there to remain. This is known to the Attorney General, and it is also known to the Southern Members of Congress, and if they expect to take any action to suppress this national as well as sectional evil now is the time for them to do it.

We call special attention to the Attorney General for the simple reason that a little more than 12 months ago, when the cotton bulls were putting forth as heroic efforts to put up the price of cotton as the bears are now putting forth to put down the price of cotton, the Attorney General was the most active and vigorous man in the American Union to thwart their plans, even though it brought the gold of Europe and the rest of the world to the American shore.

Let our Congressmen and our Senators get busy and enact a law not extinguishing the exchanges entirely, but simply providing that a man must have what he sells. If this was done the sales of the New York Cotton Exchange would be valid sales and the price of cotton would forever remain at such a figure that the southern people would have a reasonable return for their labor and efforts in furnishing clothing for the world.

In all I have said, Mr. Chairman, I have been moved only by the solicitude I feel for the class to which I belong—the farmers. It is their welfare, their claim to consideration, their title to equity and to justice that stirs my sympathies and fashions my language. They do not belong to the "special interests" of which we hear so much. They send no special pleaders either to the White House or to the Capitol. But they are tired of being humbugged. They are weary of this three-card monte game which the Republican Party has been playing upon them so long. They are tired of being told again, as they have been told so often, that they must possess their souls in patience until the Tariff Board can conduct some more investigations into rates, cost of manufacture, and so on.

I think the situation, so far as tariff revision by the Republican Party is concerned, has been concisely and correctly stated by the Committee on Ways and Means in its report on this bill. On page 30 of that report we find this paragraph:

The attitude of the Republican administration indicates that the Republican platform statements of 1908 about differences in the cost of production at home and abroad are not to be taken too seriously when rates of duty can be put higher for the advantage of special interests; and later events indicate that investigations and compilations of statistical data, made by a Tariff Board under the exclusive control of the President, concerning the ever-varying and constantly fluctuation costs of production, are to be used principally for the purpose of delaying and, if possible, defeating legislation to make duties lower for the welfare of the people.

The course of the Democratic Party on this bill, Mr. Chairman, as in all the legislation that has been enacted, or attempted to be enacted, on these important subjects this session, has its source in even-handed justice to all the people. We have not sought to conserve or advance the interests of a class or a section, but we have striven to deal justly and fairly by all. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When the first session of the Sixty-second Congress closes the Democrats can look back upon their work in serene contentment, conscious of having redeemed at least a portion of the promises on the strength of which the people put them in power. In a few months more the Senate of the United States will also take on a Democratic complexion [applause on the Democratic side], and in November, 1912, the people of the United States will, I feel confident, "make it unanimous" by electing a Democrat to the Chief Magistracy of the Nation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And when we are in control of the three branches of the Government—the House, the Senate, and the Presidency—whereby the political policy of the country is shaped and its legislation written, I am proudly confident, Mr. Chairman, that we will hold aloft the beautiful banner bearing the noble inscription of "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none," and that we will place that blessed doctrine upon the statute books in the interest of all the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr Chairman, I am not insensible to the lateness of the hour and I shall try not to delay the House any longer than it is possible to complete what I have to say. There are two important ways, I think, for us to serve our people. One is in legislating to impose the burdens of taxation as lightly as possible upon the people of the country. That a Democratic House has endeavored very diligently to do this session and is succeeding admirably, I think. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Another is to conserve the expenditures of the Government, and it seems to me that this is of no less importance than the other which I have just mentioned. In the early history of our Government there were provided, for the purpose of guarding sacredly the expenditures of the public money by the Congress or by the different departments of Government, certain committees charged with the duty of investigating annually the manner in which the money was expended by the different executive departments of the Government. For the last 30 years under Republican rule in this country these committees have done practically nothing. This year with the House Democratic, it was concluded, and I think wisely, by those in charge that these expenditure committees should become live, active committees and perform the duties imposed upon them by the law and the rules of this House. I speak to-night particularly of one of those committees. I have the honor to be chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department. Our committee went early to work and and we have worked honestly and diligently and have developed one situation which I desire to speak of for a few moments. Almost every transaction that has been called to our attention so far that had the appearance of not being perhaps, well what it ought to be, led directly to what is known in the State Department, as the emergency or secret fund. This fund is peculiar to the State Department. Each year we appropriated a certain amount of money to be used by the President and the Secretary of State for so-called emergency purposes, or for "intercourse or treaty with foreign nations." This last year this appropriation amounted to $90,000. For the last several years it has been about $75,000 a year, but is now gradually increasing. The President and Secretary of State claim under the law that they can not be compelled to account to Congress or to any committee thereof or to any living person for the expenditure of this money. They claim it was given to them for secret purposes, and therefore they are not required to account, and they have positively declined to account, to a committee appointed by this House especially charged with an investigation of that department.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I am just informed that there was an agreement made this afternoon in my absence that debate hereafter would be confined to the cotton schedule.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To-night. That was the understanding. I did not understand the gentleman was going to talk on anything but the cotton schedule.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understood there was an agreement in regard to general debate, but I was not here this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not so understand the order, but understood that the business this evening should be confined to debate only, and not on any particular subject, as the Chair understood it. The Clerk informs the Chair that is the order that was made.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I merely desire to say I overheard the understanding between the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from New York, and it was that the discussion to-night should be confined to the cotton bill. I did not want to raise the point, and for that reason brought it to the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] who is in charge upon the other side. I do not care to make the point, because it has been brought up in an amicable way, but I submit to the Chair that was the understanding.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I heard the colloquy this afternoon between the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the majority floor leader. The gentleman from New York speaks very low and indistinctly at times, but my general impression is, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the debate this evening was to be confined to the cotton bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, if that is true, I have no inclination in the world to violate the agreement. I did not know that that was the agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. The understanding of the Chair is that it was to be confined solely to debate.

Mr. HAMLIN. On no particular subject?

The CHAIRMAN. No particular subject, as I understand from the Clerk was mentioned. The Chair does not know what any outside agreement may have been.

Mr. HAMLIN. If I am in order, of course I would like now to proceed, but I do not wish to proceed if there is any gentleman thinks I am out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. I will say that just as soon as the Clerk returns to the desk the Chair will find out if there was anything different stated.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I heard the agreement, and I feel sure that the only thing the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] had in mind was that there would be no votes taken in order to dispose of other matters. I do not think he mentioned there would be no speeches made on other subjects. Always on occasions like this, of general debate, Members have been allowed to speak about anything they wished to speak about. I really think that was what he meant, although I do not know.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, I would ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may be permitted to proceed upon any subject he desires to speak upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand the order prohibits the gentleman from discussing any subject. The order, as it appears at the Clerk's desk, was that the proceedings of the evening were to be confined solely to debate. Of what took place between the gentlemen outside the Chair has no knowledge, nor have the clerks at the desk any knowledge of it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have every desire to hear the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN], and would not for a moment make the point of order except there was a distinct understanding, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], who expressed to me his inability to be here to-night and asked me to represent this side of the House, did say that the understanding was that the discussion was to be confined to the cotton bill. With that statement I submit the matter to the chairman and the committee. I do not desire to make the point of order, but that was the understanding and I am quite sure it would be confirmed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] if he were here.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, with all due deference, did the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] hear that agreement this evening?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There was a colloquy between the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] observes, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] speaks lowly and sometimes does not hear well, but there was a slight difference of opinion as to what the recess should be for, and there was also a question as to whether the point of no quorum should be raised. I remember that. That was not pressed, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] did say to me upon retiring that the understanding was that the debate should be confined to the cotton schedule, and I understood that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] had acquiesced in that agreement.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I suppose the reporter's notes would show exactly what the agreement was, but I was standing nearly between the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] when the agreement was made.

The CHAIRMAN. The order will be here in one moment.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I wish to state emphatically that there was no agreement made between the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that the debate should be confined exclusively to the cotton schedule. The agreement was that no business should be transacted except the business of general debate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me to suggest that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOWMAN] recalls the incident and conversation, and may be called upon to verify my statement.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] has the floor.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire at all to embarrass the gentlemen here or embarrass myself by seemingly attempting to discuss something that some gentlemen thought was not to be discussed to-night, and I believe under those circumstances I would prefer to yield back my time and risk getting recognition at some other time.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CULLOP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12812, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until 11 o'clock a. m., August 2, 1911.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. GOEKE, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 1627) to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across and over the Arkansas River, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 100), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. DOREMUS, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 2766) to authorize the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Co. to construct and operate a bridge across the St. Francis River, in the State of Arkansas, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 97), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 2768) to authorize the St. Louis-Kansas City Electric Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the town of Weldon Springs Landing, Mo., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 98), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 850) to amend an act entitled "An act to legalize and establish a pontoon railway bridge across the Mississippi River at Prairie du Chien, and to authorize the construction of a similar bridge at or near Clinton, Iowa," approved June 6, 1874, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 95), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. CULLOP, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 2878) to authorize the Chicago, Lake Shore & Eastern Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Calumet River in the State of Indiana, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 96), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

Mr. OWEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) approving the constitutions formed by the constitutional conventions of the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MESSENGER TO COMMITTEE ON RAILROADS.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 126), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Railroads be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ a messenger at a salary of $1,200 per annum, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law.

TARIFF DUTIES ON WOOL.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments to the bill and comply with the request of the House of Representatives for a conference and that five conferees be appointed to represent the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. PENROSE, Mr. CULLOM, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. BAILEY, and Mr. SIMMONS conferees on the part of the Senate.

PUBLICITY OF CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2958) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected," and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. GAMBLE, and Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama conferees on the part of the Senate.

AUTHORSHIP OF THE SHERMAN LAW OF JULY 2, 1890.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like to ask that the following letter from Mr. Walker be printed in the RECORD, and read if any Senator desires to hear it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to printing the letter in the RECORD? The Chair hears none and the order is entered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, July 21, 1911.

Hon. MOSES E. CLAPP.

DEAR SENATOR: In pursuance of your request, I submit the following report of the results of my investigations in the office of the Secretary of the Senate and in the room of the Senate Judiciary Committee, relevant to the authorship of the Sherman law of July 2, 1890.

That statute was drawn in the Judiciary Committee in the latter part of March and the first part of April, 1890. It was based on the bill which Senator Sherman introduced as Senate bill 1, early in December, 1889, but Senator Sherman took no part in framing the substitute, which was drawn by the Judiciary Committee. That committee was composed of Senators Edmunds, Ingalls, Hoar, Wilson of Iowa, Evarts, Coke, Vest, George, and Pugh. All of its members participated in the consideration of the framing of the statute as it was reported by the Judiciary Committee, which is the exact form in which it was enacted and was approved by President Harrison July 2, 1890.

The eight sections of the statute were written by the following Senators, in the following proportions:

Senator Edmunds wrote all of sections 1, 2, 3, 5, and 6, except seven words in section 1, which seven words were written by Senator Evarts. Those are the words, "In the form of trust or otherwise."

Senator George wrote all of section 4. Senator Hoar wrote all of section 7, and Senator Ingalls was the author of section 8.

The statements of chapter 2 of Walker's History of the Sherman Law, relevant to the authorship of that statute, were based on all the published information which had ever been printed when that book was written by me in 1910. But my personal investigation of the original records of the Senate has resulted in ascertaining that the credit of the authorship of that historic statute should be distributed as it is distributed in this communication.

ALBERT H. WALKER.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. CLAPP. I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which Senate resolution 122, providing for an additional clerk to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, was passed. If there is unanimous consent given, I will move now that the motion by which the resolution was passed be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota moves to reconsider the vote by which Senate resolution 122 was passed yesterday, and asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the motion. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. Without objection, the motion prevails, and the vote by which the resolution was passed is reconsidered.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLAPP. I move to amend the resolution by inserting the words "fourteen hundred and forty dollars" where the words "twelve hundred dollars" appear, and by adding at the end of the resolution:

Said salary to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided by law.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will first state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. The resolution passed by the Senate reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an assistant clerk at a salary of $1,200 per annum.

It is proposed to strike out the words "twelve hundred" and insert in lieu thereof "fourteen hundred and forty," and at the end of the resolution to add the words:

Said salary to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided by law.

Mr. KERN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Minnesota whether this is a new position.

Mr. CLAPP. No, sir; it is the position which, by the action of the Senate some time ago, terminated yesterday. When the other resolution was up the other day it read: "For assistant clerk to this committee, $1,200." That provided for nominal committees, and, supposing that that was the rule, I myself wrote $1,200 in the resolution. I find that on the working committees, and certainly the Interstate Commerce Committee would rank as such, the assistant clerks are receiving $1,440. The object is to correct that mistake.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. President, I wish to state in partial explanation of the position of the committee that the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate considered all the resolutions at once, and with the exception of one or two of the large committees fixed a regular sum for the additional men who were to take the place of detailed men whose duties ceased July 31. It was the decision of the committee that it was better that the amount should remain uniform at $1,200.

Mr. CLAPP. Was not the salary of the assistant clerk to the Committee on Indian Affairs fixed at $1,440?

Mr. BRIGGS. That was done by the Senate. The resolution was reported at $1,200, and it was fixed by the action of the Senate at $1,440. I simply wish to correct any idea that the Committee on Interstate Commerce was discriminated against by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. CLAPP. I did not intimate that that was the case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have felt some hesitation in participating in the consideration of the report of the committee. I have not been able to determine to my own satisfaction upon what rule they acted. They seem to have acted on the assumption that all committees have the same amount of business, and that the clerical force provided was for the use of the committee in connection with the matters that were referred to it, and only for that purpose. I think a little further consideration would have convinced them that that was not the proper basis.

I am speaking now from what might be termed a personal standpoint. The Committee on Manufactures made application for an additional clerk. The Committee on Manufactures is probably as constantly a working committee as there is in this body. I have made no special plea to the committee having charge of this matter. My experience here has taught me that it is better, as a rule, to allow these questions to develop themselves. There is one thing very certain. A committee to which is referred matters of importance, desiring to perform its duty, must have sufficient help in the way of clerical force; and if help is not furnished, the committee can not perform the work. That committee has been hearing testimony under the authority of the Senate for weeks and months. The chairman of the committee has been at the same time engaged constantly in other duties connected with other committees. He is trying to perform all of this work with a very meager force.

If the rule suggested by the Senator from Indiana were the true rule, there are committees here having exactly the duplicate force of that of the Committee on Manufactures to which no matter has ever been referred. I do not believe that is the correct rule. I believe consideration should be given to the amount of work that is devolved upon the chairman of the committee. No other member of the committee except the chairman has the use of or, candidly speaking, has the right to call upon the clerical force of a committee because he is a member of it. He has a force that is assigned to his own committee, which force he is supposed to use in connection with all of his senatorial duties.

We have a large amount of testimony, some of which has come before the committee within the last two or three days. It all has to be organized and indexed and prepared in proper form, and in connection with it a report for the consideration of the Senate takes a great deal of constant work. There is no one connected with that committee who pretends to recognize any hours of limitation, or ever has done so. It has been a hard-working committee for the last eight years, during which time I have been chairman of it. Some of the most important legislation that has been enacted by Congress has come from that committee; it originated there and has been in charge of the chairman of the committee on the floor session after session, meeting the most strenuous opposition, requiring a vast amount of clerical force in connection with correspondence from responsible persons and parts of the Government that were entitled to be heard in the matter. No sooner is one measure disposed of than another takes its place.

Mr. President, if anyone will take the trouble to inspect the calendar he will, of course, see at once that that committee can not perform the duties for which it is absolutely responsible with the clerical force that has been allowed it. The denial of an extra clerk to that committee simply means that the chairman of the committee must employ a clerk and pay him out of his own pocket. During a very considerable portion of the time, since I have been in the Senate, I have been obliged to do that, because the committee to which the matter was referred have, without giving any reason, simply reported adversely or not reported at all. If that is to go on, well and good; we will understand it, but inasmuch as the question is up for consideration here, and notwithstanding the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota to me that Senators are desiring to talk on other subjects and there is no time for me to present my grievances, if they may be called grievances, I have taken the liberty of presenting them.

I hope the members of the committee who are present will take some note of it. If they do not, I will try to live through it. But there is a spirit of fairness involved in it that, it seems to me, it is proper to call to their attention once in a while. It may stir their conscience. During the last Congress a resolution of this kind, asking for additional help for this committee right in the midst of the hearings on the cold-storage and food products and various other matters, rested somewhere in the dust of the committee room, and I never heard of it, although it was there during the entire Congress.

Now, again, I have introduced that resolution. The committee comes in here and gaily passes it by as though it were a matter of no consequence. I shall not pass the work of the Senate by. I shall perform my duty. It will be an additional burden to me, but I intend that the conscience of the committee shall be reminded of it once in a while.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I deem that a word from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses on this side should be said at this point. Acting upon the initiative of the majority of this Chamber, an effort has been made by that committee to establish some system by which the clerical force of Senators and committees is to be employed. The suggestion originated with the other side that a clerk, an assistant clerk, and a stenographer were probably a sufficient force for the ordinary committees of the Senate. Resolutions covering that proposition were referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and after due deliberation and some investigation it was determined that one clerk, at a salary fixed by law, an assistant clerk or messenger at $1,440 a year, and another one at $1,200 would about supply fairly such clerical force as the official service to be performed by a Senator requires, and we made a report accordingly. That report went through the Senate.

As is usual in such cases, and in all cases in fact, some appeals which went beyond the justice and propriety of the action we were not at liberty to disregard. Some Senators found themselves unfortunately in a condition of health where the greater part of the service to be rendered devolved upon the clerical force. Yielding as we all do to those considerations we made an exception in one or two cases. In another case, that of the Committee on Public Lands, the application for an additional $240 salary for their man was made on the ground that he was required to possess a technical knowledge of the land laws of the country in order that he might render proper aid to the chairman of the committee, that being one of the active committees of the Senate. Upon those exceptions being recognized, we were met with the proposition that the Committee on Indian Affairs should be considered as being in a position like that of the Committee on Public Lands. Thinking that that was the end of it, or probably that we would have our recommendation substantially recognized, we yielded to that.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], who is the very honored and efficient chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, had introduced a resolution asking for additional assistance in the way of an assistant clerk at $1,200 a year. He was perfectly satisfied with it, and his contemplated employee was perfectly satisfied with it, but finding himself belonging to the group of committees where exceptions had been made, he felt that that amount was a discrimination against his proposed employee. We found ourselves confronted with the force of that bad precedent and yielded again, thinking that was the end of it, and as far as I am concerned we have gone about as far as we are going.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator allow me? The committee did not yield as to the Interstate Commerce Committee resolution. It was passed at $1,200, and my action now is to have it put at $1,440.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator's resolution, as I read it, called for an additional employee at $1,200.

Mr. CLAPP. That is the way it was first drawn.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Now the Senator desires to have his own resolution amended by inserting $1,440 in lieu of $1,200. His committee is one of the important committees, and just at this time it is growing more important, and it will become still more important in future, because there is much work for it to do. But I trust that the committee may be permitted to effectuate the policy announced by the majority of limiting the clerical force to the absolute requirements of the committee, and wherever an exception is asked there ought to be made manifest to some responsible agency of the Senate the fact that such a demand exists.

I am not going to antagonize the proposition to increase the allowance of the additional employee of the Committee on Interstate Commerce to $1,440; but I do think the committee will not do itself justice if it does not require that there shall be a substantial showing of the distinction between committees which hereafter seek additional employees or additional compensation for recognized employees before it makes a favorable recommendation in that behalf. The committee is proceeding in good faith in an effort to eliminate the discriminations and the unfairness that have heretofore inevitably grown up, as they will grow up inevitably in every body composed as this one is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution as amended is agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an assistant clerk at a salary of $1,440 per annum, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided by law.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. SHIVELY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, being House bill 2983.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2983) for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Thirteenth Census.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I favor the passage of the pending bill. It has been passed in substantially the same terms by two sessions of the House of Representatives, once in the Sixty-first and now in the Sixty-second Congress. The Senate did not vote upon the bill in the Sixty-first Congress.

The bill provides that the number of Representatives be increased from 391 to 433, and in case New Mexico and Arizona are admitted to the Union as States, provision is made to grant their constitutional right to one Member each. This would bring the total in that event to 435.

The population of the United States, according to the present census report, has increased by 15,000,000 since the census of 1900. This increase in 10 years is almost four times greater than the total population of the country in 1793. There were 105 Representatives in Congress at that time, with a population of less than 4,000,000. It is proposed by this bill to recognize these 15,000,000 people by 42 new Representatives in the House. The House itself on two occasions has recommended that this be done.

In my judgment, the Senate would not be justified in defeating this measure, first, because the House is the best judge of its own size, and in the absence of controlling circumstances should not be interfered with by the Senate, and, second, the principle of the selection of Representatives has always been that each be elected by a relatively small number of people.

Only once in all the history of the Republic has the Senate ventured to interfere with the action of the House in the matter of its Representatives. Peculiar and exceptional conditions growing out of the question of slavery induced the Senate to take a position antagonistic to the House in 1842, when the number of Representatives instead of being enlarged was actually decreased by 17. No such necessity or condition prevails now. The action of the Senate in 1842 has never been regarded as a precedent. It has not been followed. On the contrary, there has been an increase after each census since that time.

The House has twice certified by the votes of its Members that in its judgment it is for the best interests of the country that this proposed increase be allowed. What extraordinary reason now exists that this recommendation should be disregarded by this body?

We have heard much in recent years about Federal usurpation. The charge has been made more than once that the Senate has been guilty of usurping the authority of the House. If you defeat this measure, so earnestly demanded by the House, may you not justify the charge of usurpation? It will not be claimed that the House is unfit to serve the people to-day on account of its numbers, for I am sure that it enjoys in a larger degree than ever before the confidence of the country. The opponents of this measure are not in accord as to the ground upon which the bill should be defeated. Some assert that the increase of membership in the House from 391 to 433 may make the body unwieldy for efficient legislative work. Others claim that it will have the effect of enlarging the electoral college, and they appear to find that objectionable. It is also claimed that if this bill were now passed there might be danger of gerrymandering. This fear would probably not exist if the political complexion of certain States had not undergone a change at the last election.

I have no sympathy with those who resort to the methods of the gerrymander. I believe it is a dishonest, lawless, and criminal practice, which can not be vindicated by any standard of morals or justice. It offends and violates the language and spirit of the law and strikes a blow at the foundation of representative government. I do not care whether the offender be a Democrat or a Republican, he should be condemned at the bar of public opinion.

But the opportunity for gerrymandering would not be overcome if the Senate refused to permit an increase in the membership of the House of Representatives. It would be the duty of the States, even if the membership were left at its present number, to redistrict in order to provide for the increases in population since the last census and the shifting of the residences of the people since that time. In some States there has been a movement from the cities to the farms and villages, and in others a contrary tendency. This must be met by a redistricting of each State, so as to conform its representation to the spirit of an apportionment act. But this does not exhaust the objections to the measure. The last is an extremely novel one, and perhaps as weighty as any of the others. This valued recommendation from the minority of the Census Committee is that apportionment acts should be submitted to a referendum vote of the electorate of the States. While there have been 12 apportionments fixed by congressional action, the referendum was never invoked before to defeat or unduly delay an apportionment after the taking of a census, or, in fact, to defeat any measure.

It has been urged by a few, after every census, that the size of the House should not be enlarged. It is so urged now, with a suggestion that the number remain at 391.

The House should be a deliberative body; but, equally important, it should be a representative body. The Members represent the people. The Senators represent the States, and are supposed to be further removed from the people than the Representatives. It is objected that the House is not a deliberative body to-day on account of its size; that its speakers can not be heard on account of the noise and confusion; that it is in the control of a few men; and that an addition to the number will decrease the power of individual Members and increase the powers of its officers.

It is asserted by experienced Members of the House that a few changes in the seating arrangements can easily bring the Members closer together; and if the order of the House interferes with debate, strict enforcement of proper rules would seem to offer an effective remedy. If order be preserved in the House, the debates can be heard as well with 433 Members as with 391 or a smaller number.

The House will not be in any great danger of falling into the power of committees if its size should be slightly increased. The same danger in a great degree confronts every legislature in the country, large or small. Small bodies as well as large bodies, under bad procedure and evil influences, have been dominated by a few, and we are not required to go far for an illustration. The question of deliberation is one which concerns each Member's brain and conscience and vote. He can deliberate alone and in unison with others if he attends to his duties, keeps up with the debates, discusses subjects with his fellows, and strives for a procedure under which he is not deprived of an opportunity to cast an honest vote.

The assertion that there is danger of the House falling into the control of its committees has nothing to support it. There are 59 standing committees in the House, but there are 74 standing committees in this Senate, almost one for each Member. In addition, subcommittees are frequently appointed. We are passing judgment on the House and its capacity for legislative work. Perhaps its Members believe that there is less fear of rule by committees in the House than in the Senate. We need not look far back into history to find the record of the time when this body was not only in the control of its committees, but largely in the control of one or two Senators. The rapid growth of the so-called insurgents in the Senate, the constant protests of this side of the body, the relentless criticism of the press, the dissatisfaction of the people, and the voluntary and involuntary retirement of many former Members of this body offer abundant proof that the Senate was quite recently in the control of a few men, and the country may well rejoice that their reactionary influence and control is ended—I hope for all time.

Procedure is the key to the proper relationship between individual Members and their officers and committees. This rule can be urged with equal force in regard to both small and large legislatures. In the last Congress, yielding to their own revived sense of pride and to the urgent demand of the Nation, the Republicans revolted against the one-man rule which they created, and to which for a time they so submissively yielded. In this Congress, with the precedent of the power of his predecessor before him to lure him to seek similar control, but with his own conscience and his party and the people against it, the present Speaker led the fight for a procedure which secures the independence of each Member, and freely permits the presentation of the problems of the Nation to the House. I confess that, in my opinion, it would be unwise to extend the membership of the House, if the conditions which prevailed in the Fifty-ninth and Sixtieth Congresses were to be permanent. But the conditions have changed. Has the present House failed to record the will of the people? Have obstacles been interposed to wholesome legislation? The present House initiated every measure which has come before the Senate this session. Neither corruption nor demagogy, political partisanship nor corporate influence, has had a voice in its deliberations. Its record gives it a clear title to the respect of the people, and by its deeds it will be known in the history of legislation as a body truly responsive to the needs and instructions of the Nation.

It is true that an increase in the number of Representatives will result in an increase in the electoral college; but in what respect is this result objectionable? Four hundred and eighty-three votes are cast for the election of a President under the present apportionment; 525 will be cast if the proposed law takes effect; and 531 if New Mexico and Arizona are accepted as States. This is an increase of 48 electors. They are scattered throughout the country and are assigned on a fair basis of population. These votes should represent the people in the choice of the highest officer in the land. This effect on the electoral college should not have weight with us in this discussion. It does not benefit any political party; it does not make the electoral college unwieldy; it simply furnishes a means for the people of the country to express their choice for President.

Nor should we allow ourselves to be influenced in our action on this bill because indirectly it will enlarge the delegation to the national conventions in 1912.

It has always been the custom of the American people to elect their Representatives to the House from relatively small districts. The district, according to the Constitution, should not have less than 30,000 people. The size of these districts varies to-day. Legislatures, in carrying out their duty to fix the district lines according to fair rules, have often failed under the pressure of political partisanship. This is to be regretted, but it has nothing to do with the merit of the custom and practice of the people in asking for an apportionment by districts equal in population and compact and contiguous. This bill, like many other apportionment bills, recommends that this be done. It is the simplest way and produces the best results. This bill also recognizes the right of the State to elect its Representatives at large in providing that where an increase is allowed the added number of Representatives apportioned to a State be elected at large until the legislature redistricts the State.

The number, 433, is the lowest, according to the estimates, at which the apportionment can be made without depriving any State of its present representation. Twenty-five States gain one or more Members. If the number 391 is to be retained, 13 States, it is said, will lose Members if the apportionment is to be made on the basis of an equal population for each Member—equal to the quotient of the total population divided by 391. Those States so affected would have to elect their entire delegations at large unless special sessions were called to redistrict the States, or else to provide election laws to put Representatives on State ballots, for none of them are provided with laws for such a contingency. And I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in the amendment submitted yesterday by my distinguished colleague, the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], providing that the membership should be retained at 391, there is no provision—nor is there in the bill—for the necessary redistricting of the States on a basis of 391.

Twenty-five States under the proposed apportionment would have to provide election laws for the election at large of their additional Representatives, if they have no such laws at present, or would have to redistrict their States or default in the election of the added Congressmen.

I would regard it as a great wrong to deprive the people of the increased representation to which they are clearly entitled.

I have not received a single protest from the people of New York, which has a greater population than any other State. In recognition of almost 2,000,000 more people than it had in 1900, it is to be given 6 more Representatives, if this measure becomes a law. In a single district in the city of New York there are a half million people.

Foreign countries, with smaller populations, have larger Parliaments. The United Kingdom has a population of 41,458,721, with a membership of 670. Austria has a population of 26,150,708, with a membership of 516. France has a population of 39,252,245, with a membership of 584; and Italy has a population of 32,475,253, with a membership of 508. I have never heard it claimed that these bodies are too large for effective work. The comparison made by the opponents of this bill in this respect is not complimentary to the American people. If a Parliament in France, with a membership of 584, can discharge its legislative functions efficiently and with fidelity to the people, I resent the suggestion that an equal number of American legislators are incapable of rendering efficient service.

At present a Member of the House represents 194,181. Under the proposed bill he will represent 211,877. If the number is kept at 391, with the latest census he will represent 233,016. It is true that some Members now represent districts with double this number. It is the judgment of the House that its membership is better informed about the condition of the country when each Member comes from a different section as the elect of different people. In my judgment there should be as many Representatives in the House as is consistent with the honest expression of the will of the American people.

Between its deliberative and its representative character, perhaps, the people value its representative quality more highly.

You strike a blow at its representative quality if you defeat this bill. We should hesitate to declare it unwieldy and nondeliberative until its changed procedure has been fully tested. From its present record it seems to possess both qualities in the highest degree.

The census was compiled by an office created by act of Congress and under the executive branch of the Government. Its report has been made. It is scientific and able. The work of the bureau deserves the commendation of all.

The method of apportioning Representatives is simple, fair, and proper. A ratio was found by calculating the average constituency of each Representative. This was divided into the total population. The quotient was 433, and is used for the total number of Representatives. The ratio is then divided into the population of each State, and a Representative is assigned for each integer and major fraction thereof. There is no politics, favoritism, or objectionable feature in this. It is a novel and satisfactory method.

It has been urged that this measure should be defeated on the ground of economy. The cost of the new Members will total five or six hundred thousand dollars. If this money were appropriated for useless and unnecessary officials, the argument should be given grave consideration. However, 15,000,000 people have been added to our Nation. Their right to representation should be heeded as long as this Government remains unchanged. The new Representatives will be called upon to perform important functions, and the dollars which are spent in their behalf will be amply repaid if they heed the command of 15,000,000 people, united with 75,000,000 other people, to make a strong effort to force this Government to economize. Money spent necessarily to further the principle that this is a representative government is not squandered.

It has not been established that the House, with a membership of 391, is unwieldy or inefficient. It does not appear that on account of its numbers it has fallen into the hands of a few or is controlled by committees. It can fall into the hands of a few only when its Members surrender their rights and submit weakly to dictatorship. When its manhood and courage are aroused the House has shown that on account of its numbers it is stronger and more powerful than any ruler or set of rulers. Its procedure can protect and insure the rights of each Member and guarantee that the deliberative character of the House will not be lost. An increase in its membership will secure a proper representation for the great increase in the population of the country during the past decade. It can not be asserted that 42 more Members will materially alter the present character of the House. The adoption of this bill will be a faithful fulfillment of the constitutional duty of this body. Its defeat will be a betrayal of public confidence. It is not disputed that the power and duty of the Senate is more than passive in this matter; but the Senate should strive to help the House to maintain its representative character, and it would be remiss in its duty if it defeated this resolution despite the approval of the House and the persuasive reasons demanding its adoption. The plain intendment of the Constitution requires the prompt and speedy passage of this measure, so that the House will adequately represent 91,000,000 of American freemen.

THE COTTON SCHEDULE.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, there have been two amendments proposed to the cotton schedule of the present tariff law. One by the senior Senator from Wisconsin, proposing a system of duties based upon a 20 per cent ad valorem rate for gray cotton yarn and cloth. Another by the Ways and Means Committee of the House based upon an ad valorem rate from 10 per cent to 25 per cent on gray yarn and cloth, the general average of which would be materially lower than the other amendment. Because it is the more moderate of the two, I propose to consider some of the features of this first amendment and of the results which might be expected from it, all of which I think would be even more pronounced if the more extreme bill of the Ways and Means Committee should become a law.

The Senator from Wisconsin, in his statement given to the press in regard to his proposed amendments to the textile schedule, has this to say of the cotton schedule:

> I believe the duties proposed in the amendments are greater than necessary to protect our manufacturers from European competition. However, as this is a temporary measure, I prefer to err on the safe side and make sure that no legitimate American industry can possibly be injured by any of the proposed changes.
>
> The cotton schedule I propose provides for the following duties: On yarns and thread, 20 per cent ad valorem; on cloth unbleached, 20 per cent; on cloth bleached, 25 per cent; on cloth dyed, printed, or stained, 30 per cent; on all manufactures of cotton cloth, 35 per cent; on cotton laces, embroideries, and ornamental trimmings, 35 per cent; on hosiery, 30 and 35 per cent.
>
> The present average rate on cotton yarns and threads is a fraction over 33 per cent.
>
> The average duty under the present law on cotton cloth is 42 per cent. The adoption of the proposed amendment would eliminate the complex cotton schedule and would simplify and expedite the collection of duties.
>
> Summing up the proposed changes, the average ad valorem rate on cotton goods, including artificial silk, is to be reduced under the proposed amendments from 55.59 per cent under the present act to 29.45 per cent, representing a reduction of over 26 per cent ad valorem, and over 47 per cent below the present rate.
>
> The effect of this proposed change to the consumers of the country is of supreme importance. In the case of cotton, take the figures for the production of this country as secured by the census of 1910. Add to these imports of cotton manufactures for that year and deduct from this total our exports of manufactures of cotton, and it is ascertained that the total consumption of cotton fabrics in the United States for the year 1910 amounted to $651,000,000. The proposed reduction of duty under the cotton schedule is 26 per cent, and assuming that the price to the consumer will be reduced to the same extent, this would give a reduction to the consumers upon cotton alone under the proposed duties of over $169,000,000.
> This is an estimate which must be reduced to the extent to which domestic competition modifies the effect of the tariff in cases where the total duty is not added to the cost. The less there is of domestic competition the greater the proportion of the duty which is added to the price to the consumer. The Woolen Trust dominates the woolen industry, and independent manufacturers follow its lead in their price policy. The same is true to a very large extent of the cotton schedule. I believe it is safe in these two industries to assume that the total duty is added to the price to the consumer.
> As against this saving to the consumers of the country I have estimated the loss of revenue to the Government upon these two schedules—that is, cotton and woolen—to be in the neighborhood of $30,000,000.

The effect of such a reduction as is here proposed of $169,000,000 in the gross receipts of the cotton industry of this country is certainly of supreme importance to the people engaged in that industry. That such a saving can be made by any manipulation of the tariff in an industry constituted as this one is, is a remarkable statement, but that it can be done without injury to any legitimate industry makes it startling. I certainly presume that the author of this amendment would not deny that the cotton industry is a legitimate one, and therefore ought not to be injured by these proposed changes. The statistics of the cotton industry for the year 1909, as shown by the last census report, shows that it has an invested capital of $808,289,000, that the total value of its products was $616,524,000, that the cost of materials was $361,330,000 and of wages $129,768,000. Of the proposed saving of $169,000,000, $9,039,996 come from the changes of duties on the importations. This leaves practically $160,000,000 to be obtained from the domestic industry. It is plain, I think, that none of this can come from the cost of materials. There are no tariff changes that can affect the cost of cotton. It must come, therefore, from profits and wages. If we assume that the average earnings of capital have been 10 per cent, which is a much higher rate than the actual facts, in my opinion, and that all of this is to go to the consumer as a saving, it would amount to $80,000,000 that can be derived from this source, which leaves another $80,000,000 still to be accounted for. That can only come from the wages, which amount to $129,000,000. Eighty million dollars taken from this would leave to the mill operatives of the North and South $49,000,000, where they are now receiving $129,000,000, or a reduction of 62.01 per cent as their contribution toward national economy.

If some one is disposed to say that these earnings of 10 per cent allowed for capital are too little, that the capital engaged in the cotton industry on the average earns more than this, and there have been those in times not long past who, taking the exceptional dividends of exceptional mills in years of exceptional prosperity, have satisfied themselves that marvelous profits went to those engaged in this industry, let us look at these census figures from another standpoint. They show that the total cost of materials is $361,330,000; the total wages paid, $129,768,000; and the sum of these two is $491,098,000. The total value of the output was $616,524,000, and, deducting this cost of wages and materials, we have $125,426,000 as the only possible source from which all profits and all expenses, except labor and materials, such as depreciation, taxes, insurance, salaries, and all miscellaneous items must come. If we assume, now, that by the use of some magic wand all of these expenses can be done away with and capital can be found to conduct this great industry for the benefit of the consumer without a reward of any kind, even then to produce this $169,000,000 saving the wage earner must contribute $44,000,000, or 33.90 per cent, to round out this magnificent economy that is to be brought about without injury to anybody by the simple device of changing the duties on importations to a reduced ad valorem basis. I confess as I have studied over these figures I look at them with more and more astonishment. I can well understand the doctrine of a free trader who admits the injury to the industry by foreign competition, but believes it is made up by the benefit to the consumer. I can not understand, however, how such a change as is proposed by this amendment can be seriously advanced and joined with the statement that "no legitimate American industry can possibly be injured." Certainly to take away from the wage earner 33.90 per cent to 62.01 per cent of his wages can not be regarded as a benefit, or, if the other alternative is considered, to deprive the many thousands of stockholders in this great industry of all participation in its profits would seem an injury to most people.

But, after all, this is a somewhat academical discussion, for there is no reason to suppose that the changes which this amendment proposes could possibly produce the result of saving to the consumers of the country so large a sum as $169,000,000. A very casual examination of the method by which these figures have been obtained shows, it seems to me, that they are based upon a fundamental error. The cotton schedule consists, in the first place, of a system of duties upon cotton yarns, then of a system of duties upon cotton cloth, then of a variety of duties upon miscellaneous articles. Under these divisions, according to the figures in the table presented by the Senator from Wisconsin, for the six months ending December 31, 1910, there was imported yarn to the value of $3,747,000, at an average duty of 30 per cent, and cloth to the value of $4,123,000, at an average duty of 43.08 per cent. Under the miscellaneous divisions the most important, measured by the amount of importations, are the paragraphs covering laces, embroideries, and a number of similar articles, the total importations of which were more than $20,000,000, at rates from 60 to 70 per cent. The total importations of cotton fabrics under all these divisions amounted to $34,852,000, and the average rate of duty on these importations was 55.59 per cent. The average rate of duty on these importations under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin is 29.45 per cent, making a difference in the rate on actual importations under the present law and the proposed amendments of 26 per cent.

The total consumption of cotton fabrics for the year 1909, as reported by the Census Bureau, and with an allowance made for the difference between the imports and exports of cotton fabrics, was $561,000,000. Twenty-six per cent of this is the $169,000,000 that is proposed to be saved by the amendment. It must be evident to the most casual student of these figures that this estimated result could only be correct provided the proportion of imports of each variety of articles bears the same relation to the total imports as the consumption of each article bears to the total consumption of the country. The rates of duty from which the average rate is figured vary from 15 per cent to more than 70 per cent. The average of them all depends upon whether the high-priced article or the low-priced article is imported in the larger quantity. If a large proportion of the imports happens to be at the high rate of duty and the large quantity of the domestic production happens to fall under the schedules where the duties are low, it is plain that the average duty of the importations can not possibly be a correct basis for figuring the result of the change in the duties. Now, this is exactly what has happened. The high duties of 60 per cent and 70 per cent on laces, embroideries, and so forth, the importation of which is relatively very large and the domestic production very small, have been used to largely increase the duties of the yarn and cloth divisions, the importations of which are relatively very small and the domestic production very large, with the result that duties of 30 per cent on yarn and 43 per cent on cloth have become an average duty of 55.59 per cent for the whole schedule. The importations of yarn and cloth together were only some $7,863,000, or about 22.04 per cent of the total importations. The importations of laces and similar articles were over $20,000,000, or 57.04 per cent of the whole importations. Now, the proposed estimate of saving can only be correct provided there is the same percentage of high and low duty articles in the total consumption of the country as exists in the importations, and this is not the fact.

It is well known to everyone conversant with the subject that laces, with the exception of lace curtains, which is an entirely distinct fabric, are almost entirely imported. During the year 1909 the total number of lace machines in this country did not exceed 120, and their total production did not exceed a million and a half dollars. On the other hand the preliminary census report on cotton goods shows the production for 1909 to have been $616,297,000, and an examination of the subdivisions of this product shows that about $548,000,000 of this total would, if imported, come in under the regular yarn or cloth paragraphs of the tariff law, leaving $68,000,000 which might have come in under the miscellaneous paragraphs, but some of which, if we knew exactly what they were, would probably have come in under the other paragraphs. The domestic production of the goods coming under these low-duty paragraphs was some 89 per cent of the total production, while there were imported but 22 per cent of the total importations. The domestic production under the miscellaneous paragraphs was about 11 per cent of the domestic production, but the importations were 57 per cent. The proper way to figure the saving on this $548,000,000 is not to take an average of the duties on laces and cloths, but is to take the actual difference between the duties on cloths under the present law of 43.08 per cent and the proposed change of 28.38 per cent, or 14.77 per cent—practically 15 per cent. Using the actual percentages and not averages makes a difference in the amount claimed to be saved of nearly $60,000,000. The fact is that a duty on laces made in Calais, France, has no connection with a duty on print cloth made in Fall River; a duty on embroideries has nothing to do with a duty on ginghams. Trying to arrive at correct results by the system of averages is like trying to add six apples to eight oranges and expecting the result to be either apples or oranges.

I have called attention to this error partially because of its magnitude and because to spread broadcast an exaggerated statement of the result of the proposed changes is extremely misleading. It implies a result that can not be obtained. I am also calling attention to it for another and entirely different reason. And that is because it is such an apt illustration of the mistaken and dangerous consequences into which one can be led by using a system of averages in dealing with such a very complex situation as is the relation between cotton duties and cotton manufactures. The articles covered by this cotton schedule are of the most varied and diverse character, running from delicate laces which can be drawn through a finger ring to cotton cloths so heavy and solid that they can scarcely be bent between the two hands; from a spool of thread consisting of but a single strand to the highly ornamented cloth that makes the evening dress of the woman of fashion. In fact, it includes articles whose only relation to each other is that they are made out of cotton and that labor goes into their cost and, therefore, for convenience of classification, they are included in a common schedule.

Now, there is nothing more deceptive than averages in dealing with a question of this kind. If it could be shown that the product of a certain industry needed, on an average, a duty of 25 per cent for its exact protection and such a duty was put in force, it is evident that only one-half of the industry would have the required protection. To make an average one-half must be above the average and the other half below. The proposed duty is based, apparently, upon the theory of averages. It is assumed that an average of the products of the cotton industry can be protected by a duty of 20, 25, and 30 per cent, as their difference may be gray, bleached, or colored, and it is proposed, therefore, to adopt such a duty. The inevitable effect, it seems to me, of this proposition is that all products of that industry whose needs for protection are below the general average will have ample protection, and even excess protection, and that all products of that industry whose needs for protection are above the general average will not receive the protection they need, and must either find some method to reduce cost, as compared with those products on the other side of the average or they will be displaced by the products of foreign countries.

This is exactly what would seem to be the result of applying the proposed ad valorem duty at the same rate to all products of the cotton industry. It is proposed that there shall be a 20 per cent ad valorem duty alike on all numbers of cotton yarn and on all kinds of gray cotton cloth. This on its face undoubtedly seems like a very equitable proposition. It is apparently giving exactly the same measure of protection to every product, and therefore commends itself to those without technical knowledge of the industry as extraordinarily equitable and fair. It appears simple, as it has been claimed to be, and something that anyone can understand. If the elements that make up the cost of cotton fabrics bore in all cases the same relations to each other, no doubt this would be the result, or if all the elements that make up the cost needed protection in the same degree it would be equitable. But that is not the case. In fact, there is an extraordinary variation in the proportions in which labor, cotton, and other items of cost come together in different fabrics to produce the final cost. We are dealing with a product of raw material which has substantially the same price here and abroad, but in which the other items of cost have for the most part entirely different values, and these come together in different kinds of cotton fabrics to form the final cost in very diverse relations. To take this in its most extreme form, I think it can be safely said that the fabrics that would be subject to this duty of 20 per cent from cloth in which the cotton cost is as high as 75 per cent of the total to cloths where it does not exceed 25 per cent. Take, for instance, the cost of cotton yarn, from 20's and below, with cotton at about 15 cents a pound, as it has been recently. The selling price of many of these would be in the neighborhood of 22 cents a pound. The cost of the cotton in such an article, with allowance made for waste, would probably be about 17 cents a pound, leaving 5 cents a pound for the other items of cost, including labor. The duty at 20 per cent would be 4.4 cents a pound, or nearly 90 per cent of the elements of cost other than cotton. On the other hand, take some of the high-grade fabrics in which the proportion of cotton to the other elements of value are reversed. Suppose we have a fabric the total cost of which is $1 a pound, 25 per cent of which is due to cotton. The duty at 20 per cent on such a fabric would be 20 cents a pound, and it would be equivalent to a protection on the items of cost outside of cotton of only 26⅔ per cent.

It seems to me that the mere statement of this is enough to show the impracticability of applying a single ad valorem rate to this schedule. Its effect would be not to protect equally in all fabrics the labor which enters into it, but to give it a most unequal protection. Under this system the greater the proportion of labor expended in producing the different numbers of yarn and the different varieties of cloth the less the protection that labor would receive. On the coarsest common fabrics, used for ordinary purposes and by those who can only afford to buy the cheaper grades, the protection for the labor involved in its manufacture under this proposed duty is much greater than the protection for the labor employed in the manufacture of the fine high-quality fabric which is used by those who can afford to pay for the best qualities.

The greater the relative proportion of labor in any fabric under this method of assessing duties the less protection that labor will receive. In the manufacture of the coarsest grades the mechanical skill required on the part of the operative is naturally less than that required in the manufacture of the better qualities. This duty so arranges it that the greater the skill of the operative, the longer time that has been required for him to learn his trade, the less will be the protection that he is to receive. What possible justice can there be in a tariff that produces such results? Certainly the skilled artisan is entitled to as much protection as the unskilled. The present cotton schedule is based upon a principle that has been followed in the making of its immediate predecessors and is designed to so arrange duties that as the proportion of labor increases, as compared with the raw material, the amount of protection shall be increased, thus aiming to produce as nearly as possible a uniform system of protection for the labor involved in the different varieties of cloth from low to high. The bill proposed is a direct reversal of this system. It would almost seem as if it was designed to protect cotton instead of labor.

What must be the inevitable result of a tariff which proportions its protection in this manner it seems to me easy to forecast. Of late years the progress of the industry in beautifying and ornamenting their fabrics has been remarkable. Their products have improved, both in the technical quality of smoothness and evenness of the yarn and cloth and in the artistic quality of designing new and attractive fabrics and seasonable patterns that have given to the spindles and looms of the country a new market for their product.

It is in this direction that skill and intelligence have their peculiar field of operation. The same pound of cotton that in the low-grade sheeting is converted into cloth with a minimum percentage of labor cost as compared with cotton in these higher-grade fabrics in many cases has two or three, or even four times, the amount of labor cost put upon it as the original cotton itself cost, and this labor, both of management and operation, is high-grade labor. That field of activity, the one which I should think any sensible nation would like to particularly encourage for the employment of her citizens, will be passed over to our foreign competitors. What the result will be when the whole 28,000,000 of spindles employed in this industry have to compete with each other for the lower one-half or two-thirds of a business, the whole volume of which they can more than supply, is easily imagined.

In addition to the reduction proposed for cotton cloths and yarns, it is also proposed by this amendment that the articles enumerated in paragraphs 349 and 350, commonly known as the lace paragraph, both of which, however, include a large number of other miscellaneous fabrics, such as embroideries, bindings, ribbons, and so forth, requiring for the most part a large relative amount of labor and skill in their production, shall be reduced from the present duties of 60 and 70 per cent to 35. The articles covered by these paragraphs comprise what may be called the luxuries of the cotton schedule. They are largely used by those who have a little money to spare for personal or house decoration. They are in no sense necessities. Some of them are produced in considerable quantities in this country. Some of them, and particularly laces, are almost entirely imported.

There have been for some ten or a dozen years persistent efforts made to establish the cotton-lace industry in this country, and with very variable results. It is the only large textile product a substantial part of the consumption of which has not heretofore been produced in the United States. Under the present tariff bill a step was taken looking to the encouragement of this industry which, so far as this country is concerned, is essentially an infant industry. This consisted in allowing the free importation of lace-making machinery from the passage of the bill to the 1st of January, 1911. At the time of the passage of the present tariff bill there were probably not to exceed 100 lace-making machines in this country, but even with this small number a knowledge of the industry and its very difficult requirements was gradually being acquired. Stimulated by this provision of free entry for the machines several people in different parts of the country have endeavored to start the manufacture of lace, and there are now said to be in the neighborhood of 450 machines here, either already in operation or preparing to start. It is probable that there is used in this country in the neighborhood of $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 worth of laces, such as these machines are capable of manufacturing. The machines now here are capable of producing, perhaps, some $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 worth of laces. It would seem, therefore, that after some dozen years of study and experiment that this industry was in a position where it might reasonably be expected to have a substantial further growth.

The duty collected from laces in the past has been regarded as a revenue duty assessed upon an article of luxury. To-day it has become not only a revenue duty, but a protective duty as well, which there is every reason to believe will lead to the gradual establishment of a large and important American industry, employing labor of a very high degree of technical and artistic skill—an industry that means new opportunities for the skilled artisan—in every way the kind of an industry that encourages among us a valuable class of citizens, people who add to the general average of the intelligence of our population, and therefore a desirable industry. The slowness of its progress heretofore shows the difficulty of starting a business in a community not accustomed to it. Why, then, should the believers in the principles of protection want to cut this duty in half at the very time when in the long years of our life as a nation there exists a chance for its establishment here?

Considering the general facts of this proposed change in the duties applying to cotton manufactures, it at once becomes evident that it is most radical and drastic. I doubt if any change has been made in the whole history of tariff legislation in any important schedule that is of as extreme a nature as the proposition now under consideration. In the first place, the amount of the proposed reduction is very great. To reduce duties on any article of importance at one step to the amount of 50 per cent, which in a general way is what is here proposed, can not be considered a small change. In addition to this great reduction in actual rates, it is also an entire change in the method of applying rates—from specific to ad valorem—and in addition to this change of basic method it makes a uniform rate apply to every article, whereas heretofore the specific duties and the ad valorem upon which they were based have divided the products of the cotton mills into classes and applied varying rates of duty in accordance with the varying proportions of the items that constitute the cost of manufacture.

The present general principle upon which cotton cloths have been divided into classes has existed in every cotton schedule since the Civil War. It was in the Wilson bill of 1894, as it has been in all the Republican tariff measures. For the first time in 50 years a measure is now proposed that not merely aims to change the rate of protection, but changes the entire system of applying those rates. And this change is not the well-considered result of an extended study on the part of experts who might reasonably be expected to foresee its results, but it is proposed by people who at the best have but a theoretical knowledge of the result to be expected from such a change when applied to such a diversified industry as this. And, more important than any of these features of the amendments, it is proposed to make this great change in the rates of protection and the method of protection without at the same time making any change in the duties upon other important and related branches of manufacture. If what I have already said in regard to the effect of this measure upon the wages of the operatives in the cotton industry is correct, and I think it is, then to carry on the cotton industry in this country in anything like its present volume it would be necessary not merely to reduce the scale of wages now prevailing, but that reduction would take place at a time when no similar reductions were being made in the wages paid in other lines of employment. It would be necessary to carry on this industry under these new conditions of foreign competition without any compensatory measures being taken to lower the prices of any of the miscellaneous supplies outside of cotton which are used in the industry.

It is inconceivable that such a reduction as this in the wages of cotton weavers and spinners and other employees could be brought about when the remuneration of American labor in other lines of employment was unaffected. It must result in the wage earners now getting their livelihood in the manufacture of all those branches of cotton yarn and cloth that would be particularly affected by this change gradually drifting to the other lines of employment in which there had been no change made, and in the consequent closing of many factories. It is surprising that such a radical step could be proposed, without any effort being made to get the most full and complete information of its probable effect by consulting with those engaged in the industry whose knowledge of its extremely varied products is such as to make them competent to give information, and to put their information in such form that it would be easily accessible to the public. No hearings have been held where the affected parties, whether the owners of the capital invested or the vitally interested wage earner, could be represented. Certainly a step of the importance of this one, affecting many hundreds of thousands of our citizens and many hundreds of millions of capital, is entitled to receive most careful consideration. Why should this one industry, out of all the other thousands of forms in which American capital and American labor find their occupation, be selected for this radical step? There is no other manufacturing industry that more naturally, if we are to be a manufacturing nation at all, should be desired to be carried on in this country. We are the greatest producers of cotton in the world. I believe it would be intolerable to the spirit of the American people that the cotton grown on our own soil should be shipped across the Atlantic to another country and returned to us as a finished product, giving thereby employment and profit to the citizens of foreign countries, instead of our own.

I presume, Mr. President, this proposed action is based upon the impression that exorbitant and unreasonable profits accrue to the people engaged in this particular industry. Such statements have been frequently made of late, both on the floor of this Chamber and in the campaign speeches in various sections of the country, particularly where agriculture is the predominant interest and whose people, therefore, are the consumers rather than the producers of this particular article. That it is not true the history of the industry and the present condition of it amply demonstrates. This matter was gone into in a most thorough and complete manner in the speech delivered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts when the present Payne-Aldrich bill was under discussion in this Chamber. He then had prepared numerous statements covering the results of a very large proportion of the total important establishments engaged in this industry in New England. They show conclusively what are the facts of the case, that, taking the New England part of the industry as a whole, comparing the particularly fortunate with those who have been less so, the profits made in the cotton mills of that section do not exceed on the average from 6 to 8 per cent. These statistics consist of a table showing the dividends of some 40 representative mills for the 10 years from 1882 to 1892, prepared by Gen. Draper, of Massachusetts, which shows that the average dividends of those concerns for that decade was 6.5 per cent. Another table shows the dividends of Fall River mills for the 14 years from 1895 to 1908, showing that the average dividends those paid were 5.99 per cent. A third statement shows that the average of 26 mills north of Boston was 5.88 per cent. Another shows the dividends of 44 companies for 20 years, with an average dividend of 6.66 per cent. He gives, also, a statement of the 10 leading mills in New Bedford—probably the most prosperous in the country—including the Dartmouth, whose exceptional profits have been the romance of the cotton trade and has almost made its envious competitors think that its management must have discovered the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow, showing an average for 10 years of 10.45 per cent. These tables are very elaborate and very carefully prepared, and thoroughly represent what I know of my own knowledge to be the case in regard to this industry; and, without objection, I will submit them in detail as part of my remarks, to be printed in the RECORD at the end of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, in addition to this statement of selected New Bedford mills for 10 years, I have a statement of the result of all the mills in New Bedford for 20 years, which is as follows:

Average capital New Bedford cotton mills past 20 years, $13,426,000; average spindles New Bedford cotton mills past 20 years, 1,260,000; average dividends paid (including stock dividends) 20 years, $22,280,000; average per cent dividends (including stock dividends), 8.37 per cent; average per cent dividends based on $20 per spindle, 4.42 per cent.

In addition to the mistaken belief that exists in some sections in regard to the profits of this industry, it has also been believed that the cotton schedule of the Payne-Aldrich bill is a radical advance in rates as compared with its predecessor, the Dingley law. This idea has been carefully and laboriously fostered by most strenuous efforts from many quarters. It is very easy to make assertions and very difficult to get together the facts in connection with a great and varied industry of this kind to prove or disprove them; and with reference to this schedule, with all the controversies that have arisen in regard to it, the controlling fact that must settle it could not be obtained until we had the reports of the customhouse showing the actual value of the importations and the actual duties collected thereon for the first year of the operation of this law. The controversy which went on on the floor of this Senate, and from here spread over the country, was based upon whether or not the statement made by the then chairman of the Finance Committee, Mr. Aldrich, that the average ad valorem duty on the importations of cotton cloth under the new schedule would not exceed the average ad valorem duty on the importations during the first years of the Dingley law, was or was not correct. He stated and amply demonstrated that, owing to various legal interpretations of the wording of different schedules of the cotton tariff, there had been very material reductions made in the duties being collected on a variety of articles amounting as a total to a very considerable proportion of the importations, and claimed that the average duties under the new schedule would not exceed the average duties during the first years of the Dingley law.

For the benefit of those not familiar with these schedules, I would say that the duties under them are partly specific and partly ad valorem. It is the custom of the Treasury Department at the end of each fiscal year to add together all the duties collected, of whatever kind, and the value of all the material imported, whether under the specific or the ad valorem duties, and from this data to figure what would be the percentage of ad valorem duty provided it had all been collected as ad valorem. This resultant figure is known as the "equivalent ad valorem," and is the measure of the rate of the total duties collected. It shows whether as a whole the rate of duties goes up or down. These figures are made up in each case for the fiscal year ending June 30. I have here a table, which I ask permission to print as part of my remarks, showing this equivalent ad valorem for each year from 1898, the first year of the operation of the Dingley law, up to and including 1910, the first year of the operation of the Payne-Aldrich law, and it shows that this equivalent ad valorem for the first three years of the Dingley law was 43.71 per cent, 44.10 per cent, and 43.76 per cent, respectively, and that the corresponding figure for the year 1910, the first year of the present law, was 42.12 per cent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted to print the table in the RECORD.

The table referred to is as follows:

Table showing equivalent ad valorem on cotton cloth.

Mr. LIPPITT. These are the figures for the importations of cotton cloth alone, for it is this part of the duties of the cotton schedule that has been particularly claimed to be the subject of enormous advances. Interested parties have circulated statements implying that extreme advances existed in this particular schedule of 50 per cent, 60 per cent, and 75 per cent or more. If that was the case to any material extent, it certainly must show in the duties collected on the actual importations of cloth, the volume of which has not materially changed from the importations of the preceding year. An examination, moreover, of the details of this volume shows that the relative proportion of these different classes of importations has not materially changed, so that the comparison is a fair one. Here we have, then, the final measure of the great and burdensome increase in tariff duties that this new law is supposed to have brought about: From an average of 43.86 per cent, when the duties of the Dingley law were collected as they were intended to be collected, to 42.12 per cent under the present law, or, instead of this enormous increase that has been heralded from one end of the country to the other, an actual decrease of nearly 2 per cent. Further than that, it was claimed by the supporters of the schedule that when trade had adjusted itself to some of the new methods of classification that were introduced for the purpose of making the duties consistent with each other there would be a reduction, probably, even from the duties as at first collected. Fortunately, we have evidence on this point, for in the very elaborate table prepared by the Senator from Wisconsin, showing the results of these duties on cloth for the first six months of its operation, the equivalent ad valorem on cotton cloth is 43.08 per cent, whereas the equivalent figure for the whole year is 42.12 per cent, showing that the rate for the last six months must have been about 41 per cent to obtain this average. It shows that the expected readjustment was taking place and that a still further reduction, instead of an advance, in this figure, that decisively measures the rates of duty, might be looked for in the succeeding year.

The essence of this whole question in regard to advances in the cotton schedule is really this, that on 90 per cent of the total manufactures of cotton cloth there was absolutely no change in the duty whatever, and that therefore all the changes that were made, whether up or down, applied to such a small proportion of the actual products of cotton goods of this country that their effect was unimportant. In addition to the belief that the cotton schedule had been radically advanced, and as a consequence of this advance, it has also been believed by the general public that there had occurred a radical advance in the price of cotton fabrics. The impression prevailed that, sheltered behind some new and lofty stone slyly put upon the top of the existing wall of protection, the cotton manufacturers were exacting a so-called tribute from the consumers of their products. The actual facts, as shown by the prices of to-day, are as conclusive proof of the falsity of statements to produce this impression as is this equivalent ad valorem duty proof of the fact that the rates themselves have not been materially raised. It is well known that during the last two years there has been a very radical advance in the price of cotton. During March, April, and May of 1909, when the cotton would have been purchased for goods to be marketed in July and August of that year, the time of the passage of the Payne-Aldrich law, the price of cotton in New York varied from 9.6 cents, as the lowest, to 10.9 as the highest, and in a general way may be said to have been 10 cents a pound. During the past winter and early spring the price of cotton has been not far from 15 cents a pound, an advance of about 50 per cent, or an actual increase of 5 cents a pound, and, with the usual allowance made for waste, equivalent to an increased cost of cotton in the goods of some 6 cents a pound.

In view of such a radical change in the price of raw material it would not be surprising if there had also been a radical advance to compensate for it in the price of cotton goods. Instead of this being the case the actual facts are that cotton goods of most kinds are selling to-day all over the country so far as manufacturers' prices are concerned for less than they were at the time this law went into effect. In some very heavy fabrics, where cotton is the chief element of cost, there has been an advance, but in no case, so far as I know, has the advance been equal to the increased cost of the cotton and in most cases the reduction in actual prices is so radical in spite of the increased cost of cotton that no fair-minded man can doubt that the mills selling at such figures must be doing so at an actual loss. The cotton-manufacturing trade of this country as a whole is to-day, I believe, not only not making a profit but is wearing out its machinery at an actual loss, hoping that this condition will not be of long continuance and believing that it is better to keep its organizations together for a time at least than to suffer the perhaps equal losses caused by idle factories. The principal trade paper of New York, in a summary of the cotton goods situation on July 22, has this to say of the situation:

> The mills have their backs to the wall and, while many of them have made preparations for a larger business than has come forward, they are not going to put cloths into process unless buyers give some hints of the amounts they will take. Two years of high cotton and one year and six months of dull trade has served to milk the surplus of most concerns and the condition to-day is that mills must close more freely if they can not secure a more profitable outlet for their product.

In support of the statement that prices are lower I have here a list of a number of fabrics representing the great bulk of the ordinary cloths that are commonly made in large quantities by the mills of New England and the South. These prices are taken from the public price list of C. H. Pope & Co., well known cotton cloth brokers of New York, of August, 1909, and of June, of this year. I will not read this entire list, but, without objection, will print it in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

As a representative fabric, take the price of 39-inch 80 by 80, weighing 4 yards to the pound, a style that is made in large quantities both North and South. The price in 1909 was 7¼ cents; this year, 6⅞—a reduction of three-eighths cent a yard—although the increased price of the cotton in this fabric would have increased the cost of the cloth 1½ cents a yard. In some cases the actual prices of the goods are higher, as in the case of the 30-inch 2½-yard drill, which was 8¼ cents in 1909 and 9 cents to-day—an increase of three-fourths cent a yard—but the rise in cotton prices increased the cost of this fabric 2¼ cents, so that, based upon the cost of production, the cloth is still selling at 1½ cents a yard lower margin, and 1 cent a yard would probably be a handsome profit on this particular fabric. Most of the fabrics are materially lower; for instance, the 96 by 100, 5-yard goods. The price in 1909 was 9¼ cents a yard. To-day it is 8½ cents a yard. Wherever the price is higher it represents but a small proportion of the advanced cost in raw material. I also submit the prices of a few standard styles of fine-yarn fabrics, reported to me by D. O. Tatum, another well-known cotton-goods broker in New York, for August, 1909, and May of this year:

Prices of standard cotton cloths, as reported by D. O. Tatum, 1909–1911.

Description.	August, 1909.	May, 1911.
	Cents.	Cents.
88 by 80, 30 inches, 11.35 yards	5¾	5⅝
72 by 68, 40 inches, 9.50 yards	6¾	6½
76 by 72, 40 inches, 9 yards	7¼	6⅞
88 by 80, 40 inches, 8.50 yards	8	7⅞
96 by 100, 40 inches, 7 yards	10	9⅝
96 by 100, 40 inches, 9 yards	10	9¼
84 by 80, 40 inches, 10.50 yards	8½	7½
96 by 100, 40 inches, 11 yards	10½	10

These are all goods made out of the extra staple Allen seed, or sea-island cotton, the advance in the prices of which, as is well known, has increased in even larger proportion than the prices of the ordinary cottons during the last two years. On different styles these show prices of to-day of 6¼ as against 6¾, of 6½ as against 7½, of 7½ as against 8½, of 9¼ as against 10, and so on. What is true in these instances, which in their variety represent a very large percentage of the total cotton cloth manufactured, is equally true in others. For instance, soisettes, one of the best known and most attractive mercerized fabrics in the market, was selling at the time of the passage of the Payne-Aldrich bill at 14½ cents. Its price to-day is 14 cents. "Fruit of the Loom," the well-known brand of bleached goods, which has been a standard cloth for nearly half a century, was selling in August, 1909, at 9¼ cents. The price to-day is 8 cents. Now, what I understand and believe to be true about this subject of cotton manufacturing is just about this, that the industry is one in which domestic competition is, and always has been, very keen. There are no units of production, or so-called trusts, large enough to control or dominate it. Nobody has any control over the raw material or over any necessary ingredient of manufacture in such a way as to prevent any individual, or group of individuals, who feel like it, from going into the business.

The technical knowledge in regard to it is widely disseminated. There is nothing secret about it. The result is that when two or three good seasons come along they immediately bring about a rapid increase in machinery, and prices fall back again, the average of the good and bad seasons being a normal profit of from 6 to 8 per cent. The instant the demand for any fabric makes its manufacture disproportionately profitable, there is immediately a rush of looms to produce it. Hundreds of manufacturers in widely separated localities every day, week, and month are watching the prices of the different fabrics to see on which one they can run their looms to the best advantage, and they are all the time changing to meet market conditions, and in this way prices are relative. This being so, I do not believe it would make the slightest difference in the prices of goods in this country if the present rates in the cotton schedule were increased. Domestic competition would absolutely limit domestic prices to about the present rate. On the other hand, I do not question that in the enormous variety of cotton fabrics, which are divided into classes for the sake of simplicity, there are many on which the duty could be reduced without reducing their price in this country. But it is to be remembered—and it seems to me from a common-sense standpoint this is the essence of the whole question—that there is nothing to be gained by anybody in reducing the tariff unless you thereby reduce the price to the consumer of the article it covers; and if you reduce the price and the industry is to continue, one of two conditions must exist—either capital must be earning in that industry such a large profit that it will continue in the industry at a reduced compensation or the labor employed must work for less wages. I have tried to demonstrate, and I believe it to be a fact, that capital is not getting excessive returns in this industry. On the other hand, I do not believe that the labor employed in this industry is paid an undue price as compared with other American industries. Therefore there is no possible way in which the consumers of this country can have American-made cotton goods at a lower price unless conditions are to be brought around that will reduce the wages not of cotton-mill labor alone but of American labor as a body.

The apparent belief of some people that in some way the consumers of American-made cotton goods are to be able to obtain them at a materially lower price and that still labor is to get its present compensation and capital to receive such reasonable returns as will keep it employed in the business, is an absolute fallacy. No such results can possibly be brought about. American consumers can have cheaper cotton goods, but they will be made in England and Germany, and there is no manipulation of this cotton schedule in my belief that can possibly be made that at one and the same time will cheapen the cost of cotton goods to the consumer and retain the industry in the United States.

What we would like to know for the present discussion is what would be the result of the changes proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin, who, in effect, establishes a uniform rate of 20 per cent, or of the still more drastic proposition of the Ways and Means Committee, who think 15 per cent measures all the benefits that an industry of this magnitude is to the United States. The Senator from Wisconsin says that with a 20 per cent duty the consumers would save $169,000,000 and that the producers would not be injured. The Ways and Means Committee say that the effect of a 15 per cent duty would simply be to increase the importations from $28,000,000 to $39,000,000.

If either of these propositions is correct, certainly no one should object to their being put in force. If there is some way by which such an enormous sum of money as $169,000,000 can be saved to the consumers of this country without American labor having their wages reduced, I am for it. Or if a 15 per cent duty on cotton cloth will only increase the importations $11,000,000 I can see no reason for objection to the change. But I certainly have not yet been able to convince myself that either of these results could possibly be attained. I believe that either one of these measures would very shortly result in the importation of anywhere from 30 per cent to 50 per cent of the United States consumption of cotton cloth, and perhaps more even than the highest figure, and that means from $200,000,000 to $300,000,000. How to demonstrate the correctness of this belief I confess is puzzling. I know of no statistics sufficiently definite to prove it. Taking 10 or 15 or 20 different fabrics here and there in an industry as large as this is too indefinite. But there has been a great deal of talk lately about Canada, and it did occur to me that the condition of the Canadian cotton industry was perhaps some indication of the result we might expect. There have been many statements lately that Canadian labor conditions are similar to ours. There have been many statements that labor there was on a lower basis than ours. Nobody has claimed that it was higher.

For years Canadian citizens have come to New England to work in her textile trade, and it is to be presumed that is a conclusive indication that they can do better here than at home, so that labor can be considered not higher in Canada than with us. Moreover, the profits of capital in that Canadian industry are not high. It was not very long ago that a very large number of Canadian cotton manufacturers were obliged to make a very drastic financial reorganization. Now, the Canadian duty on cotton manufactures, under the British preferential rate, runs from 15 per cent to 30 per cent and is an ad valorem duty. Here, therefore, we have figures that certainly would seem to be a reasonable indication of the results we might expect. Here is what they are: The total value of the cotton manufactures of Canada, including hosiery and thread, was $21,900,000 for 1906. The importations of cotton manufactures last year was $17,700,000, and the duty collected was $4,196,764, which makes an average rate of 23.7 per cent. Now, then, with a duty of practically 24 per cent, Canada imports 44.7 per cent of her consumption of cotton fabrics. If the United States imported 44.7 per cent of the $800,000,000 of her cotton manufactures, including hosiery, she would import $357,000,000. This would mean the destruction, or diversion, of 44.7 per cent of the $970,000,000 now employed in this industry, amounting to $433,000,000. It would mean the throwing out of employment of 44.7 per cent of the 500,000 wage earners now employed in this industry, amounting to 223,000 people, and, with those dependent upon them also, perhaps 800,000 people. The American Nation is composed of people of common sense. Are they ready to face such a proposition? I say nothing of the injustice to those stockholders and wage earners whose livelihood depends upon this industry to be destroyed, although they are as much American citizens as the consumers of their product and are large consumers of the product of those consumers. I simply ask: Is it common sense to destroy, or to take the chance of destroying, for an economic experiment, one-half of an industry that this country has been a hundred years in building up?

Taking all these considerations into view, I believe that if this amendment prevails it means the destruction of a very considerable part of our cotton-manufacturing industry. We undoubtedly can keep some of it, but an important part of it will be transferred to England, France, and Switzerland. The effect will not be confined to any one section of the country. North and South alike will share the burden. We know something of ruined industries in New England. I have been in the harbor of New Bedford when her whaling fleet had been driven from the seas and seen the decaying ships of a lost industry fastened to her falling wharves. As a boy I have walked through the silent streets of Nantucket between the closed and deserted houses of her whaling captains and seen the grass growing between her pavements. In my own little State, which was once a self-supporting agricultural community, you can go for miles through forests that are almost primeval, where 75 years ago were prosperous farms. Industries come and go. They prosper when conditions are right. They wither and decay when the conditions change. Under a protective policy the United States has built up a great cotton industry. Pass this amendment and let it remain on the statute books a few years, and as New Bedford has seen a great sea industry pass away so she may see a great manufacturing industry pass and the roofs of her mills decay and fall as the wharves of her whaling fleet decayed and fell.

Recently the President of the United States joined the people of Fall River in rejoicing at the centennial of the establishment of the cotton industry in that city. If this new policy in regard to this tariff is to prevail, it is apt to be a century plant that blooms but once.

The matter previously referred to is as follows:

[Extract from speech of Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE, of Massachusetts, on cotton schedule, from CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 2, 1909.]

I found, in looking for statistics, that Gen. Draper, who is known to many in the Senate, and who served in the House of Representatives and afterwards as ambassador to Italy, made a very careful table some years ago showing the dividends of a number of mills from 1882 to 1892. I will print it as it stands:

List of companies whose capital has not changed during the 10 years from 1882 to 1892.

"I find the total dividends, $24,420,913 for 10 years (which would be an average dividend of $2,442,091.13 per year), to be 6.58 per cent per annum of the par value of the stocks of the above companies.

"I also find the above annual dividend to be 4.88 per cent of the average selling price for 1882 and 1892, which is $49,993,616."

In the letter which Gen. Draper sent to me, he says:

"As to profits during the past 10 years, I am quite a large owner, for me, in two concerns, one in the North, at Burlington, Vt., and the other in the South, at Charlotte, N. C. Neither of these concerns has paid continuously 6 per cent, either on the capital stock or on the money actually invested, during the last 10 years, though they might have averaged about that figure, but for the bad year just past, during which one of them actually lost money."

I have not gone into the returns of the southern mills of which Gen. Draper speaks, but I think, on the whole, they have probably done somewhat better on an average than the New England mills.

Thirty-two Fall River mills, omitting the Troy Co., which draws its dividends in part from real estate, and omitting two new mills, which have as yet paid small or no dividends, show an average dividend during the last 10 years of 5.99 per cent, say, 6 per cent. The capital, however, in the Fall River mills represents $10.20 per spindle, whereas the cost of building the mills is from $16 to $20 a spindle, probably much nearer the latter figure. A fairer way of figuring the profits is to show how much has been paid per spindle, and on the list which I submit herewith it appears that the average return per spindle per year was 76 cents, or just about 5 per cent, on the lowest cost that anybody could claim that a mill could be produced for.

I will ask that the list, which is a broker's list, conveniently arranged, from Fall River, be printed with the statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LODGE. I have here a statement of the New Bedford dividends. It shows that the average dividend for 10 mills for 10 and 11 years was 10.45 per cent.

New Bedford dividends.

Whitman	7.45	10
Average dividend for 10 mills for 10 and 11 years	10.45	.....

The average for Fall River and New Bedford mills is 8.22 per cent for the last 10 years, but the New Bedford average is above the general average, and brings up the average of southern Massachusetts mills to a point above that of New England generally. In the Lowell, Lawrence, Salem, and Waltham mills the average is between 5 per cent and 6 per cent. The average of 26 mills north of Boston last year was 5.88 per cent. Exceptional profits are usually confined to short periods and are due to fortunate purchases of cotton or some special product which hits the fancy.

Here are the dividends of the New Bedford mills, which I ask to have printed, and also a letter from New Bedford giving some further figures, which I shall be glad to have printed without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

"In further reply to yours of the 15th, I am inclosing a copy of a communication in answer to an editorial published in one of our local papers, together with some figures we have compiled.

"First. The mills in New Bedford are capitalized on an exceedingly low basis, of $10.76 per spindle, and the average cost per spindle of the new mills erected here during the past 10 years would figure practically $25.

"To be conservative, the total capital of our mills figured on a basis of $20 per spindle would be $36,783,100, instead of $19,800,000, amount as at present.

"The average dividends paid during the year 1908 was 8.94 per cent on a total capital of $19,800,000; but if figured on a capital of $36,783,100, and on a $20 per spindle cost, the rate would be 4.89 per cent.

"The mills that have been running for the 10 years ending December 31, 1908, together with the capital of each, average rate of dividend paid, also rate of dividend paid if figured on a basis of $20 per spindle, are as follows:

Names of mills.	Capital.	Rate of dividend.	Rate of dividend per spindle.[1]
		Per cent.	Per cent.
Acushnet	$500,000	21.4	5.079
Bristol	800,000	3.725	2.254
City	750,000	11.575	6.646
Grinnell	1,000,000	9.56	4.51
Hathaway	800,000	13.25	4.892
Pierce	600,000	13.1	4.679
Potomska	1,200,000	5.9	3.278
Wamsutta	3,000,000	6.5	4.281
Dartmouth	600,000	22.85	[2] 6.34

[1] Figured on basis of $20 per spindle cost.
[2] Not including stock dividend.

"It might also be of interest to you to know that the rates of dividends of the above nine corporations are figured on a capitalization of $8.78 per spindle. The mills built during the past 10 years are capitalized at the rate of $14 per spindle, and the average amount of capital of all our mills, as previously stated, is $10.76 per spindle.

"You having called my attention particularly to the dividends paid by the Acushnet and Dartmouth corporations, the above schedule, I think, answers your inquiry as to dividend paid by the mill first mentioned. The Dartmouth figures out, including the 100 per cent stock dividend, declared early in December last, as follows: They have been incorporated 15 years, and the average rate of dividend paid, based on the $20 per spindle, including all extra cash and stock dividends, figures 6.964 per cent per annum. The extra dividend of both these corporations has been declared, as you readily understand, from surplus earnings of many years.

"It might be asked why we still continue to invest money in an industry that does not pay any larger returns. In answer, as you know in Massachusetts especially, our local industries being free from taxation makes our plants attractive to resident investors, and also in the history of this industry the dividends paid have been, as a whole, most uniform.

"Any further information or inquiries that you might desire to make it will give me great pleasure to answer; and trusting that Mr. LODGE will be able to help us somewhat on the slight increase we have asked for our tracing cloth, I remain, with kind regards,

"Yours, very truly, ——— ———."

NEW BEDFORD MILLS AND THE TARIFF—FURTHER CONTROVERSY OVER MERCURY'S EDITORIAL.

To the Editor of the Mercury:

Referring to your editorial in Wednesday's Mercury to the effect that cotton goods are overprotected in the present tariff, I trust that what I may say as a manufacturer may be placed before your readers, because the subject is of vital interest to New Bedford.

How can it be that we have more protection than is necessary, when the importation of cotton goods in the last fiscal year before the panic was as follows:

Cloths, bleached or dyed	$12,727,769
Clothing, except knit	3,771,188
Knit cottons	3,671,848
Laces, edgings, etc	39,756,502
Thread yarn, not spooled	6,940,261
Total cotton goods imported	73,704,636

This import was as much as the total production of Fall River, Lowell, and New Bedford, and if the demand of the whole market had not been at that time very great, owing to general prosperity, these foreign goods would have displaced home goods to a great extent or compel such reductions in price as to result in unemployment or heavy cuts in wages. Since hard times set in nothing but the tariff has prevented foreign competition from crippling every cotton mill in this city.

I and other manufacturers of fine goods are curious to know your authority for the statement that we are now able to compete with English goods without a duty. The cost of their plants has been a third lower than ours and their labor cost of production is a third lower, while the freight on their cloth to our markets is in some cases lower than ours. By reason of combined ocean and rail rates they have been able to reach Chicago, St. Louis, and other points in the interior of our country at a lower freight charge than we have to pay.

A detail report published in Lancashire for the year 1908 gives operations of 68 joint-stock cotton-spinning companies, as follows:

Paid-up share capital, £2,469,469, equal to $2.09 per spindle.

Loan capital, £849,906.

Share and loan capital, equal to $2.80 per spindle.

Net profits for 1908, after providing for interest and depreciation, £374,942, equal to 31⅛ cents per spindle and 15.18 per cent on share capital.

Year 1907, profits 33.86 per cent on share capital.

Book value of plant, £3,025,412, equal to $2.56 per spindle.

Number of spindles, 5,900,972.

Earnings of 31⅛ cents per spindle gives Lancashire 15.2 per cent on share capital. Earnings of 31⅛ cents per spindle gives New Bedford 3¼ per cent on share capital.

Earnings of $2 per spindle gives Lancashire 100 per cent on share capital.

Earnings of $2 per spindle gives New Bedford 21 per cent on share capital, or, in other words, the same earnings per spindle gives Lancashire $5 to New Bedford's $1.

Now, if the fair value of New Bedford mills, as per your editorial some days ago, is $20 a spindle, earnings based on this value, our mills would show as follows:

Thirty-one and one-third cents per spindle would give New Bedford 1.57 per cent.

Two dollars per spindle would give New Bedford 10 per cent.

Besides, there are other countries than Great Britain to be protected from. The manufacture of cotton goods on the Continent of Europe has been increasing in recent years, and there the labor cost is still lower. In Italy, for example, an operative turns out as much for 20 cents as a New Bedford operator turns out for 80 cents, and in Japan the difference is still greater. Since it costs less than half a cent a yard to bring cloth from there here, how long can we keep our mills running at a living profit with this competition? Your intimation that before long we may be able to export fine cloth to Manchester, England, is pure imagination. It would be like "carrying coals to Newcastle."

The Mercury repeats, "It is safe to say that there are mills in New Bedford making fine goods of plain construction that are able now to compete with England, with all freight paid." This statement is absurd. There is not a mill in this city that can compete with England in fine yarns; in fact, we could not hold our own, say nothing about profits, on a free-trade basis. I have been a cotton manufacturer for 50 years, and am still active and in touch with the markets and cost of production and know my assertion is correct.

I should like to know your authority for saying that "the pressure for a real tariff reduction is greater than is commonly supposed." The evidence that is being taken by the congressional committee at Washington does not show it. On the contrary, there is a heavy preponderance of evidence from all parts of the country in favor of preserving adequate protection, and in most cases this calls for the retention of present duties or for more increases than reductions.

We manufacturers are at a loss to understand how a New Bedford paper can take such interest in damaging our principal industry by advocating a reduction of the tariff on fine cotton fabrics. I am,

Respectfully, yours,

A COTTON MANUFACTURER.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS., January 22, 1909.

Mr. LODGE. I now give the average dividends for the past 20 years of 44 companies, and for the past 10 years of 1 company. The list comprises 38 engaged in cotton, 3 engaged in wool, and 4 engaged in wool and cotton together. This shows an average dividend of 44 companies for 20 years of 6.67 per cent. That is a fair presentation of the average earnings of New England manufacturing districts. The list is printed in the Tariff Hearings, page 5505, and I ask to have it printed, with what I have marked in that book.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., December 19, 1908.

Mr. WILLIAM WHITMAN,
President National Association of Woolen Manufacturers, Boston, Mass.

DEAR SIR: Herewith I hand you condensed and detailed statistics covering the financial operations and stock market fluctuations for the past 20 years of 44 companies and for the past 10 years of 1 company, the list comprising 38 engaged in cotton, 3 engaged in wool, and 4 engaged in wool and cotton together.

This list of companies includes all of those whose stocks have been bought and sold with reasonable frequency in the Boston market over a period of 20 years.

Accompanying this letter are three compilations, marked "A," "B," and "C," and 45 separate sheets covering in detail the record of each company by single years, giving capitalization, par value of stock, dividends paid, and record of public sales of stock for each year, the high and low quotations being taken.

Common stock which has been issued as a bonus with preferred stock is omitted from these compilations.

Schedule A covers the operations of all the companies for the period from January 1, 1899, to December 10, 1908, and gives the average capitalization for the period, the average annual net return after deducting losses in capital from dividends paid, and the percentage of net return on the average capital stock.

From Schedule A we derive the following results:

Forty-five companies, with an average capitalization of $77,156,615, have shown an average net return for 20 years of $5,148,775 per annum, or 6.67 per cent on the average capital stock.

Five of these companies, 3 engaged in cotton, 1 in wool, and 1 in wool and cotton together, with an average capitalization of $31,662,100, have shown an average net return for the 20 years of $2,896,742 per annum, or 9.10 per cent on the average capital stock.

Excluding these 5 companies, the remaining 40 companies, with an average capitalization of $45,494,515, have shown an average net return for the 20 years of $2,252,033 per annum, or 4.95 per cent on the average capital stock.

Thirty-eight cotton companies, with an average capitalization of $45,209,247, have shown an average net return for 20 years of $2,886,353 per annum, or 6.38 per cent on the average capital stock.

Seven companies, all engaged in wool or wool and cotton together, with an average capitalization of $31,947,368, have shown an average net return for 20 years of $2,262,422 per annum, or 7.08 per cent on the average capital stock.

Schedule B supplements Schedule A by giving the operations of all the companies in two decades separately, the first from 1889 to 1898 and the second from 1899 to date.

From Schedule B we derive the following results:

Forty-four companies, with an average capitalization of $53,022,875, during the decade 1889–1898 showed an average net return of $3,243,573 per annum, or 6.12 per cent on the average capital stock.

Thirty-eight companies engaged in cotton, with an average capitalization of $44,548,000, during the decade 1889–1898 showed an average net return of $2,613,330 per annum, or 5.87 per cent on the average capital stock.

Six companies, all engaged in wool or wool and cotton together, with an average capitalization of $8,474,875, during the decade 1889–1898 showed an average net return of $630,243 per annum, or 7.44 per cent on the average capital stock.

Forty-five companies, with an average capitalization of $78,883,830, during the decade 1899–1908 have shown an average net return of $5,341,485 per annum, or 6.77 per cent on the average capital stock.

Thirty-eight companies engaged in cotton, with an average capitalization of $45,810,630, during the decade 1899–1908 have shown an average net return of $3,068,435 per annum, or 6.70 per cent on the average capital stock.

Seven companies, all engaged in wool or wool and cotton together, with an average capitalization of $33,073,200, during the decade 1899–1908 have shown an average net return of $2,273,050 per annum, or 6.87 per cent on the average capital stock.

Schedule C shows the market selling value of the stocks of all the companies on January 1, 1889, July 1, 1899, and December 10, 1908, based on quotations recorded at public-auction sale in Boston, the offerings in practically every case consisting of a few shares. The schedule also includes additional capital invested during the period and the total dividends paid.

From Schedule C we derive the following results:

The market value of the stocks of 44 companies on January 1, 1889, was $62,798,850, and on July 1, 1899, it was $61,389,950, showing a depreciation of $1,408,900. There was invested in these companies during that period $2,270,000 of additional capital, so that the total depreciation for the 10 years was $3,678,900.

The market value of the stocks of 42 companies on July 1, 1899, was $67,775,450, and on December 10, 1908, it was $117,683,200, showing an appreciation of $49,907,750. There was invested in these companies during that period $35,940,000 of additional capital, so that the net appreciation was $13,967,750.

Excluding from this last compilation the stocks of 4 companies, 2 engaged in wool and cotton together and 2 engaged in cotton, the market value of the stock of the remaining 38 companies on July 1, 1899, was $46,996,650, and on December 10, 1908, it was $76,625,000, showing an appreciation of $29,628,350. There was invested in these companies during that period $29,820,000 of additional capital, so that the comparison actually shows a depreciation for the period of $191,650.

The market value of the stocks of 42 companies on January 1, 1889, was $58,306,350, and on December 10, 1908, it was $84,433,200, showing an appreciation of $26,126,850. There was invested in these companies during that period $13,210,000 of additional capital, so that the net appreciation has been $12,916,850, an average of $645,840 per annum, or about 1¼ per cent per annum appreciation on the selling price January 1, 1889.

Excluding from this last compilation the stocks of 5 companies, 3 engaged in cotton and 2 in wool and cotton together, the remaining 37 companies had a market valuation of $41,392,850 on January 1, 1889, and of $43,375,000 on December 10, 1908, showing an appreciation for the period of $1,982,150. There was invested in these companies during that period $6,190,000 of additional capital, so that there has been a net depreciation in the market value of these 37 companies during the past 20 years of $4,207,850.

Respectfully submitted.

FRANK A. RUGGLES, Statistician.

ROCK CREEK PARK.

Mr. WETMORE. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take up for consideration the bill (S. 2366) to acquire land along the course of Rock Creek for the purpose of preventing the pollution and obstruction thereof and of connecting Potomac Park with the Zoological Park and Rock Creek Park and providing a new location for the United States Botanic Garden.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 2, line 1, after the word "otherwise," to strike out "the land" and insert "such land and premises as are not now the property of the United States," and on page 2, line 6, after the word "including," to strike out "the creek bed" and insert "such portion of the creek bed as may be in private ownership," so as to make the section read:

That for the purpose of preventing the pollution and obstruction of Rock Creek and of connecting Potomac Park with the Zoological Park and Rock Creek Park, and providing a new location for the United States Botanic Garden, a commission, to be composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of Agriculture, is hereby authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, such land and premises as are not now the property of the United States in the District of Columbia shown on the map on file in the office of the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia, dated May 17, 1911, and lying on both sides of Rock Creek, including such portion of the creek bed as may be in private ownership, between the Zoological Park and Potomac Park, at a total cost not to exceed $2,300,000, which sum is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSENGER TO COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. BRIGGS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate yesterday agreed to Senate resolution 70.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGGS. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the resolution "to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ a messenger at a salary of $1,440 per annum, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO THE COMMITTEE ON THE CENSUS.

Mr. BRIGGS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate yesterday agreed to Senate resolution 119.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGGS. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to offer an amendment to the resolution.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the resolution "to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Census be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an assistant clerk at a salary of $1,200 per annum, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. SHIVELY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, House bill 29S3.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 29S3) for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Thirteenth Census.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I wish to make a few remarks by way of explanation of an amendment, of which I have given notice, to House bill 29S3, for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Thirteenth Census. In the present condition of affairs, with the Senate wearied by the long and tedious session under the great heat of this summer and with very few Members present at any time during the day, there is no justification for making a very extended argument upon a matter which is to be decided, and decided once for all, within the next 24 or 36 hours, and my remarks will therefore be rather by way of explanation for the RECORD.

The amendment of which I have given notice and which I intend to offer to-morrow relates entirely to the number of Members of the House of Representatives under the new apportionment. The Constitution requires an enumeration of the people of the United States to be taken every 10 years, and it requires the Representatives to be apportioned in accordance with population as shown by the successive enumerations. The House has passed a bill which provides for a reapportionment of Representatives in accordance with the last census, taken in 1910. The bill as passed by the House provides for an increase of 42 in the number of the House of Representatives, increasing that number from 391, as it is now, to 433, without taking into consideration the Representatives who will come from the States of Arizona and New Mexico when the present Territories have been admitted as States. After that representation has been admitted the number of the House would be, under the bill, 435. The amendment which I propose is to leave the number of the House precisely the same as it is now, 391, and when Arizona and New Mexico are admitted it would be 393.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that his amendment gives Illinois 24 Representatives instead of 25, the number we have now. We do not want to have our representation cut down.

Mr. ROOT. That would be the effect. Illinois would have precisely the same proportion of representation, but it would have one less Representative.

Mr. President, the prevailing consideration in determining the number fixed in the bill by the House is shown very frankly by the reports—the report of the Senate committee and the report of the House committee, which it incorporates, in substance—to be the avoidance of any loss of representation on the part of any State, so that no State under the new enumeration will have a smaller number of Representatives than it has at present, and so that all the increases of population which have taken place in certain of the States will be provided for not by a readjustment as between those States and the others, but by an addition to the number of Representatives, giving the increase to the States which have increased in population.

Mr. President, it seems to me that it is inadvisable and unwise, and would be injurious, to increase the number of the House of Representatives. That increase can not fail to accentuate and to add to the embarrassments which have already been experienced in the working of the House of Representatives with the present number of 391. It is plain that the larger a deliberative body is, the more acute is that continual struggle which is going on in every popular government and in every branch of every representative system between efficiency and individual liberty. Where a deliberative assembly is small in number it is easy for each member to have his say, to have consideration for his views, to have the measures that he offers passed upon without preventing effective action by the body. But when a deliberative assembly grows great in number, then any such freedom of action on the part of the individual is impossible, except at the cost of effective action on the part of the body. It is necessary to devise rules adapted to cut off debate, to prevent individual members from being heard, to suppress individuality on the part of the members of the body, in order that any result shall be reached at all. The pendulum swings to and fro in such a body, a body great in number, between the lack of rules, under which there is but a mob, which can accomplish nothing, and arbitrary and tyrannical rules, under which a few men constitute an oligarchy, suppressing the independence and the representation of the people on the part of the common members of the body.

We have seen but a short time ago a rebellion in the House of Representatives and on the part of a great many of the people of the country in their votes at the polls against rules so devised as to produce effective action on the part of the House by means of giving control over the action of the House to a few men; and the larger you make the House the more certain you will make it that its effectiveness will always be purchased by the surrender of individual representation on the part of the great body of the Members of the House.

Mr. President, either way that dilemma is solved the result is unfortunate for a republic. It is unfortunate to have an ineffective legislative body which reaches no conclusions, and it is unfortunate to have a body in which the representatives of the people and of all the people and of every district of the people can not be heard to express the opinions and the wishes and assert the rights of their constituents. But step by step in the history of the House of Representatives, with one exception, we have been proceeding to increase with each decennial period the number of Members of the House until we have already reached a point where efficiency is in irreconcilable conflict with freedom of expression on the part of Representatives.

The course, Mr. President, has been this: Under the Constitution as it was adopted in 1789 the number of Representatives was 65; under the First Census in 1790 it was 105; under the Second Census of 1800 it was 141; under the census of 1810 it was 181; under the census of 1820 it was 213; under the census of 1830 it was 240. Under the census of 1840 the Senate stepped in and refused to agree to the bill passed by the House and undertook then to check the growing evil of an increase in number, and brought the number down to 233. Then the increase began again. Under the census of 1850 it was increased to 233; under the census of 1860, 10 more, to 243; under the census of 1870 it was increased 50, to 293; under the census of 1880 it was increased to 325; under the census of 1900 it was increased to 386, and since brought up to 391 by new States coming in.

It is now proposed to make an addition of 42 to this number, and why, Mr. President? For what reason? For none whatever except to subserve the convenience of gentlemen in the House, the convenience of the politicians of the States who do not want to have their congressional districts interfered with, and who hold the question whether their States shall have one more or one less Representative, although their proportional representation is not changed, as more important than the discharge of their duty to so legislate that we shall have the most effective and truly representative House of Representatives to perform the great functions of that House in our Government.

I say, sir, there is no other argument, there is none of any substance in the report of the committee, there has been none of any substance mentioned in the debate in the House. Is it possible, Mr. President, that Senators of the United States are willing to subordinate their honest judgment as to what is the best interest of their country in framing the machinery of this great Government to a consideration of the local political convenience of a few legislative districts, or to the convenience of a few gentlemen who do not want to have the lines of their districts changed, or who do not want to have their States send one less Representative lest they be left out?

Mr. President, the suggestion has been made that this is something in which the Senate should as a matter of courtesy yield to the House of Representatives. Then, sir, why is it here? Why does the Constitution impose upon us the duty of legislating upon the number of Members of the House if we are to yield as a matter of courtesy to the House? What right have we to abdicate our function and refuse to perform our duty under the Constitution as a matter of courtesy to the House, a courtesy which leaves to the House alone the performance of a duty that we have sworn to perform?

Mr. President, I venture to say, upon extended conversations with many Members of the Senate, that four-fifths of the Members of the Senate are satisfied that it will be an injury to the efficiency and the true representative character of the House of Representatives to have their number increased. I undertake to say that four-fifths of the Members of the Senate believe, and do not hesitate to say in private conversation, that it will be a bad, an injurious, an unwise thing to increase the number of the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, is it possible that they will not vote in accordance with their convictions?

There is one precedent; there are two. I have never known the House of Representatives to refrain from voting upon a proposal to amend the Constitution of the United States in respect of the election of Senators, and we have at this session voted upon a proposal to amend the Constitution regarding our election passed by the House and sent to us. I never heard anybody suggest that there was any lack of courtesy in that, and there was not, because the duty of proposing amendments to the Constitution was imposed by the Constitution as much on the House as on the Senate, and they were performing their duty as we shall be performing our duty if we put into this law what we really believe to be wise.

The other precedent is the action of the Senate in 1842 in acting upon the apportionment bill under the census of 1840. The Senate then refused to accept the number which the House had inserted in the bill for the very same reason that they now propose to increase their number by 42—that is to say, for the reason that it would be convenient for them not to have a redistribution without an increase.

With the permission of the Senate, I will ask that the Secretary read an extract from the Congressional Globe of May 26, 1842, containing a statement of Mr. Calhoun's remarks upon that subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. Calhoun said, without discussing the question as to any particular number, the first thing they ought to consider was whether they should have a large or a small number of Representatives. To take the question upon each number proposed would be attended with considerable difficulty. He (Mr. Calhoun) cared nothing about fractions, but a great deal about the ratio. He thought that the expedient of enlarging the House of Representatives, instead of increasing its weight and giving it respectability, would have a contrary tendency. At the time when the House consisted of not more than 140 Members it was as orderly as the Senate is at present in its legislative proceedings; and it was the opinion of the most intelligent men with whom he had conversed upon this subject that every increase of its numbers produced only a deterioration. Many persons, he was aware, entertained a different view of the matter; but it was his opinion that such persons labored under a profound error. By its increase business must be protracted and the sessions drawn out to such an intolerable length as to be a reasonable cause of complaint. He believed the country would be unanimous upon this point, and, being of this opinion, he would be in favor of the larger ratio. He (Mr. Calhoun), as far as his own constituents were concerned, and his own individual preference, would prefer to have a small House sooner than to secure to that State the smallest possible fraction. He knew that many would say that a numerous House of Representatives would be more democratic. He was of a directly opposite opinion. He believed it would have the effect of lessening the weight of that body and bringing it into disrepute. He believed that every true friend of the people ought to watch vigilantly and, if possible, prevent an undue extension of that branch of the Government. Under these impressions he would vote for the highest ratio.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, that is a statement of the reasons why the Senate, in 1842, refused to permit an increase in the number of Members of the House. I submit that the reasons then given by that great authority—and there could be none greater upon any question relating to the effective and wise arrangement of our governmental system—should control the action of the Senate now.

It has been suggested, Mr. President, that we should follow the example of foreign countries who have large legislative assemblies. But, sir, there is no similarity between the methods of procedure of those countries and our own. It is said that Great Britain has in her House of Commons 670 members, but go into the House of Commons and how many do you find there? There are not seats in the House of Commons sufficient for two-thirds of that body of 670. They are not expected there. They are sent for when there is an important division to pass between tellers and be counted. That is because the Government of Great Britain is conducted by a responsible ministry which is virtually a committee in the House of Commons. That is true generally of the constitutional governments of the European powers whose names are mentioned in the committee report upon this bill as having large legislative assemblies. The ministry is responsible for the bills that are introduced, for framing them, for settling them, for conducting the proceedings relating to them, and if the ministry can not carry the body the ministry goes out. That is an entirely different method of procedure, and it makes the number of the body comparatively unimportant.

But, Mr. President, we know our own conditions, and there is no reason why we should reverse the course of history, so that instead of the rest of the world taking lessons in representative government from us we should undertake to reverse our methods upon the authority of nations which are in the early stages of their new experiments.

Mr. President, the right of every district in the United States to be heard through its Representative meets here no government with authority to take control of legislation; and it is only by means of such a process of enlargement of the House of Representatives as I am now endeavoring to avert that we are forcing ourselves into a position where there must be a government to take control and exclude the Representatives of all the districts which do not happen to have their men in the little controlling oligarchy from a voice.

The amendment which I have proposed is taken from the very full and fair statement of facts contained in the committee report. That statement of facts gives an apportionment of each number of Representatives between 390 and 440, inclusive, by the method which is called the method of major fractions; that is to say, giving to each State the number of Representatives her population entitles her to when divided by the ratio, and giving any unassigned Representatives to the fractions left over after the division in the order of their size until the whole number is assigned.

The amendment follows the same method as the bill, only, instead of taking the apportionment which is reported for the number 433, it takes the apportionment which is reported by the committee for the number 391, or, including New Mexico and Arizona, 393. That is to say, instead of taking the apportionment reported by the committee on page 30, it takes the apportionment reported by the committee on page 10 of the committee report, leaving no opportunity for question as to the assignment to the different States of the number of 391 Representatives; or, to put it in another form, the amendment gives the apportionment of 391 Representatives, which is reported by the committee as the proper apportionment for that number of Representatives. The only question which there is upon this amendment for the Senate to pass upon is the question whether the Senate will consent to an increase of the House of Representatives from 391 to 433. I sincerely trust the Senate will not consent to that.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from New York to his amendment. It is an amendment to the bill as reported by the committee. I invite his attention particularly to what the situation would be if the amendment were adopted and the bill were to go through in that way. What would be the situation in those States in which there is a decrease of the present representation?

Mr. ROOT. The situation, if the amendment were to be adopted, in those States could be provided for exactly as the increase is provided for by the present bill; or, if the Senate chose, it could postpone the taking effect of this provision until the States have had an opportunity to redistrict. There is no trouble about that. The rule has been that these apportionment acts have not taken effect until a considerably later period; the rule has been that they have not been put in operation until the third year after the taking of the census, which in this case would be 1913. Thus the Eleventh Census was not put into effect until 1893, the Tenth Census until 1883, the Ninth Census until 1873, the Eighth Census until 1863, the Seventh Census until 1853, the Sixth Census until 1843, the Fifth Census until 1833, and so on. Following the ordinary rule, this bill would be made to take effect in 1913. Either of those ways would dispose, without embarrassment and without difficulty, of the suggestion which the Senator from Indiana makes.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator dismisses the suggestion as if it were of no importance. I still invite his attention to the fact that the situation suggested can not be disposed of in the way he contends and that he is mistaken. The bill, as reported, is drawn on the theory that there is to be no reduction in representation in any of the States. Therefore the bill contains no provision to meet the emergency of a reduction in representation, nor does the amendment submitted by the Senator from New York. In all former acts, where the reapportionment operated to produce a reduction of representation, there have always been provisions to meet that situation. There was no occasion to put such a provision in this bill for the patent reason that the theory of the bill was and is that there is to be no reduction in representation in any State.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I am well aware that the bill does not contain such a provision. It ought to contain such a provision; and if this amendment be adopted, it is my purpose to offer a further amendment containing such a provision, for which there is, as the Senator from Indiana indicates, ample and repeated precedent.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I desire, first to discuss the contention that the Senate has no right to intervene in a bill for the apportionment of Representatives. I shall endeavor to show that this contention is entirely without foundation.

The Constitution specifically defines the distinct or separate functions of the House and of the Senate. For example, it provides that revenue bills must originate in the House and, by reason of the close association between revenue and expenditure, the custom has also become established that appropriation bills must have their origin in that body. The House of Representatives may institute proceedings for impeachment, while the Senate acts as a court to hear evidence and pass judgment. The House of Representatives elects a President in case of the failure of the electoral college to make a choice, while the Senate in the analagous case elects a Vice President. Another power granted exclusively to the Senate is the confirmation of Executive appointments and the ratification of treaties. Each House adopts its own rules to determine the election, returns, and qualifications of its Members. Beyond these specific, well-defined provisions of the Constitution, neither fundamental law nor sound considerations of public policy justify the control of legislation by one body to the exclusion of the other.

Of course there are matters of trivial importance, such as determining the number of employees and their salaries, and the arrangement of the Halls in which sessions are to be held, which naturally are left to each individual body, but even upon questions of this nature the House of Representatives in the later seventies took the liberty to criticize, and rather severely, the number of employees and officers of the Senate. So much for the general principles relating to the respective spheres of the Senate and the House of Representatives. Our whole system of government rests upon the idea that to enact any legislation, independent action and the concurrence of both Houses is necessary.

There are considerations equally decisive in favor of the right of the Senate to take an equal part with the House in determining the number of Representatives. The aggregate membership of the two Houses determines the number of the electoral college. If a free hand should be given to the other House, or, in fact, to either body, to increase its number, the strength of the States of less population would be minimized in the selection of a President and Vice President. Suppose two or three, or even one, of the States of largest population were reliably of one political complexion, such an increase in the number of Members of the other House could be created as to determine the choice of a President in a close election.

There are further considerations of a more immediate and practical nature. The quality of legislation adopted, the degree of deliberation bestowed, the orderly expression of individual judgment, all require that neither House should be unwieldy in size or subject to the control of ruling cliques.

All legislation is the product of the efforts of the two Houses, and it is for each House to determine, so far as it may, the size and field of the other. All these salutary objects are in a measure defeated by an undue enlargement of the membership of the House. When we examine the debates on this question, it appears that when the subject was most carefully considered in 1843 the right of the Senate to participate in determining the size of the House was asserted and was successfully maintained. The House bill enacted after the census of 1840 provided a membership of 306; the Senate insisted upon 223, a reduction of 83 members, and succeeded in its contention. In the discussion in the Senate on that occasion three distinct views were presented. The first was that of Senator Silas Wright, of New York, to the effect that it was for the House to determine the number of its membership. The second was that of Senator Calhoun, of South Carolina, to the effect that the judgment of the House should have the greatest weight, but that the Senate might review that judgment. In the earlier discussion of the subject he virtually advocated the adoption in our Congress of the relation which existed between the House of Commons and the House of Lords—that is, that one body might pass a bill, and the other after taking it up for consideration might suggest modifications and send it back for further consideration. I will read briefly from the debates on this subject in May, 1842. In the Congressional Globe of that day the substance of what the speakers said is usually reported in the third person.

Mr. Calhoun said it was not the first occasion on which a disagreement had taken place between the two branches of Congress in reference to the subject of apportionment. Under the census of 1810 the House fixed upon a ratio and the Senate altered it. He agreed with the gentleman from New York, that in fixing a ratio of apportionment they ought to have very great respect for the decision of the House, if they were assured that the House had deliberately resolved upon a particular ratio, but he had strong reasons to believe that the number fixed upon by the present bill, as it came from the House, was not satisfactory to all who voted for it, and if any Senator would trace, in his own mind, the progress of taking the vote upon the various numbers proposed—which, according to the parliamentary rule, was by beginning with the highest number—it would be perfectly evident that those who were in favor of the highest numbers, not having succeeded in carrying the particular number they desired, were willing, nevertheless, to take the highest they could get, and so voted for a number which they would still desire to alter, and they would therefore be glad of an opportunity to review their vote. He thought then that he would be acting with a due regard to the wishes of that body by giving them an opportunity to review and reconsider this matter. His own opinion was that the number of Members of that House should be reduced.

Mr. President, I do not believe I am the only one present who has ascertained, as a result of numerous interviews with Members of the other House, that many who voted for a membership of 433 did so expecting the Senate to modify that action. From an inquiry made some months ago, I think it not erroneous to conclude that a sufficient number of the House membership desire a smaller number and would be willing to agree upon a membership of 391.

The third view, taken in this discussion in 1842-43, was that advocated by Mr. Buchanan, afterwards President of the United States. Whatever may be said of James Buchanan, though he was required to solve a most difficult problem, it must be said of him that he possessed the experience and qualifications requisite for the great office of President. Thus, whatever he says is entitled to the very greatest respect.

Mr. Buchanan said he had waited for some other Senator to raise his voice against what he considered to be a new and dangerous doctrine upon this floor.

That is, that it was not the right of the Senate to change the membership as fixed in the House bill.

He very rarely differed in opinion from his friend from New York Mr. Wright, and it was with reluctance he felt himself compelled to do so upon the present occasion; but yet he must protest against any and every attempt to influence the independent judgment of the Senate, by bringing the opinions of the House to bear upon it * * *.

Upon all legislative questions, the Senate ought not only to act independently of the House, but to act without bringing into the debate the opinions of its Members, whether individually or collectively, to bear upon their judgment. The Constitution had made them an independent branch of the National Legislature; and they ought not to be influenced either by what had been done heretofore, or might, in the opinion of its Members, be done hereafter, by the House.

* * * * * * *

The Senate—

Said Mr. Buchanan—

is the body in which the sovereign States of this Union are represented, and the Constitution of the United States has conferred upon us equal legislative powers with the House; and we are equally bound to discharge our duty independently, upon this as upon any other question which may be brought before Congress.

If there should be a difference between the opinions of the two Houses—if the one should adopt a high ratio and the other a low one—both will then be bound to act in that spirit of compromise to which our institutions owe their existence, and, through the agency of a committee of conference, agree upon a middle course.

That which follows is especially pertinent:

Although I freely admit—

He says—

a perfect equality between the two Houses upon this and all other legislative questions, yet if any preference ought to be given to the opinion of the one over that of the other, on account of the peculiarity of the present question, perhaps arguments might be adduced to prove that the judgment of the Senate ought to have an influence superior to that of the House. The Members of the House are all honorable men—men of the highest character; yet it can not be denied that they have been engaged upon a question in which they are directly interested. The Senate can have no other feeling upon the subject but a desire to do what is best for the country, unless, indeed, our personal partiality for our friends in the other House might be supposed to influence our judgment. If our calm, deliberate, and impartial conviction should be favorable to a reduction in the number of the House, I have no doubt this will have its just influence. Whilst, therefore, I would yield to the House a full and perfect equality on this and on all other questions, yet, if there were to be any difference in favor of the Senate under any circumstances, it ought to be on a question so immediately affecting the Members of the House. Even the purest and the wisest of men are not the best judges in their own cause.

Thus, this distinguished leader declared in no uncertain language that if there was any preference given to either House in fixing the number of Members of Congress it should vest in the Senate.

What are the disadvantages of a large membership? Mr. President, if I have any right to speak on this occasion it is because, with but one exception, I served for a longer period in the House of Representatives than any other Member of this Senate. I was a Member of the House when the total number was 325; again when it was 356, subsequently increased by one Member on the admission of another State, and again when the membership was 386, a number which was later increased to 391 by the admission of Oklahoma.

In judging of the efficiency of the House, it is not a question of the mathematical proportion between 325 and 356, or between 325 and 386. The decrease in efficiency can best be compared with what would result if into a room that is already filled when there are 325 present additional persons sought admission. Any considerable increase would render unwieldy and less efficient the membership of the whole body. Three hundred and ninety-one Members of the House, I have no hesitancy in stating, is too large a number, but this proposition is to increase that number by 42 more, making 433, for which there is absolutely no defense.

As stated by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] in his very able address, the one predominant reason which has caused this attempted increase is that no State may lose a Representative. In the bill as it passed the House last winter there was a clause to the effect that hereafter apportionments should be made by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and that the number should not be increased. That was certainly a frank confession that it was not desirable to increase the membership of the House.

Where will we eventuate by the adoption of the principle that no State shall lose a Representative? We must all recognize the shifting character of our population, the unequal increase, in different portions of the country, and even the occasional decrease of the population of a State. Under the census of 1900, with a retention of the same number of Representatives as under the census of 1890, namely, 357, three States, as I recall it, would have lost a Representative—the States of Maine, Virginia, and Nebraska.

Under the census of 1910, with the more pronounced changes in centers of population, 12 States would lose a Representative should the present number be retained. We may expect that this disproportion will be accentuated rather than diminished in the future; so that when the census of 1920 is taken more than 12 States would lose a Representative under an apportionment providing for the same number of Representatives as is proposed in the pending bill, and at that time it will be necessary to still further enlarge the House.

The increase based upon the census of 1900, as compared with the census of 1890, was not so large as that which is here provided under the census of 1910, and we may anticipate that under the census of 1920, the increase will be still greater.

What validity is there in the provision that was inserted in the bill last winter to the effect that there should be no increase under the next census and that the Secretary of Commerce and Labor should hereafter determine the apportionment? It is nothing but a declaratory resolution which will not be binding 10 years hence. It is a virtual admission that a mistake is being made in this bill; but that when the next apportionment is made the bad example now set shall not be followed. I have little regard for such a provision. It is unnatural; it seeks to bind future action, and there is every probability that it will be altogether ineffective.

Mr. President, I maintain that this method of procedure, which allows each State to retain its membership after each census, is altogether erroneous. Legislative bodies do not exist for the sake of preventing the representation of every State from falling below a certain maximum. The guiding principle should be one of efficiency, of quality; and if you adopt the rule exemplified in this bill you violate both those principles. I know there is a certain sentimental objection to seeing the State of Maine or any other State lose its former number of Representatives, but the influence of a Commonwealth in this Congress does not depend upon the number of its Representatives; it depends rather upon the men it sends here. My own State, under the contention which I favor, would lose one Member. Its representation would be reduced from 21 to 20, but I am satisfied that my constituents would be altogether satisfied if not pleased with that change. Twenty men among 391 may wield just as great an influence as 21 among 433; and they may wield that influence under circumstances altogether more favorable to the influence and standing of the individual Member. Whether the number be increased or diminished, the proportion remains the same, and full justice is done to every State.

I began to mention some of the disadvantages that accrue from large numbers. I will not dwell upon the objection of additional expense resulting from the increase of membership. It was estimated in the discussion in the House that the added cost of 42 Members would be about $1,000,000. While this consideration is worthy of the most serious attention, it is not the main argument against enlarging the size of the House.

In the first place, it gives greater opportunity for machine domination. There is no fallacy more apparent than the idea that the people are more perfectly represented in proportion as you increase the size of a representative body. With each increase the personal responsibility and opportunity of each individual Member is diminished.

On this subject I desire to read from the words of James Madison in the Federalist, a quotation not only worthy of attention because of the sound judgment which it displays, but also for the excellent literary style which it manifests. He is speaking of the number of Representatives to be chosen.

> One observation, however, I must be permitted to add on this subject as claiming, in my judgment, a very serious attention. It is that in all legislative assemblies the greater the number composing them may be the fewer will be the men who will in fact direct their proceedings. In the first place, the more numerous an assembly may be, of whatever characters composed, the greater is known to be the ascendancy of passion over reason. In the next place, the larger the number the greater will be the proportion of Members of limited information and of weak capacities. Now, it is precisely on characters of this description that the eloquence and address of the few are known to act with all their force. In the ancient republics, where the whole body of the people assembled in person, a single orator or an artful statesman was generally seen to rule with as complete a sway as if a sceptre had been placed in his single hand. On the same principle, the more multitudinous a representative assembly may be rendered, the more it will partake of the infirmities incident to collective meetings of the people. Ignorance will be the dupe of cunning and passion the slave of sophistry and declamation. The people can never err more than in supposing that by multiplying their representatives beyond a certain limit they strengthen the barrier against the government of a few. Experience will forever admonish them that, on the contrary, after securing a sufficient number for the purposes of safety, of local information, and of diffusive sympathy with the whole society, they will counteract their own views by every addition to their representatives. The countenance of the government may become more democratic, but the soul that animates it will be more oligarchic. The machine will be enlarged, but the fewer, and often the more secret, will be the springs by which its motions are directed.

I trust every Member of the Senate, whether in his political views he agrees with Madison or not, will read and consider carefully this paragraph, for I do not believe there is anywhere a more succinct yet complete statement of the disadvantages which arise from increasing the membership of a legislative body.

In another number of The Federalist, which I think sounds more like Hamilton, though it is sometimes ascribed to Madison, we find another reference to this same subject:

> Nothing can be more fallacious than to found our political calculations on arithmetical principles. Sixty or seventy men may be more properly trusted with a given degree of power than six or seven. But it does not follow that six or seven hundred would be proportionately a better depositary. And if we carry on the supposition to six or seven thousand the whole reasoning ought to be reversed. The truth is that, in all cases, a certain number at least seems to be necessary to secure the benefits of free consultation and discussion and to guard against too easy a combination for improper purposes; as, on the other hand, the number ought at most to be kept within a certain limit in order to avoid the confusion and intemperance of a multitude. In all very numerous assemblies, of whatever character composed, passion never fails to wrest the scepter from reason. Had every Athenian citizen been a Socrates, every Athenian assembly would still have been a mob.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PAGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. REED. Not to interrupt the Senator from Ohio, I should like to ask him if he agrees with the statement that if every Athenian citizen had been a Socrates the Athenian assembly would, nevertheless, have been a mob, or if he does not think it is a bit of literary extravagance?

Mr. BURTON. That is probably tinged somewhat by a disposition to use a very rhetorical expression at the close of the paragraph, but oftentimes those expressions state the truth much better than when less picturesquely expressed.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator mean they express the truth better than the fact?

Mr. BURTON. The general truth.

Mr. President, the larger the size of the House of Representatives the greater the disposition to assert local interests and to increase the size of the "pork barrel." If there is one demoralizing tendency in our legislation, it is the pressure which is so often brought to bear upon a Member of the Senate or of the House to respond to the demands of some locality or of some special interest. As you increase the number of Representatives you more closely identify each Member with certain towns and localities. The question of his election or defeat is determined by his ability to obtain appropriations for rivers and harbors or for public buildings. With each increase in the size of the House you necessarily diminish the regard for the general welfare and emphasize the necessity that the Representative should be a mere local agent for his own district.

Again, every increase will augment the present tendency to confusion. With a House of 433 Members, it would be more difficult to conduct legislative business in an orderly manner. The mere question of vocal power would assume importance.

I understand a plan has been agreed upon to remove the desks and remodel the present House Chamber, with a view to making the House a more deliberative body. Mr. President, that was tried once before and abandoned. No appreciable influence upon the general course of procedure will result from such a course. Take out all the desks; take out the pillars, if there are any, and, nevertheless, with 433 Members moving to and fro, there will be disorder and inattention, which will diminish the working capacity of that body.

Again, it will require nearly an hour to merely call the yeas and nays. It will be more difficult to maintain a quorum and easier to conduct a filibuster. The temptation to be absent will be increased, and the attendance of the Members will be less regular than it is now.

Again, it makes the committees more unwieldy. Mr. President, I think our system of legislation has been very justly criticized because too great responsibility is lodged in committees. One reason for this responsibility is incident to the nature of our legislation, the great variety of subjects which are treated, and the number of laws which are proposed.

But there is another objection to this method of preparing legislation, namely, that only a comparatively small share of the Members are disposed to give study and attention to all the varied subjects which arise. The larger you make the committee, the more difficult it becomes to frame measures wisely. The larger the legislative body to which that committee reports, the more difficult it is for the individual Member to understand all pending legislation and bring his influence to bear in framing our laws.

There is one further point, of which I speak with some hesitancy. A substantial objection to increasing the membership of the House is that by adding to the total number you diminish the distinction which belongs to membership. A man who might stand out prominently in a body of 300 or 350 would be eclipsed in one of 450. The message which his speeches might carry to the country is lost in a great degree if he is but one of an indistinguishable mass of Members and not personally well known to the country at large.

Again, the confusion and the difficulty of obtaining recognition would diminish the ambition of many competent men to be elected.

In the session ending on the 4th of March last it was computed that after you omit the amount of time consumed by points of order, necessary discussions upon procedure, and roll calls, an average of 20 minutes was left to each Member in which to address the House. That does not state the whole case, because chairmen of committees and others who occupy positions of prominence must take much more than their average share. The result is to diminish the opportunity and to almost destroy the influence of the Member unless by some lucky chance he is brought to the front; and if there is any one thing which I believe is taught by experience in a legislative body, it is that brilliant qualities alone do not give a substantial foothold in any body of legislators. He can not rely upon chance. He must rather depend upon hard work, upon his ability to master some great question, and upon the possession of that character which will commend him for honesty of purpose and gain for him the confidence of his associates. The opportunity for distinction or preferment in any of these respects is diminished almost in geometrical ratio as the membership of the House is increased.

I want to read briefly from an article by Mr. Marriott Brosius, who was for years a Member of the House of Representatives. He says:

> Story, in speaking of the constitutional provision limiting the representation to 1 for every 30,000 inhabitants, says in his Commentaries: "The danger was that, from the natural impulses of the popular will and desire of ambitious candidates to attain office, the number would be soon swollen to an unreasonable size, so that it would generate factions, obstruct deliberation, introduce and perpetuate turbulent and rash counsels."

And in continuing after the quotation—and he speaks from the standpoint of a Member—Mr. Brosius says:

> The virtue of the average Member of Congress will be found not quite equal to the task of resisting the solicitations of State pride to maintain the numerical integrity of his delegation. If he is a man of heroic mould and can rise above such considerations, he may still encounter a condition quite too much for him in the fact that his own seat is in peril. Situations which invite such conflicts in the arena of legislation between private interest and public duty ought to be avoided whenever possible. Into such temptations the Constitution ought not to lead us, and from the evil of yielding to them it ought to deliver us.
>
> The objects of the framers of the Constitution in regard to the size of the House are as follows:
> 1. A body large enough to be a safe custodian of the interests with which it is charged, and to secure the benefits of free consultation and discussion, as well as immunity from too easy combinations for improper purposes.
>
> 2. A body small enough to avoid the confusion and feebleness resulting from the turbulence of numbers.
>
> 3. Congressional districts as large as is compatible with the Representative's knowledge of the local circumstances of his constituents and his means of keeping up the necessary touch with them in sentiment and sympathy.
>
> The law of "diminishing returns" works as surely in the House as in economics.
>
> The body must be large enough to secure the benefits of consultation as well as immunity from too easy combinations for improper purposes, and no larger. The House has been on certain occasions a "cave of Æolus," with every wind let loose. * * * Any comprehensive survey of the evils of an unduly numerous House must include the obvious source of weakness arising from the diminished responsibility of Members, as well as from the large number of inferior men likely to enter into its composition.
> The chaos in the House of Commons was likened by an Englishman to a "cataract in a thunderstorm." Gladstone refused the consideration of an increase in the house, saying that "it is big enough." Surely we do not want to so increase our lower House to such proportions.

It was a favorite expression of Napoleon—and I quote this as illustrating the growing lack of responsibility as a legislative body increases in numbers—that collective crimes are impossible. He referred to the Directory, in which, under the wild impulses of the time, each individual was swept on by passion, and no one of them could be held responsible for the action which was being taken.

In the same connection I have heard disappointed lawyers remark that a jury of 12 men might bring in a verdict lacking in wise conclusions to an extent that would have been impossible had any one of them been acting alone. I do not quote this as in any way indicating a preference for absolute power; but in considering this question we are confronted with the fact that the most common origin of despotism, of the rule of tyrants, has been the inefficiency of the multitude. A powerful reaction occurs after a large body has failed to meet expectations, and the people are apt to turn to one man who is able to assume control.

On this same subject Mr. Buchanan, in the discussion from which I have already quoted, said:

> Whilst I am up I shall make a few observations in reply to other Senators on the question of Executive influence. Is it probable that this would act with greater effect upon a House composed of 200 than upon one of 400 Members? This is the true practical question, because, as to driving the Members from their Hall at the point of the bayonet, after the example of Cromwell and Bonaparte, I suppose no person entertains any serious apprehension on that subject.
>
> Now, what is the most perfect idea—the beau ideal of a system of representation? It is that there shall be as many districts of equal population in the several States as there are Members of the House, and that each of those districts shall elect one Member. Each one of these Representatives ought to speak the sentiments, act upon the opinions, and reflect the wishes of his own particular constituency so far as this may be possible. As the people of the respective congressional districts enjoy equal rights, their Representatives ought to meet and deliberate on terms of perfect equality, and they ought individually to be subjected to an equal responsibility to those by whom they were elected. Any organization of the House of Representatives which would necessarily in practice destroy these principles ought to be most carefully avoided. But would not this be the result, if, as has been admitted by the Senators from Kentucky and Missouri (Messrs. Crittenden and Benton), it would become necessary, in a House of 400 Members to abridge the freedom of debate and put speakers down by all sorts of discordant noises?
>
> This the Senators call the irregular action of the body, which is necessary to the dispatch of the business; and they believe that the House ought to consist of 300 or 400 Members, in order that a sufficient corps of disorderly members may be formed to put down disorder. Such conduct may be tolerated in the House of Commons or the Chamber of Deputies, but it will never be sanctioned by the people of the United States. Their Representatives hold their right to speak the voice of their constituents from the people themselves, and not by the permission of a corps of those "thundering boys" who silence all whom they are unwilling to hear by shouting, by scraping, and by mock applause. When you arrive at this point, where is the influence of the whole body concentrated? Is it not in the hands of those party leaders who are the favorites of the mobocracy among the members? Thus, it is in the House of Commons and in the Chamber of Deputies, and thus it will be in the House of Representatives. The entire control over the business of the House will then devolve upon some 40 or 50 members, and the remainder must become mere counters, ceasing to exercise their own independent judgment or to represent fairly and faithfully their own constituents. Whereas, on the other hand, if you have a legislative body of a reasonable size, each member who so desires can be heard and can exercise his legitimate influence; and in this manner you will best guard against executive and every other improper influence.
> The Senators from Kentucky and Missouri [Messrs. Crittenden and Benton] have both urged strongly that a House of 400 Members would be more free from Executive influence than a House of 200, because, say they, it would be more difficult to influence or corrupt a large body than a small one. But if, from the very number of the House, it follows as a necessary consequence that a few prominent Members and party leaders must transact the whole of the important business, then, in order to influence a majority of the House it will only be necessary to influence or corrupt these leaders. Whenever the body shall become so numerous that it will be impossible for all the Members individually to represent their own constituents, then the power of the House will necessarily devolve upon those who conduct the business, and the remainder must become comparatively ciphers. The House will then be governed by an oligarchy, and if the Executive can seduce the leaders upon any great question the rank and file will follow as a matter of habit. Although the House may be numerous, the influence will then be confined to a few Members, and the very number will shield these few from a just responsibility. It is therefore my opinion that a House composed of 200 Members, in which each will feel his individual responsibility and each be able to represent his own constituents independently, without being compelled to follow in the wake of some party leader, will present a more powerful barrier against Executive influence than would be presented by a House of 400 Members.

He then quotes from Mr. Madison the expression on this subject from which I have previously read.

In 1889 the House had become so large that it was possible by dilatory tactics, such as by diminishing the attendance below a quorum, by refusing to answer when the roll was called, by frequent motions to adjourn, and by similar other methods, to defeat the objects for which the House was created. It was even possible to prevent entirely the transaction of business. This was the natural outcome of increasing the membership of that body. These practices became so prevalent that it was necessary to adopt the very drastic Reed rules, as they are called, under which the Speaker could refuse to entertain a dilatory motion. In determining a quorum, he could count a Member as present whether he answered to his name or not, provided he were in the Chamber; and contemporaneously with that the custom, already existing in part, was definitely established of limiting debate by bringing in a rule that a vote should be taken at a fixed time.

I remember very clearly the discussion on the McKinley bill. Many criticized the action of the House of Representatives because it only considered in Committee of the Whole by paragraphs a part of the chemical schedule, which was the first schedule in the bill. But with the great number of Members, the great diversity of their opinions, and their desire to speak upon a multitude of subjects, it became necessary to bring in a rule that all debate should cease at a certain time and then a vote be taken on all amendments and the final passage of the bill.

The old way represents one extreme, in which the membership is so considerable that business could not readily be transacted in an orderly manner. The new régime threatens the suppression of debate, and as a consequence the restraint upon the individual Member and the adoption of legislation without any general or adequate discussion.

You must adopt one dilemma or the other—either virtually fail to transact any business at all where strenuous and well-organized opposition exists or frame laws and pass measures by means of the partial suppression of debate and, as I have said, the restraint of the individual Member. Every increase in membership intensifies this situation and gives greater emphasis to the undesirability of a large legislative body.

Attention has been called to the fact that under the Constitution of the United States the unit for representation was 30,000 inhabitants, and it is said we need not be afraid to have a representative for 211,000, because that number is seven times as great as that originally fixed. But, Mr. President, no one is so careless as to overlook the progress of 122 years. The mail system was hardly originated when the Constitution was framed. During these years it has been extended and enlarged to its present colossal proportions. Then began communication by steamboats and by packet boats on the canals, followed by the railroads; then the telegraph; and finally the telephone, to which must be added perhaps the most powerful factor of all—the newspapers, which give information concerning the events of each day whether transpiring in the Western or in the Eastern Hemisphere. So in this year of 1911 it is much easier to keep in touch with 300,000 people and to judge of their various interests and opinions than it was in 1789 to keep in touch with 30,000.

Attention was called this morning to the size of foreign legislative bodies, and this is used as an argument for increasing the membership of our House. The real ground of distinction between their legislative bodies and ours has been already stated by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], but I wish to add a few considerations to what he has already said. In the House of Commons, with its 670 members, 40 constitute a quorum to transact business—that is, general business. If it be private business, 20 out of the 670 constitute a quorum. Let us for a moment consider what might be the result if for the consideration of private legislation—bills relating to claims and bills not having a distinctively national character—it were possible for the House of Representatives to enact laws with only 20 Members present.

Again, the members of the House of Commons have not received pay. Their object is to finish the business as soon as they can. The members of the chamber of deputies, of the German Reichstag, and others, either receive no pay at all, or, in any event, a much less compensation than that given to the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives.

That does not mean, Mr. President, that the Members of this Congress are favored by the Nation. It has a deeper and more significant meaning, namely, that in this country a greater responsibility is placed upon them. But the one vital difference is that all those countries have either a responsible ministry or an imperial council, and in nearly all cases legislation on all general matters is framed by that ministry and by them presented to the legislative bodies. When an appropriation bill comes into the House of Commons it may be discussed and a motion made to strike out an item, though the rule does not work the other way. No motion to insert an item can be entertained.

Now, let us consider what a difference it would make in the Senate or in the House if our rules of procedure forbade an amendment increasing an appropriation bill. As Mr. Gladstone once remarked, the function of the Commons is not to increase but to diminish public expenditures.

Mr. Bryce, in an address delivered before the New York State Bar Association, declared that if a public building were to be located in the borough or territory represented by a member of the House of Commons he would have had no more to do with it than any other one of the 670 members. So these matters, which impose a responsibility upon us and occupy so much of our time, are not a burden upon members of foreign legislative bodies.

This originated in the day of the boroughs and the growing communities in England, when the membership of the House of Commons was increased so as to keep the Government at Westminster in touch with the whole Kingdom. It was a species of assemblage not altogether legislative in its earlier days, though it had legislative power.

I might refer to instances of extreme disorder in some of the legislative bodies in Europe, but I believe that is not desirable. That disorder has been so pronounced that it has occasionally been necessary to end the session. So the argument that we need not fear the development of disorderly proceedings because none exist abroad is altogether without foundation. They do occasionally have turbulence of a most serious nature.

There is another point which distinguishes the foreign legislative assembly from ours. It is true that our Congress has authority over a great variety of subjects pertaining to communities, but many laws passed by their legislative bodies refer to particular localities in much the same way as does the legislation in our States. But while the individual Member may have his duty to perform to his locality in framing that legislation, in such countries as Austria and Hungary there is such a variety of race and language in their separate legislative bodies that it is very desirable and, in fact, it is necessary to have a large representation. But nevertheless the main duty of the individual member is to approve or disapprove the action of the ministry.

In the House of Commons, for example, an individual member does not bring in an appropriation bill. Neither does he bring in a bill to revise the tariff.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. In connection with what was said by the Senator about the British Parliament, I suggest to him the further fact—and the statements the Senator has made are very instructive—that the members of the English House of Commons need not be residents of the districts they represent.

Mr. BURTON. That is another point.

Mr. NELSON. They may be elected from any locality in England. An Englishman can stand for a borough or district in Scotland or a district in Ireland, and a great majority of the members never reside in the districts they represent.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SHIVELY. The same thing is true in some of our States.

Mr. BURTON. They must reside in the State.

Mr. SHIVELY. In the State of New York they are not required to be residents of the district in which they are elected.

Mr. BURTON. I will say, in answer to that suggestion——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. They must be residents of the State they represent, however.

Mr. BACON. One of our States is as big as the whole of England.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon; I simply added that one of our States is as big as the territory of England.

Mr. BURTON. No one State has as many inhabitants though, and no such contrariety of interests.

Mr. BACON. That is true; but the Senator was speaking of the diversity of territory from which one could be elected. It so happens that the square mileage of England is about exactly the same as the square mileage of my own State.

Mr. BURTON. The statement of the Senator from Minnesota shows that there is a lack of the distinctive local responsibility which belongs to our system. I will say in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] that while in communities like the city of New York a man may live out in the suburbs or elsewhere and yet be elected from what is called a downtown district, instances even of that nature are not frequent. Such is the demand of the constituency in a district that the Member be one of them and move around among them, that if a person were nominated from an outside locality it would be a safe gamble that the argument of nonresidence would be raised against him and he would be defeated.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SHIVELY. I was not suggesting anything bearing on the wisdom of the practice. I say that simply as a matter of law a man can be elected from any district in New York if the people are willing to elect him. There is nothing in the law to prevent it; the law authorizes it.

Mr. BURTON. The instances, however, are very rare.

Mr. SHIVELY. The instances where men outside the districts are elected are rare, as they naturally would be. But the right to so elect exists in nearly all the States of the Union.

Mr. BURTON. I understand it is the general rule.

The difference between the member of a foreign legislative body and our Congressman, as I have already stated, is that the former is but one unit to oppose or favor the ministry, while our Members of the House of Representatives occupy an entirely different position. You may say of each that he is like a prince in his independence and responsibility. He not merely represents a constituency. He is entitled to as much right in debate and to as many privileges in initiating legislation as any other Member on the floor of the House of Representatives. There is absolute equality. The laws of the body to which he belongs are not framed by a ministry that is half executive and half legislative. Any Member of the House of Representatives may introduce a bill on any subject. He or any other Member has unlimited right to oppose, to favor, or move to amend. That gives an entirely different position to our Representatives from that occupied by members of foreign legislatures.

Mr. President, I can not too strongly express my opposition to this increase of membership. There are other important considerations, such as the possibility of gerrymanders. I should like very much to see my own State of Ohio have its 21 Members, but I am willing to see the bill go through, even with some objectionable features engrafted upon it, if the Senate and the House of Representatives will restrict the number to 391.

I have been long associated with the Members of the House of Representatives, as well as of the Senate, and in each body and to the very latest day I can vouch for their patriotism, for their honesty, for their eagerness to serve our country. But there are existing circumstances which diminish their efficiency, destroy independence, and render a congressional career unsatisfactory.

Nothing threatens the body at the other end of the Capitol so seriously as the increase in numbers which many are now advocating. It is idle to say that 10 years hence the number will be restricted to 433 and that here we will reach the maximum. That is not the general course of legislation. If you now recognize and establish the rule that no State shall lose a Representative, that same rule will be adopted 10 years hence, and in a little time the House will be expanded to such a size as to endanger its usefulness and, I might almost say, destroy its working capacity.

The tendency, which Mr. Madison pointed out, would be to cause their deliberations and the results of all their action to come more and more under the domination of a few. The boss does not exist among a hundred so successfully as among a thousand, nor yet among a thousand so well as among 5,000, where more and more the independent action of each individual is destroyed and the necessity is recognized for some leader to represent them all.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I wanted to make one suggestion, and since I addressed the Chair something which has fallen from the lips of the learned Senator is directly upon the line of it. The functions of the Federal Government have been very greatly enlarged within the past few decades. During the time when the discussions were had in which the utterances were made by the fathers, Mr. Madison and others who have been quoted here, and some of a later date, Mr. Calhoun, whom the Senator from New York quoted, the functions of the Federal Government were extremely limited. They have been expanded almost beyond realization to those of us upon whom it has grown gradually. Since the Senator himself has been in Congress, since he entered the other House and since I have entered this body, I think it may be safely said that the functions of the Federal Government, so far as they devolve duties upon Representatives and Senators, have more than doubled.

The fact is not, as I suggested, so very strongly appreciated by those of us upon whom this development has grown gradually, but Senators who have gone out since I have been here and who have come back into the Senate have expressed surprise at the very great increase of duties which now devolves upon Senators and Representatives over and above what devolved upon them during their former service. In what was quoted from these learned fathers in the construction of their utterances and their application to the present conditions, there is to be taken a realization of that fact.

I think, Mr. President, if I am not intruding upon the Senator unduly——

Mr. BURTON. Certainly not.

Mr. BACON. I will not discuss it at large. I merely want to suggest the point that it is important in view of the very greatly enlarged functions of the Federal Government, in which the citizen is brought very much nearer to the direct operations of the Government than he formerly was, that the number of those who shall be dependent upon one Representative shall not be unduly increased. Judging by the amount of work which is to be done the Representatives have now, under the present representation, just as much as any one man can properly perform. I judge by the amount of assistance that the Members of this body have to render to the Representatives in the other body in the carrying on of their detail work that it is very large. If it were restricted, as suggested by Mr. Madison and Mr. Calhoun, so that the number of Representatives should be limited in any degree, the number of the constituency represented by each Representative would make it impossible for him properly to discharge his duties as a Representative regarding the various things which devolve upon him to look after.

Mr. BURTON. I accept the generalization of the Senator from Georgia, and I really thank him for bringing attention to that fact, namely, that the scope of operations of the Federal Government has very greatly increased. But I reach a conclusion diametrically opposite to that which he reaches. It is true the Federal Government does a great many things which it did not formerly do. It improves harbors more fully, builds more buildings, establishes rural free-delivery routes, exercises a degree of supervision over corporations engaged in interstate commerce, at any rate over interstate railroads, and looks after the purity of food; but that very fact makes it supremely important that the Representative here should represent the whole country and not a limited part of it; that he should stand for the whole United States and the welfare of the whole people, and not for the third or fourth district of some State, because the more you increase numbers the more you increase the temptation for each Member to merely look after matters of local concern and turn his back upon things which belong to the Nation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BURTON. Most assuredly.

Mr. BORAH. The remark of the Senator suggests to me the proposition that if the Federal Government would confine its operation to things which are general and which are national the rule of the Senator from Ohio would be a perfect rule and one which we should observe; but the National Government is continually proposing to deal with those things which are purely local in their nature and of local concern, and about which Senators and Congressmen from other parts of the country can know nothing. If the Senator is going to adopt his rule, which I think is the proper one, we ought to confine the National Government to operations concerning which the National Government as a whole is interested, and not the running of business of local concern.

Mr. BURTON. I find I am between two opposing ideas. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] commends apparently, at any rate he lays emphasis upon, the enlargement of the scope of the Federal Government, and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] deplores it. One says that it requires the accession of a larger number of Members, in order to keep up with the widening jurisdiction of the Federal Government, and the other says that it requires more Members to keep the Government within the bounds where it belongs.

Mr. BORAH. No.

Mr. BURTON. I do not really think those two ideas interfere at all with the view I have undertaken to state.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that they do. I stated that I was inclined to agree with the general proposition. But, Mr. President, when we invoke the rule here, as we constantly do, when it does not apply to a Member who is invoking it, that we should legislate on broad national grounds and not be controlled by local affairs, we ought to be willing to accept the proposition by confining the National Government to those things which are national.

Mr. BURTON. If I may ask the Senator from Idaho a question: Does he not think that as you increase the number of Members you increase the demand for new forms of Federal interposition or the demand for the greater exercise of existing activities of the Government, and would not the tendency be to increase both to an undue extent?

Mr. BORAH. That may be true, but I am satisfied that if we continue to extend the power of the Federal Government to matters which are purely of local concern we are not going to succeed in applying on this floor or in the other body the rule which the Senator has invoked, that we should legislate for the whole country instead of looking after matters of local concern.

We impose upon Senators and impose upon Congressmen the duty of looking after local concerns and local matters when the Government takes up those matters, because the other Senators and the other Congressmen can not know concerning those matters which are purely local. For that reason we ought to go back to the old rule which the fathers supposed sufficient and placed in the Constitution, and that is that the States shall attend to local affairs and the National Government to national affairs. We have wandered far from that proposition.

Mr. BURTON. I do not know, Mr. President, just where the Senator from Idaho will draw the line between the different jurisdictions, but I should be very glad to coincide with him in his general view. I did oppose here a measure providing for the establishment by the Federal Government of forest reserves in several States. I regret to state that I was unsuccessful in that effort.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BURTON. In just a moment. I notice that propositions are pending here for the Federal Government to build ordinary highways in different States. At some time I may speak against that proposition, for it seems to me if the Federal Government should ever undertake the building of an ordinary highway from a county seat to a leading town in the county we might as well admit that State lines are mere vanishing traces on the map, and that all the activities of our people are being concentrated in one colossal bureaucracy here in Washington.

Again, we would be saying to communities, "You need take no responsibility; we will act for those who neglect their own affairs; we will give no reward to those who show independence and a disposition to do the things which they ought to do, but our fostering care will be extended to those who do nothing for themselves."

This is a digression, Mr. President, but I am not certain but that it comes in here appropriately. It is at least in response to questions which have been asked.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BURTON. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Georgia in a moment. One other point I want to make in regard to the increase in the scope of Federal activities.

Mr. BACON. Shall I proceed now, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I want to correct the statement made by the Senator from Ohio, in which he stated that I had said anything which approved of these enlarged activities of the Federal Government.

Mr. BURTON. I will say to the Senator that I limited my statement in that regard.

Mr. BACON. I certainly said nothing of the kind, and I wish to say that, on the contrary, I not only do not approve of them, but I very seriously deprecate them. But, Mr. President, we are dealing not with what we might like to be, but we are dealing with an existing condition. The fact is that there has been this enlargement and there has been this tremendous increase of direct duties devolving upon Senators and Representatives by reason of this enlargement. However fully we may agree with the Senator from Ohio in his recent admirable utterance upon what should be the functions of the Federal Government and the separate functions of the States, the fact is that those views are not regarded and that this Congress and every other Congress is loaded down with propositions which enlarge the functions of the General Government. Even if we stood for the future upon the line indicated by the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Ohio, that would not change the fact that the development has already been had, and no man can hope that any back track will be taken; that any functions which have already been devolved upon the Federal Government are going to be withdrawn.

They are certainly going to be continued to their present full extent, and there is every probability, and almost a certainty, that they will be still more largely increased. Taking it at its present development, I again suggest the fact that the utterances of a former day as to what would be a sufficient representation could not be applied with any degree of satisfaction or accuracy to present conditions.

This is a representative Government, and there ought to be such a representation for a given number of people as will enable that given number of people to be efficiently served. As to the suggestion of the Senator that the enlargement of the representation makes one of those Representatives less likely to take a broad view of the condition of the general welfare, and make him more likely to limit himself to a contracted view of his own locality, I do not think it would have that effect in any manner whatsoever. My experience is that the larger the body the more apt it is to be a body which will be responsive to the general view of the public.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I am glad to understand the Senator from Georgia more perfectly. I know that he does not favor the increased scope of Federal operations, but it seems to me his conclusion is a singular one. He states that while this is a dangerous and injurious tendency, he would nevertheless recognize that tendency, admit it is here, and by voting to increase the membership of the House of Representatives inevitably foster and aid its development. Are we to frame a law fixing the membership of the House of Representatives under the influences of developments which, it is admitted, point in the wrong direction? Ought we not rather to say that if this is all contrary to the general spirit of our institutions and the welfare of the people, we will take every step within our power to stay its course? I can not agree for a moment with the Senator from Georgia in his view that the larger membership will be just as efficient and as thoroughly representative of the people.

Mr. President, if there has been any one line of political activity in our country which has been marked by disastrous failures it is our municipal governments. What has been the tendency wherever intelligent consideration has been given to the subject? It has been to cut down the number of representatives. In a city not 500 miles from here they multiplied their legislative body as the result of annexation or the creation of additional wards, so that I believe there were, in all, 139 members. One morning the people of the city woke up to the fact that their councilmanic representatives had been receiving bribes. You could not place the responsibility for legislation among those 139. Corruption was rife, but you could not put your finger on the man who started it—there were too many of them—until suddenly there was an upheaval and a general disposition to confess. That cumbrous body was dissolved, and in its place was substituted, I believe, seven, or, at least, not more than nine, members.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has, as I understand, drawn one of the most progressive charters in the country for his own city, restricting the number who control the city government not to 50, not even to 25, but to 5, these 5 having all legislative and executive authority.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Ohio does me altogether too much credit. I bore a very humble part in what I regard as a great reform in municipal administration, but I do not want to assume the credit of having done that very wise thing alone.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator certainly had something to do with drawing the charter.

Mr. CUMMINS. I had something to do with it; yes.

Mr. BURTON. Certainly; the directing part, as I understood; and no doubt whatever was done was done very thoroughly and very well.

The tendency is apparent in municipal governments all over the country to diminish the size of legislative bodies, thereby affording greater efficiency and greater responsibility; and the universal conclusion has been that these lesser numbers respond more readily to the wishes of the people.

I recall that Grover Cleveland, in some lectures which he wrote, stated that the President of the United States was the one man upon whom all the people of the country felt they might rely, recognizing that he was responsible to them and that he could act in their interest. So it is not by a multitude that you give responsiveness to public opinion or to the wishes of the people; it is not by large numbers that you can create responsibility, but it is by such a number as will make an orderly body and one that can work with efficiency and readiness.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, upon a moment's reflection, it seems to me that I ought to say one word more. The plan of municipal government to which the Senator from Ohio refers had its origin in Texas and is largely patterned after the plan that was devised for the government of Galveston after its disaster a few years ago. I think the history of the working of that plan in Galveston is what gave the reform its start. The Senator from Ohio, however, ought to remember—and I say this because I do not expect to vote for a diminution of the membership of the House of Representatives—that the purpose of the change in the method of municipal administration was not so much to reduce the number of those intrusted with power as it was to concentrate in the same men legislative and administrative powers.

Mr. BURTON. Was there not another point equally sought—to concentrate responsibility?

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; because in municipal affairs it is necessary, in order to fasten responsibility upon the right person, that whatever legislative power the city may have and the executive power shall be found in the same person or in the same persons. I mention this, because I think it is due to Texas that it shall have the credit for the origination of this plan, and that it is also due to myself, because I would not want to have it thought that there was any inconsistency between a vote for a membership of the House of Representatives of 433 and an entire belief in the wisdom of the change in municipal affairs.

Mr. BURTON. Nevertheless, Mr. President, the object—and there is a widespread movement for this reform—is to diminish the number of a legislative or a legislative and executive body and to impose a larger degree of responsibility, to increase the efficiency of the service; and that purpose is defeated by increasing the number.

Now, again, in regard to the tendencies mentioned by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], what is the effect of this multiplication of functions? Do the respective Members, when you increase their numbers, perform any larger duties than they did before? No, Mr. President; not unless it is as advocates of the interests of some special locality, the very thing which they should not be. The upshot of all this is to place greater reliance upon the executive officers of the Government. This increase in the scope of Federal operations has shown its effects in no way more decidedly than in the lesser degree in which the legislators solve these problems and the greater degree in which they are attended to by the executive department.

We constantly refer many bills to the War Department or to the Navy Department or to the Interior Department, and, with an occasional exception, in case such a bill comes back with a recommendation for or against it, that determines whether it shall pass or be rejected. So, the increase in the enterprises, if you may call them such, undertaken by the Federal Government creates no call for an increase in the number of Representatives. Instead of that, it is an argument against such an increase.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether it would not be a much better system to call the officers of the executive departments before the committees, rather than to submit matters to them for an ex parte opinion?

Mr. BURTON. I think it would in some cases. These are, of course, largely matters of detail, such as the building of a bridge over a river or the question as to whether a certain quarter section of land can be sold without prejudice to the interests of the Government.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not refer to those minor matters so much as to those which involve a change in the system of government.

Mr. BURTON. Without any disparagement to either, I think there should be the fullest communication between the executive and the legislative departments.

Mr. President, I do not wish to occupy much more time, as possibly others may wish to speak, but I do desire to say a few words in support of the argument presented by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. The question was very aptly raised by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY], How are you going to provide for the representation of States where the number of Representatives is diminished? In the first place, in a matter of such vital importance it seems to me that the question of method and of the time of making the change is of minor importance. I wish, however, to suggest several methods. The first would be to provide that this act shall not go into effect until the election of 1914, and that for the election of 1912 each State of the Union shall have the same representation as now. That method, as I understand, is not without precedent.

The suggestion has been made that you might assign to the States gaining increased representation under the new apportionment the added number which they would have under its adopted ratio and retain until the election of 1914 for States losing Members the number to which they would be entitled under the old or former apportionment. I question very much the validity of such a provision, because it would be giving to some States a representation beyond that to which their population entitled them, and if you could do that for one Congress—that is, give them an unequal representation—you could do it for five Congresses, or until the end of the decade.

Another method suggested for those States whose legislatures do not meet again before the next election is to authorize the governor or some executive board to redistrict the State for the one election prior to the final division of the State into districts.

A little more than 20 years ago I introduced a bill, which perhaps has become only of academic interest now, prescribing an entirely new plan for dividing States into districts. That plan provided that the governor of each State should appoint a nonpartisan board of four, two members from each party, which should proceed to divide the State into districts according to certain well-defined rules, which were set forth. If that board could not agree, or if there should be a failure to appoint such a board in any State, a national board was to be created, consisting of five members. The fifth member should be a judge of the Supreme Court or of some other court. I believe now in some such method as this for dividing the States into districts in order to avoid the scandal and the injustice which have so frequently attended gerrymanders.

As I said yesterday, there is nothing that strikes so nearly to the root of the whole system of popular government as a gerrymander. It overturns the great principle that the majority may rule, and substitutes the rule of the minority. The gerrymander gives sanction to trickery, to fraud, and to dishonesty. It gives a reward to the unscrupulous, and power to those who gain it by robbery, so that you can say of the party or the individual who accomplishes a gerrymander what Hamlet said of his uncle:

> A cutpurse of the empire and the rule,
> That from a shelf the precious diadem stole,
> And put it in his pocket!

The gerrymander deprives the people of their rights, and I am ready to stand here for any regulation which prevents its continuance.

I also desire to repeat briefly the arguments for the first amendment that I proposed yesterday, namely, to strike out the words "by the legislature thereof in the manner herein prescribed," as a method for districting States, and to insert in lieu thereof the words:

> In the manner provided by the laws thereof and in accordance with the rules enumerated in section 3 of this act.

What right have we, Mr. President, in the face of different methods and laws pertaining to the enactment of legislation—some States acting by the legislature, others acting by the legislature but subject to a referendum—to fix one inflexible way and require that every State shall be divided into congressional districts in that manner?

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SHIVELY. In that respect is it not a fact that this bill repeats substantially the language that has been employed in all reapportionment acts in all these years? And if the Senator will permit me further, is not the language sufficient to allow, whatever the law of the State may be, the people of that State to control the matter? If they have arranged that legislative action shall be submitted to a referendum, the phraseology of the pending bill does not interfere with that procedure.

Mr. BURTON. Answering the last suggestion first, that if a State sanctions the use of the referendum this provision has no effect, I will ask why leave it in, then? I think it does have effect. Congress may determine the time, place, and manner of electing Members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator asks why leave it in. It is just the kind of a provision that has been placed in every apportionment act, at least since 1850. I have examined the record in that respect, and there is nothing unusual about the provision.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, it would seem that the Senator from Indiana has failed to keep in touch with the times. It was a very natural provision in 1840, because then the referendum had never been heard of in the United States. It was also natural until 40 or 50 years after that; but, whether we favor the referendum and initiative or not, we can not close our eyes to the fact that there has been a widespread agitation for their adoption, and, further, that that agitation has not stopped with mere advocacy. In several States—I was about to say in numerous States—the referendum has been adopted. It was very natural in 1890, and even in 1900, that a provision should be incorporated that the State should be redistricted "by the legislature thereof," because that was the only law-making power; but since then a new method of making laws has been devised, and we can not afford to cling either to obsolete phraseology or, in our dealing with the States, to adhere to obsolete methods—that is, to ignore their methods of enacting laws.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, it is not a matter of adhering to obsolete methods or dealing with obsolete phraseology. I am entirely willing that a State shall determine what shall be the rule of apportionment within that State, but I still insist that the language of this bill does not prohibit the legislature from arranging the districts by referendum of the act to the people.

Mr. BURTON. That is, the legislature might assemble and say, under the provision now in the bill, "We leave this to a referendum"; but suppose the law in that State already provides for a referendum as well as for an act of the legislature?

Mr. SHIVELY. In which event it would be mandatory on that legislature to submit the act to a referendum.

Mr. BURTON. I can not agree with the Senator from Indiana in regard to that.

Mr. SHIVELY. Of course, a court might not mandamus it to do so, but certainly public duty would require it to be done.

Mr. BURTON. In view of the very serious evils arising from gerrymanders, it behooves us not to take any chances in a matter of this kind and not to leave any question to the uncertainties of phraseology. I will say to the Senator from Indiana—and it is a point of some importance in this connection—that the bill which passed the House of Representatives last winter and came over to the Senate did not contain the phraseology "by the legislature thereof." Those words have been inserted since. It was determined last winter that the question should be left open to the laws and regulations of the respective States. Why, after it had been once passed by the House, was it thought best to put in this phraseologly "by the legislature thereof"?

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SHIVELY. If the Senator will observe the apportionment acts which have been passed following the decennial censuses of 1880, 1890, and 1900, he will find that substantially the same language was employed.

Mr. BURTON. I concede that.

Mr. SHIVELY. And there is no reason why, in the enactment of this legislation, different language should be used.

The Senator seems to insinuate—I will not say that—but he seems to indicate that there was some motive in changing this language. I can not see that.

Mr. BURTON. Whenever a change is deliberately made in phraseology it is usually made with an object, and I do not understand that the words "by the legislature thereof" were employed, although considered, in connection with the previous bill.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SHIVELY. If the Senator will examine the series of apportionment acts I think he will find that in this bill precisely the same end is sought, and probably with the use of four or five lines less of language. The sense is compressed into fewer words. There is no motive or intention whatever to change the general purpose from that of former acts providing for an apportionment of representation in the House. Fewer words have been used, but the idea to be expressed and to be enacted into legislation is the same in all cases.

Mr. BURTON. I really can not agree at all with my friend the Senator from Indiana in that regard. It is not always best to use fewer words. While unnecessary verbiage should be avoided, you need to use just enough to express what you mean.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BURTON. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from Ohio, in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana, that a legislature in a State where the initiative and referendum is in vogue would be derelict if it did not submit a matter to the referendum that, so far as my knowledge of the law relating to the initiative and referendum is concerned, the legislature absolutely has nothing to do with.

Mr. BURTON. I am inclined to think that is the case in several States.

Mr. CLAPP. I know that is the case in some States. There is no question about that.

Mr. SHIVELY. In which event it could have nothing to do with this.

Mr. CLAPP. That is just the object of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHIVELY. No.

Mr. CLAPP. To put it wherever it would be under the law of that State.

Mr. SHIVELY. If you have a referendum in the State that applies to general legislation adopted by the legislature of that State, and the law of that State requires that such legislation shall be submitted to a referendum, of course it applies here.

Mr. BURTON. No.

Mr. CLAPP. The law of the State——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. BURTON. I will be glad to yield to either Senator.

Mr. CLAPP. The law of the State in that case does not require the legislature to submit anything to the people. The right of the people under the initiative and referendum—at least, I know this to be the case in some States—is absolutely independent of the legislature.

Now, if it was something which the law of the State required the legislature upon certain action to submit, then the position of the Senator from Indiana would perhaps be correct—that Congress authorizing the legislature, the legislature would be morally, if not legally, bound to act under the law of that State. But there is no relation between the two, so far as the initiative and referendum depending upon the action of the legislature, except that the people could not exercise the referendum except where there had been some legislation which they might affirm or veto by the referendum.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BURTON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. SHIVELY. Of course, I understand that there is no occasion to discuss the initiative. I do not suppose any Senator contends that the initiative is involved in this legislation, either on the amendment or the bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. CLAPP. I can readily understand how it might be involved. In a State that had the initiative and referendum, unless it excepted this, and I do not think they do, all subjects of legislation would be in the hands of the people under the initiative. That is my understanding.

Mr. BURTON. It simply leaves the question to the laws and methods of the States. If they include initiative, it is included.

Mr. SHIVELY. That is all on the theory——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio has the floor. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BURTON. I should be glad to yield further to the Senator from Indiana and perhaps——

Mr. SHIVELY. That is all on the theory that all legislation in the States is absolutely and unqualifiedly subject to the initiative.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no; not necessarily. It depends on whether the laws of the States provide for the passing of laws by the initiative.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BURTON. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. WORKS. The right of referendum in the people does not come from the legislature at all. The legislature has no power over it. They can not delegate it to the people. It must come from a constitutional provision; and the same is true with respect to the initiative. Legislative power in the hands of the people could only be given by a constitutional provision. Therefore, so far as the referendum is concerned, it is entirely independent of any action by the legislature, and if this provision is made in the way it appears in the bill at the present time, then as a matter of course the power would be given directly to the legislature.

Mr. BURTON. And no other regulation or law could be utilized.

Mr. WORKS. I will say to the Senator from Indiana that if he really desires that this right shall be given to the people, by way of referendum, he is taking some chances in allowing the bill to be passed in its present form.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from California has clearly stated the case as I understand it. Of course there are cases where the legislature has the option of leaving the question to the people to be voted upon by a quasi referendum, but that is not the usual method.

Now, I again call attention to the impression which would be conveyed if we were to retain these words "by the legislature thereof." The bill as it passed the House last winter omitted them. The bill as it passed the House at this session included them. That is not without meaning. And under the power which Congress has to determine the time, place, and manner of holding congressional elections, I understand it could divide a State into districts. It could deputize that right, perhaps, to the governor or to an executive board, and it could give over that right to the legislature. So I regard this provision as an infringement on the rights of the States, and one which we should strike out, leaving them to their own methods and laws.

In conclusion I appeal to the Members of the Senate. I am satisfied that if the individual Members of this body vote in accordance with their own independent judgment there will be a large majority against increasing the size of the House of Representatives; and I especially appeal to those Senators whose States will lose one or more Members not, on that account, to stand out in favor of increasing the membership. Not only in the long run, but also in the very next House to be selected, they can not be the gainers, because emphasis will always be placed upon quality rather than numbers, and in any event their States will have their proportionate share.

I also ask that Members vote against the bill if this amendment can not be adopted. I do not believe any serious injury would be done if it was allowed to go over until next winter, when it can be taken up in a regular session.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, the last observation submitted by the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] is very suggestive. I regret if it indicates a purpose behind the various amendments offered to this bill to delay its final passage and postpone apportionment legislation to the next session of Congress.

What is the history of the proposed legislation? A bill was reported by the Committee on the Census of the last House of Representatives fixing the membership of the House on the Thirteenth Decennial Census at 391. That bill was made the subject of consideration by a caucus of the Republican Members of the House. I speak of this in no partisan sense, nor for a partisan purpose. What was then done is last winter's snow, but it shows very distinctly the real attitude of the House on the question of the number of its own membership. Notwithstanding that determination by a Republican caucus, when the bill came before the House the number 391 was set aside by a Republican House and the number 433 was substituted instead. In that form and with that number the bill was passed by the House and came to the Senate. The Senate Committee on the Census of that Congress, Republican in both branches, reported that bill at 433. In the hurry and confusion of legislation at the close of the last Congress that bill died on the Senate calendar.

At the meeting of the new Congress in the present extraordinary session several bills were introduced in the House providing for apportionment of Representatives among the several States. Again the issue between 433 and the smaller number was made. The House committee reported favorably the bill providing for a membership of 433. The House passed that bill. It came to the Senate and was referred to the Committee on the Census. At the first meeting of that committee the bill as passed by the House was favorably reported to the Senate and is now the unfinished business before the Senate.

So the issue between 391 and 433 is not a new one. It was thoroughly threshed out in both a Republican House and a Democratic House. This fixes the attitude of the House. Privately expressed opinions, coming from individual Members of the House, are not to be given undue weight. Mental reservations are not to count heavily against the record deliberately and repeatedly made.

I do not propose to enter on a philosophic discussion of the relative advantages and efficiency of a larger and smaller representation in the other branch of Congress. In this field there is vast latitude for honest differences of opinion. The smaller body may be more susceptible to the pressure of powerful interests. The larger body may be more responsive to the energy of first principles. There evidently is a golden mean. I am unwilling to contend that no case could arise wherein it would not be the duty of the Senate to challenge the figure fixed by the House. I do say that while we have the undoubted constitutional right to raise the question and make the issue, there is no subject within the authority of the Senate on which we should proceed with more caution and less presumption.

The one lone precedent has been invoked this afternoon by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] and the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. That precedent was made some 60 or 70 years ago. In that case not only was the number fixed in the bill as it came from the House reduced by the Senate, but the then representation of the House was reduced. I understood the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] to fix the date of that action by the Senate in 1843. Was it not in 1842?

Mr. ROOT. The discussion was in 1842.

Mr. SHIVELY. The date is consequential only as it connects us with certain contemporary influences then at work in American politics that should not be overlooked in appraising the value of the precedent. The Senator quotes from John C. Calhoun in support of this precedent. Calhoun had rare equipment for an expression of opinion on any question of statesmanship or political philosophy. But it should not be forgotten that probably the bitterest passage in Calhoun's political life was when, by reason of his quarrel with President Jackson, he was thrown out of line for the Presidency and Martin Van Buren came into line as successor to Jackson. From that time Calhoun politics was anti-Van Buren politics. If, without recent review of the subject, I interpret history aright, the same politics that underlay the insurrection in the Senate against the apportionment bill of the House in 1842 worked the two-thirds rule on the Democratic national convention in 1844. It is well known that then, for the first time, the two-thirds rule was adopted, and that it was adopted for the purpose of defeating Van Buren, who had, or was certain of having, a majority in the convention. Representation in the Senate as reflected in national political conventions is a fixed quantity, while the representation reflected in conventions from the membership in the House from the several States may change with each decennial census and the apportionment made on such census. The smallest State of the Union is bound to have three Members of Congress—that is, two Senators and one Representative—however meager may be or stationary may remain the population. It follows that the influence in national conventions derived from senatorial representation is reduced by increase in the membership of the House. At the period of history of which I am speaking certain States were making rapid increase in population. This increase was in quarters that made it a live question in the politics of the time. It was at such a time and under such influences that the precedent quoted to-day was made. I am willing that it shall be used for what it is worth, but unwilling that it shall be allowed a persuasive force which does not belong to it. Certain it is that it has never been successfully invoked to determine the action of the Senate since that time.

Moreover, Mr. President, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] wisely suggests, we are operating under changed conditions. We are multiplying and augmenting Federal establishments at Washington. Federal expenditure has risen from fifty and one hundred million dollars to over one billion dollars per annum. This widening scope of Federal activity increases the duties falling on the individual Member of the House. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] says the facilities for communication are increasing. This fact only increases the labor of the Representative, as the increasing volume of his mail will attest. Under this bill the average Member of the House will have over 17,000 more constituents in his district than did the Representative under the last apportionment at the time it was made.

Much has been said in this debate about the crowded condition of the Hall of the House. The House report and the Senate report on this bill point out that certain improvements are to be made in the arrangement of the House that will tend to correct this difficulty. Much depends on the function that the Hall is to serve. If the House and Senate are to become emporiums of all kinds of goods, wares, and merchandise, both will require more space. If this Government is to be resolved into the universal functions of national industrialism, it may be necessary to arrange stalls for the exhibition of the products of every kind of industry as a step in the process of determining just what the attitude of the Government shall be toward such industry. On the other hand, if we recognize that neither House is the proper place from which to conduct correspondence and distribute horse books and pumpkin seed, the question of suitable compact space within which to transact the parliamentary business of the House will occasion little trouble.

The House can be so arranged that a membership of 500 can transact the public business and each Member be heard. Of course, with undue increase the body would become unwieldy, turbulent, and ineffective, but the menace of such mischiefs does not attach to this bill.

Mr. President, this bill has been impressed with the favor of a Republican House and a Democratic House. There is nothing partisan about it. Its language is in substance the same employed in all the apportionment acts of the last 50 years. The amendments offered must tend to delay and endanger the passage of the bill. The legislatures of several States are now in session. Apportionment on the census under the Constitution involves change in the number of Representatives in some of these States. We owe it to the people of those States to act promptly, to the end that they may have assigned to them the representation to which they are entitled. To engraft on the bill at this stage of the present session the amendments proposed is to endanger its passage and serve no useful purpose.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 130) making appropriations for certain expenses of the House of Representatives incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 4, 7, 8, and 9.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 5, and 6, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert the matter proposed to be added by said House amendment on page 2, after line 10, of the joint resolution; and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Government Printing Office: To enable the Public Printer to pay messengers to CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and work of committees, on night duty during the special session of the present Congress, for extra services rendered, $400 each, $1,200."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate amending the title of the bill, and agree to the same.

F. E. WARREN,
ROBERT J. GAMBLE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that with the consent of the Senate I will, on Monday, the 7th of August, following the remarks of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], of which he has given notice, make some remarks on the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) to admit the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona as States into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2983) for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Thirteenth Census.

Mr. PENROSE. I assume that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] does not want to have a vote taken on the amendments to-day?

Mr. SHIVELY. I do not, Mr. President. It seems to me that in justice to all Senators we should not take a vote this evening. It appears to be generally understood that the voting on these propositions is to occur to-morrow.

Mr. PENROSE. Then, if it is agreeable to the Senator from Indiana, I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SHIVELY. I have no objection.

Mr. PENROSE. I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, August 3, 1911, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, August 2, 1911.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God, our heavenly Father, source of every blessing, we thank Thee for the preservation of our lives, for the hopes and possibilities of this new day. Strengthen us for its duties; purify us, we beseech Thee, from all guile; imbue us plenteously with heavenly gifts, that we hallow Thy name in all that we undertake. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum here. There is no use in wasting time to count.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and thirty-three Members are present—a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will reopen the doors.

The doors were reopened.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose, and was greeted with general applause.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker [applause], I thank my friends for the confidence they express in me.

I rise, Mr. Speaker, to a question of personal privilege. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I send to the Clerk's desk an article which appeared this morning in the Washington Herald and other papers, and ask the Clerk to read it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the article.

The Clerk read as follows:

BRYAN ASSAILS EFFORTS TO BLOCK TARIFF CHANGE—COMMONER AUTHORIZES STATEMENT DENOUNCING REPRESENTATIVE UNDERWOOD FOR ACTIVITY IN DEFEATING STEEL AND IRON SCHEDULE REDUCTION.

LINCOLN, NEBR., August 1.

The recent activity of Representative UNDERWOOD in defeating an attempt by CHAMP CLARK and others to reduce the steel and iron schedule has met with the disapproval of W. J. Bryan.

To-day Bryan authorizes the following statement: "The action of Chairman UNDERWOOD in opposing an immediate effort to reduce the iron and steel schedule reveals the real UNDERWOOD. Speaker CLARK and other tariff reformers tried to secure the passage of a resolution instructing the Ways and Means Committee to take up other schedules, including the iron and steel schedule, but UNDERWOOD and FITZGERALD, of New York, the FITZGERALD who saved CANNON in the last Congress, succeeded in defeating the resolution.

"Mr. KITCHIN, a member of the committee, reminded Mr. UNDERWOOD that he had told the country that all his worldly goods were tied up in the iron and steel industry and that a failure to report a bill covering that schedule must be attributed to his connection with the business, but even this did not move him.

"Some of the Democrats thought Mr. Bryan did Mr. UNDERWOOD an injustice when he charged him with being tainted with protection. What do these Democrats think now, since Mr. UNDERWOOD has put himself at the head of the opposition to Speaker CLARK'S tariff-reduction program.

"The tariff on wool was the camel's nose. The animal is trying to enter the tent.

"The unmasking of Chairman UNDERWOOD will serve a useful purpose if it arouses the Democrats to an understanding of the mistake made in putting Mr. UNDERWOOD at the head of the committee, if he solidifies his policy of delay.

"The most effective way to shear him of his power is to change the caucus rules so as to require a public record vote on every question affecting the party's policy. Protection is a nocturnal animal; it shuns the light."

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

"A record vote open to the newspapers would have enabled CLARK to have carried his resolution. The caucus rules ought to be changed at once."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the statements that are contained in that article are absolutely false. [Loud and prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, if the reflections which that paper contains rested only on myself I would not attempt to take the time of this House to answer them. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But the statements contained in that article are a reflection on the only body of Democracy that is in control of this Government [applause on the Democratic side], and as the representative leader on the floor of this House of this majority I would be untrue to myself and untrue to my party if I did not arise here this morning and stamp those utterances with the brand of falsehood, which you know they are. [Loud and continued applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, as to the facts. The gentleman who has issued that statement, Mr. William Jennings Bryan, of Nebraska [laughter on the Republican side], charges that the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, standing in the interest of a protective tariff, has led this House into lines that were unworthy of any Democrat in the land. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I know it is false, Mr. Speaker. You know it is false, and so do the Democracy on this side of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But we must let the country know it is false.

The gentleman from Nebraska says that my leadership of this side of the House could not stand in the open. There is not a Democratic Member here that does not know that if for one moment I misrepresented the Democracy of this House in bearing their commission I would send my resignation to the Speaker's desk. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. Bryan, insinuates that I have attempted to prevent a consideration of the iron and steel schedule by this House at this session of Congress. I do not know from what source the gentleman has obtained his facts, but that that statement is false I intend to prove to you and to the country this morning. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When the Ways and Means Committee was first organized to prepare tariff legislation for the consideration of this House, as its chairman I stated to the committee that I was willing to take up any schedule, for consideration first, that the committee desired to consider; but, coming from an iron and steel district, and being personally interested in the manufacture of pig iron, I stated that the committee would relieve me from embarrassment if they would first take up for consideration the iron and steel schedule. [Loud and continued applause on the Democratic side.]

My colleagues on the committee are now on the floor of the House. They are here to sustain me in that statement.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. With pleasure.

Mr. PAYNE. When the gentleman refers to the committee he refers only to the majority members, of course, not to the full committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course; I did not mean the full committee. I meant the majority members in their caucus.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman spoke of the full committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not refer to the full committee, of course. It was a party question, and was determined by the Democratic members.

The reason why the committee did not take up the iron and steel schedule was that the country was demanding a revision of the textile schedule, Schedule K, in relation to wool and manufactures of wool, bearing an average duty of 90 per cent, which had not been revised for many years.

Schedule I, the cotton schedule, bore a duty of 53 per cent, covering all cotton goods, and was proportionately equally high.

The iron and steel schedule had been cut by the Wilson bill, cut by the Dingley bill, cut again by the Payne bill; and although it needs, and will have, further revision [applause on the Democratic side], the committee, in its wisdom, not myself, decided that it was wiser to consider these other schedules first.

Mr. Speaker, we went into the consideration of the woolen schedule; but during the writing of the woolen bill by the majority members of the committee it was suggested—not by myself, but by another member of the committee—that the woolen schedule related largely to manufacturers in the North, and that, if we brought in a woolen schedule, in justice to ourselves we must follow it with a schedule that affected southern manufacturing interests. Therefore, during the consideration of the woolen schedule a resolution was passed in the meeting of the majority members of the Committee on Ways and Means, directing the chairman to prepare the data for the consideration of the cotton schedule. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That was prepared, and when we disposed of the woolen schedule I laid the data in reference to the cotton schedule before the committee, not by my suggestion, but by the order of the committee itself. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When it was first taken up for consideration the suggestion was made by some of the members of the committee that the tax on cotton machinery being high, if we intended to lower the tax on cotton goods we should first take up the reduction of cotton-mill machinery. When that question came before the committee, at the very inception of the consideration of the cotton schedule, I said to the members of the committee: "I will be glad if you will take up the iron and steel schedule now [applause on the Democratic side] and lay aside the consideration of the cotton schedule until you have revised the iron and steel schedule down to an honest revenue basis." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

My colleagues on the committee sit before me in this House at this moment. I see the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON]; I see the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER]; I see the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DIXON]; I see the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HAMMOND]; I see the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]; I see the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RANDELL]; I see the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD]; I see the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL]; and other members of the committee here who heard me make that statement, and they will sustain the fact. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And yet "the gentleman from Nebraska" proclaims to the people of the United States that this committee is being led by me in dishonest directions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as to the caucus. When we took up the cotton schedule in the Democratic caucus I had no notice and no idea that a resolution would be offered directing the Ways and Means Committee to prepare other schedules. A resolution was offered stating that before we adjourned we should revise the iron and steel schedule, the sugar schedule, and the paragraph in the sundry schedule relating to rubber, and also the schedule relating to chemicals and dyestuffs.

I opposed the consideration of that resolution at that time. I stated to the caucus that I had no objection to the revision of the iron and steel schedule. I had already stated to the public press of the country that I desired the iron and steel schedule to be considered next by the committee. It had gone out in the daily press. I simply stated in the caucus that at that time the Senate had not acted on the wool bill. It had not acted on the free-list bill.

Mr. MANN. It had acted on the wool bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. It had not acted on the wool bill on that day. It did act on it the next day. It had not acted on the free-list bill. I stated to the caucus that, not knowing what action would be taken by the Senate in reference to our bills or what action would be taken by the President, I thought it was unwise for the Democratic Party to pledge itself to the course it intended to pursue the balance of this session until we could first have an opportunity to ascertain what action the Senate was going to take in reference to our bills and what action the President was going to take. I stated to the caucus that before an adjournment resolution was passed I would bring the matter of adjournment and the consideration of other schedules back to the Democratic caucus for them to determine in the light of the facts that they would have as to the action of the Senate and the President of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It was not an effort to sidetrack any schedule; it was an effort to have the caucus of my party act with all the facts before it. I thought it the part of wisdom, and the caucus sustained the position I took. [Applause.] The gentleman from Nebraska refers to my friend from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] to sustain him in the statement contained in that paper. Mr. Speaker, I want to pause in my remarks for the moment and ask my friend from North Carolina to take the floor and make a statement as to whether the facts I have stated are true or not. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly that this controversy and misunderstanding has arisen between the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. Bryan, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I am sure that the gentleman from Nebraska has been misinformed. [Applause on the Democratic side.] While he expresses a desire to have publicity of caucus action, it would certainly redound to a more perfect understanding of the truth of the situation if he would give publicity to the name of his informant and the details of his information. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I feel quite sure that not a member of the Democratic caucus could have given Mr. Bryan the information upon which the interview is based, and it must have been given by some one outside of the Democratic caucus, for, as the gentleman from Alabama says, there is no truth in the statement [great applause on the Democratic side] except the statement that I in the caucus reminded it that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] had, in a speech in the House, said that practically all the property he owned, except his house and home, was in the iron and steel business.

I did remind the caucus of that. I took the position that not only was it right for the Democrats to revise the steel schedule before adjournment, but it would be wise policy for us to revise this schedule especially, as that candid, courageous, and manly statement of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee might be taken as an occasion by our opponents to slander and libel the gentleman from Alabama, and to slander and libel the position of the Democratic membership of the Ways and Means Committee and this Democratic House, but I never dreamed that any Democrat in this country would seize upon the incidents to misrepresent the position of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], or that of the Democracy of the House, or to impugn the motives of either. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I want to say that the statement just made by the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is in exact accordance with the facts. He did state before the committee, at the organization of the majority of the committee—you Republicans were not in it, because the country had taken you out of it—that as he was interested in the steel and iron business it would relieve him of embarrassment if the committee would take up that schedule at once and get rid of it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But after the disposal of the reciprocity measure and the free-list bill, it was the judgment of the committee that the woolen schedule, the most iniquitous schedule that had ever been put on the statute books, ought first to be revised. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And then it was the judgment of the committee that the cotton schedule should follow the woolen schedule in the revision of the tariff on textiles.

Mr. Speaker, we have effected these revisions to the satisfaction of the Democrats, and of many Republican patriots of the House, and to the great satisfaction of a large majority of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We intend, as the chairman says, to revise the iron and steel schedule, but we do not want it to be understood that such interviews as has been read here to-day are spurring us to undertake the job. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We decided to do it months before that interview. In the caucus I took the position that we should notify the country; that we should notify the Republican Senate, the President, and the Republicans of the House that before the adjournment of this Congress we intended to revise the steel schedule, the rubber schedule, and the sugar schedule. But Mr. UNDERWOOD and a large majority of the Democrats in caucus thought it unwise for us at that time to notify the Senate of our tariff program, because it might affect its action as to the beneficent measures which we had sent to it. I submitted to the will of the majority of the caucus. I now believe, in view of the action of the Senate on the woolen bill and on the free-list bill, that my judgment was wrong [applause on the Democratic side], and that the judgment of Mr. UNDERWOOD and a large majority of my colleagues of the caucus was right. [Applause and cheers on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will detain the House but a few minutes more. I want now to say a few words that are personal to myself. In the first place, that article charges that there is a difference and has been a difference between the Speaker of the House and myself with reference to the legislation that has been brought before the House. That statement is absolutely false. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We have been in accord from the beginning, we are in accord now, and I predict without hesitation we will be in accord at the end. [Renewed applause.]

As to my connection with the iron and steel business, I am a stockholder in the Woodward Iron Co., located near Birmingham, Ala. It produces nothing but pig iron. It makes no other commodity. My brother-in-law, who is the vice president and general manager of that company, stated to me a very short time ago that the company was making pig iron as cheap as or a little below $7.50 a ton, including all costs of every nature and description. In times past they have made pig iron as cheap as $6 a ton. That was some years ago when the labor costs were cheaper than they are now. I say, without expectation of contradiction, that the furnace company in which I am interested can make pig iron cheaper than it can be made anywhere in the world. [Applause on Democratic side.] Yet the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. Bryan, says that my personal interests are influencing my position on this question. He may say that if I am not personally interested it is my constituents that are influencing me. Mr. Speaker, when the free-list bill was presented to this House by the Democratic Party, I presented it. I sustained it in the caucus and I sustained it on the floor of this House, and what did it do? One of the greatest industries in my district is the manufacture of cotton gins. The free-list bill placed cotton gins on the free list. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The greatest industrial plant in my entire district is built for the manufacture of wire. The free-list bill placed wire on the free list. Adjacent to the county in which I live, having its offices in my home town is a manufactory of cotton ties. The manufacturer protested to me against any reduction in the rates. I did not believe that they needed the protective tariff. I brought in the bill that was passed by the Senate yesterday placing cotton ties on the free list [applause on the Democratic side], and when that bill came before this House, when a great industrial corporation in my district shut down its plant to coerce me into voting against that bill and I refused to be coerced, this same gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. Bryan, sent the telegram that I hold in my hand, which was handed me by Mr. JAMES on the day it was sent, and which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

McKENZIE, TENN., April 23.

Hon. OLLIE JAMES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Convey my congratulations to UNDERWOOD. Action of Steel Trust gives him great opportunity. Good time to investigate and to pass law punishing suspension of business when made to canvass Congress; also to punish corporation officials where they attempt to influence employees during campaigns. You are doing great work.

W. J. BRYAN.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. Bryan, did not think I was "protectionizing" the Democratic Party when I brought in the free-list bill, when I entered upon the program that the Democrats of that committee outlined. Not until I differed with him on the woolen schedule did he have one word of criticism, so far as my conduct was concerned. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I have not a sheep in my district. There are few in Alabama; there is not a woolen mill in Alabama that I know of. I had to write a woolen schedule that would protect the revenues of this Government, and because I did so and did not obey the command of the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. Bryan [cries of "Good! Good!"], he is endeavoring to try and make the country believe that I am not an honest Democrat in favor of an honest revenue tariff. What have we done? A number of years ago Mr. Bryan was a member of the Ways and Means Committee of this House. He joined with his committee in passing a bill in reference to the woolen schedule that put an average tax of 47.84 per cent on the American people. We brought into this House and passed a bill putting an average tax in our bill of 42.55 per cent, 5 per cent lower than the tax that the gentleman from Nebraska stood for himself. Is that "protectionizing" the Democratic Party? In that same Wilson bill the gentleman from Nebraska stood and advocated a tax of 43.76 per cent on an average on the cotton schedule, a tax that was so high that when our Republican friends on the other side of the aisle came to pass the Dingley law they did not increase it materially, but left the Dingley law and the Wilson law upon about the same basis of taxation in that respect.

Yet when we reported the cotton bill to this House—and mark you I have cotton mills in my district and many cotton mills in my State—we reported a bill to this House fixing the tax on cotton goods on the average of 27.6 [applause on the Democratic side], reducing the tax to nearly half of what the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. Bryan, stood for. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And yet he says that as the leader on this side of the House I am trying to lead the Democratic Party into the ranks of protection.

My friends, I would not have occupied your time, I would not have occupied the time of the country in this statement, but we are entitled to have the truth [applause on the Democratic side], the whole truth, and nothing but the truth [applause on the Democratic side] placed before the American people. It has been done; you know the facts. The facts now stand in the RECORD. The statements I have made have been sustained by the members of my committee. I leave to the country to say whether I am more in favor of honest tariff revision than the gentleman from Nebraska or not. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I only have this word to say. The statement issued by the gentleman from Nebraska is false. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It has been proven false here to-day. I hope that the gentleman from Nebraska made the statement by being misinformed by other persons, and that the responsibility for the falseness of the statement does not rest upon the shoulders of the gentleman from Nebraska; but if that is so, then I say, Mr. Speaker, it is due to the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. Bryan, it is due to myself, it is due to this great Democratic Party that sits here to-day that Mr. Bryan should come out in the open, give his informant, investigate the facts, and when he finds the statement is false, brand it as it ought to be branded before the American people. [Loud and continued applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, while the entertainment is going on I move that the House dispense with the proceedings under the rule providing for Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House dispense with the proceedings under Calendar Wednesday.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the proceedings under Calendar Wednesday were dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 4413. An act to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles.

COTTON SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12812) to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12812) to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton, with Mr. CULLOP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12812) to reduce the duty on manufactures of cotton, and the Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12812) to reduce the duty on manufactures of cotton.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT].

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, in the press of the country on last Sunday there was a statement, said to have come from one W. C. Barnes, of the Forestry Service, and incidentally connected with the President's Tariff Commission, making the statement that the profit per head on sheep in the arid country of the Great Basin amounted to $1.81 per annum. This statement, to the best of my knowledge and belief, and I have a familiarity with the conditions and the business, is entirely erroneous, and lest, in the consideration of the woolen schedule in this House, these figures alleged to have come from this expert should be taken seriously, I wish herewith to submit tables of cost relating to wool and mutton in the arid country, and request that these remarks be extended and these tables be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has that permission under the order.

The statement is as follows:

[From the Washington (D. C.) Herald.]

TARIFF BOARD AGENT SEES PROFIT IN SHEEP—W. C. BARNES SAYS THEY CAN BE RAISED TO PAY $1.81 PER HEAD.

OGDEN, UTAH, July 29.

W. C. Barnes, representing President Taft and the Tariff Board, in checking up the information gathered by special agents of the Government on wool and sheep industries, arrived in Ogden this morning after visiting four of the largest sheep States of the West.

His figures follow.

Cost a head to raise sheep, all expenses incident to grazing, herding, shearing, dipping, lambing, freight on wool and mutton, interest on money invested, etc., $1.50.

WOOL WORTH 91 CENTS.

Average clip of wool per head, 7 pounds, at an average of 13 cents per pound delivered, 91 cents.

Average price of lambs, $3; average increase being figured at about 80 per cent, placed on market, $2.40.

Total receipts, $3.31.

Total net receipts per head, $1.81.

Mr. Barnes says that there may be slight variation by States in the cost of raising sheep and in marketable value as to the wool clip, lambs, and mutton, but that the figures show the average in the territory over which he has traveled. He suggested that the cost of raising sheep might be reduced considerably by better business methods.

A STATEMENT OF THE COSTS AND RETURNS FROM SHEEP IN NEVADA—AUGUST 1, 1911.

The recent statement in the press, said to emanate from Mr. W. C. Barnes, connected with the Forest Service, and alluded to as one making investigations in behalf of the Tariff Commission, places an estimate of the profits per head of sheep in the Great Basin at $1.81 per annum.

This statement is obviously erroneous, inasmuch as it considers the increase from a flock of sheep at 80 per cent.

It is well known that the increase from a band of breeding ewes is considered a good average if it amounts to 80 per cent. I have taken 75 per cent after weaning. A typical flock must contain, in addition to breeding ewes, lambs, yearlings, 2-year-old wethers, and bucks at the ratio of about 1 to 50 ewes. Needless to say, these animals are not all producing lambs. Flocks consisting solely of breeding ewes and bucks, together with the lambs raised to an age for slaughter, are much more profitable than mixed flocks, but at the same time some one must be raising other grades of sheep less profitable else there would be no ewes to reproduce the species. This is the first fallacy in the so-called Barnes statement. The second fallacy is in the selling prices of mutton sheep and cull ewes.

Now, to consider what we may properly call an average case, we should take as a unit the smallest number of sheep that can be economically handled. Experience would lead me to believe that such a unit is found in the flock of 5,000, the census being taken after shearing and before lambing. The heavier losses of winter will then have reduced the flock to the lowest point.

Hauling wool, sacks, marketing, etc	200.00
Grass rent in forest reserve	350.00
Grub, at 45 cents per man per day	675.00
Renewing bucks, 15 per year, at $10	150.00
	6,471.00

TABLE 4.

Cost of running typical flock of 5,000 sheep, minimum, without allowance for interest or management or office expense	$6,471.00
Interest at 6 per cent on $26,600	1,596.00
Management and office	1,200.00
	9,267.00
Output	8,832.50
Loss	434.50
Profit, ignoring interest and cost of management	2,361.50

TABLE 5.

Minimum cost with interest, per head per year	$1.61
Minimum cost with management expense at $1,200	1.85
Output per head	1.76
Output in mutton	.856
Output in wool	.91
Loss per head	.087
Loss on 7 pounds wool, at 13 cents, at present mutton price, per head	.09 to .10
Cost of wool, per pound	.145

These estimates do not provide for any wages for superintendence, to the owner, or for any office expenses. While the calculation for loss is adequate to meet ordinary years, it does not cover the extreme cases where upwards of 70 per cent of the sheep have been lost.

A study of the table of expenses will show the enormous proportion of expense that goes to labor, which, of course, includes the grub furnished the men. Anyone familiar with the business must realize that both expenses and losses are extravagantly high under existing conditions, and necessarily so, on account of the land laws now on the statute books. No provision is made by law for fencing the range under lease. The result is, as shown by careful investigation, that the range is steadily being depleted, sheep have to go farther for feed, more labor is thereby entailed, and less reproduction of animals as well as less wool. Experiments with fencing in the forest reserves have definitely proven that in the arid country the same conditions exist as in other places where sheep are allowed to pasture rather than to be herded. First, there is great saving of destruction of grazing, as sheep do not naturally eat the forage close unless forced to do so; that they rest better, gain more weight, produce more wool, and breed better than when continually close herded and driven. Moreover, the uncertainties of obtaining feed and the lack of established rights to grazing grounds cause invasion of the grazing lands before the grass is sufficiently mature either to be of value as forage or to stand the grief of being trampled. By fencing the great danger of attack by carnivorous animals, especially coyotes, may be largely eliminated, and the labor of herding, together with the expense of supplying herders, is reduced almost a third. Under existing conditions, as shown by careful examination reported in a Senate document, the range is being destroyed. In my opinion, the cost of producing wool in the arid regions will be reduced at least 25 per cent through saving of labor cost and prevention of losses and the forage greatly benefited by the enactment of a law to segregate lands not fit for settlement and to permit the leasing of such lands for a period of from 10 to 20 years, with the right to fence.

The most economical unit, as has been suggested, is that of 5,000 head, where the owner may do part of the work in addition to superintending. There is no question but what the average Portuguese herder is entirely correct in his attitude that he does not propose to be shot or beaten up while drawing $45 a month, and the losses on the range from feuds are a serious economic proposition.

A telegram just received since the compilation of these figures, from an experienced stockman in Nevada, places the losses in average years to run from 5 to 10 per cent, and the cost of running sheep from $1.50 to $2.25. The output figures are based on prices received this year for wool and on present market prices of stock to be sold for mutton. These tables are submitted for information.

Anyone believing either in tariff for revenue, with its inevitable incidental protection, or in protection, or in a gradual attempt to do away with both, should see the unfairness of a plea for protected manufactures when coupled with a howl for free raw materials. It makes no difference whether the protection comes avowedly or under a revenue tariff.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS].

Mr. HINDS. Mr. Chairman, those of us who have heretofore stood, and propose to continue to stand, by the economic principle of a reasonable protection for all producers, whether in the factory or the mine, on the farm or on the sea, may not reasonably quarrel with other Members who likewise propose to stand by the principles professed by them when they sought election by the people.

This, however, does not preclude us from the inquiry as to the reasonableness of the principles of action proposed by the majority party in this House, or the judiciousness or injudiciousness with which those principles are being applied to the existing economic adjustment of the Nation.

RADICAL NATURE OF THE PENDING BILL.

The particular bill before us deals with one of the greatest of American industries. Two millions of people may be said to depend on it directly for a livelihood, and its indirect relations with the industrial life of the Nation are very widely extended. It is true that more than one-half of those directly employed and directly interested in the cotton manufactures are living in New England, that the remainder live in the Carolinas and neighboring Southern States, and that the great mass of the American people know the industry only as they use its marvelous product. Yet no American, however far he may live from the seat of this industry, may contemplate with indifference a proposition to deal recklessly or unjustly with it. No plea that the American people have given a mandate to the Democratic majority in this Hall can excuse either haste or injustice in dealing with any industry. The American people never have and never will give deliberately a mandate of injustice or recklessness. Yet to-day those who claim to speak for them have brought out of the precincts of the Ways and Means mysteries, a more revolutionary regulation than has been proposed for the cotton industry by any responsible statesmen, Democratic or Republican, since the foundation of the Government. Sixty-five years ago the school of statesmen who contemplated the economic destiny of America to be the raising of cotton by slave labor for exchange into manufactured goods in free-trade markets gave to manufactures of cotton a duty of 25 per cent ad valorem, a rate of duty reached in this bill only on the finest grades, for which it is entirely inadequate.

NO CAREFUL INQUIRY IN FRAMING THE BILL.

No person whose livelihood or fortune may be imperiled by a disaster to the industry has been permitted to be heard; none of the careful, scientific inquiry that modern statesmanship in other lands has called in to safeguard the process of making tariffs has been attempted or awaited. Those who are responsible for this bill could not have spent even one short half hour inspecting in yonder library those large and illuminating volumes in which the scholars of England set forth the conditions of her industry as the indispensable preliminary of radical tariff changes. Had they done so, I am convinced that even the onward rush of their great majority could not have carried them to the lengths of this extraordinary bill.

Had they examined that recent report of the British Board of Trade, which may be obtained in the document room of this House, they would have learned from its illuminating pages the great salient fact that the wages of the laborers of the United States are as 230 to 100 when compared with the wages of the British workingman, while the comparative excess of the American cost of living is only as 138 to 100. Before that great fact, how could any body of men have proceeded, behind closed doors, to evolve out of their own inner consciousness so revolutionary a modification of basic conditions?

The criticism that some of the most thoughtful of the American people have brought against our tariff legislation is that it has proceeded without adequate inquiry as to the conditions and needs of the industries with which it has proposed to deal, and that it has given to some of those industries advantages inconsistent with the interests of the remainder of the American people. Even the long-continued, free, and full hearings on the schedules of the present Payne law were condemned as not sufficient for enlightened tariff legislation; and in the last compaign the people were excited against the Republican party for its supposed lack of information before it proceeded to tariff revision.

WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE'S SOURCES OF INFORMATION.

Were it not for the frankness of the chairman of Ways and Means, we should be utterly ignorant as to the sources from which that great committee received its light in framing this bill. He has told us that, so far as the wisdom of mortal man is concerned, the 14 nonpartisan Democratic members were permitted to commune with a gentleman from New York who is the master of many figures relating to the industry. But, so far as the industry itself is concerned, it may be said of him, as was said of the lilies of the field, that he toils not, neither does he spin. [Applause on the Republican side.]

We are given to understand, however, that the pathway of the feet of the 14 Members was principally lighted by the effulgence of the principle that a tariff should be laid solely for the production of revenue, and that all theories as to the protection of American industry should be rigidly excluded.

On this theory are to rest the actions of the Democratic Party in readjusting the economic conditions of 90,000,000 people, for we know that cotton is only one of many industries to be treated. For 50 years we have proceeded on the idea that our tariffs should be so framed as to encourage home production instead of foreign production, to help the home laborer instead of the foreign laborer, to build up the American community instead of the foreign community. To-day we are invited to throw that idea aside and to move the economics of the Nation over to another theory—the theory that home production, home labor, home communities, may take care of themselves, and that the statesmanship of America, as expressed by the Democratic majority in this House, has no further concern in a tariff bill than to get revenue for the Government.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DIXON of Indiana). Will the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS] yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON]?

Mr. HINDS. If the gentleman will excuse me, I have a line of argument that I would like to carry through. After I have completed it, if I have gone beyond what seems to be the reasonable limit of truth, I will be glad to give such satisfaction as I am able.

For one, I confess to have felt a great curiosity as to this theory that has during this session been dominating the processes of the House, with the ruthlessness of youth and the wariness of age; that is so all-sufficient in itself that it dispenses not only with the scientific inquiry approved by the example of modern nations but discards all inquiry of any kind, except such as can be made by 14 Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee, administering questions in a locked room to a gentleman from New York City.

WHAT OF THE THEORY OF TARIFF FOR REVENUE ONLY?

What is the theory of tariff for revenue only—this theory of no protection for anyone, unless some may fall accidentally on an innocent bystander during the process of getting revenue? [Applause on the Republican side.] It is a theory put forward in its most dignified form by Robert J. Walker, Secretary of the Treasury, in 1846. In that old United States, where cotton was the king of commerce and slavery was the mistress of statesmanship, it was accepted, until a great business panic and a portentious social upheaval ushered in the Republican Party, Abraham Lincoln, Civil War, emancipation of slaves, the protective tariff. [Applause on the Republican side.] The theory of Robert J. Walker—tariff for revenue only—escaped from the general confusion to hide itself for 50 years in neglected corners of Democratic platforms.

It is this venerable refugee, this emigre of the old régime, that the gentleman from Alabama, chairman of the Ways and Means, is leading back that it may pass its hands over the industries of a twentieth-century nation.

No thoughtful man will say that communities or governments may not profitably return at times to old theories and policies. It may be that the doctrines of Robert J. Walker will be as grateful to the great, free, rich, busy, and populous United States of 1910 as they were to the antique economics of 1846. That is what we must examine.

THE GREAT PRESUMPTIONS AGAINST FREE TRADE.

Let us first examine the great presumptions. I know that presumptions are not conclusive; but in the affairs of men certain presumptions are given great weight. The record of an upright life creates a presumption of innocence that only the strongest evidence can overturn. Our free institutions rest largely on the presumption that in the long run a majority is right. How, then, does the theory of Robert J. Walker stand as to the great presumptions?

In 1846 the sentiment of the civilized world was tending toward free trade. Richard Cobden, in England, was leading his enthusiastic followers toward the goal which they were to reach a few years later. In Germany there was the same movement to free trade. And nowhere was there a more brilliant leader of this movement than Robert J. Walker. Speaking before the electors of Manchester on January 15, 1846, Richard Cobden held up the pamphlet copy of the Walker report and said:

I have never read a better digest of the arguments in favor of free trade than that put forth by Mr. Secretary Walker.

And on the 9th of June, 1911, on the floor of this House, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee exhibited again that famous report, and, voicing the creed of the Democratic caucus, said:

It should always guide Democrats in the preparation of tariff laws.

One might almost think that the enthusiastic prophecy of Secretary Walker had, after 65 years, come true:

Let us with revenue duties only open our ports to all the world, and nation after nation will follow our example.

But the nations have not followed. Germany saw that free trade would paralyze her manufactures, destroy her agriculture, and drive to the wall those small farmers who to-day own and cultivate three-quarters of her agricultural surface and whose numbers have increased under a system of protection for all. France, Austria, the Scandinavian States, all Europe, have coincided with the conclusions of the brave and studious statesmen of Germany. The principle of protection as applied to tariffs rules from the land of the Norseman to the isles of Greece. One nation alone stands out. England, with less unanimity than ever before, still practices the principles of free trade. Her great colonies, Canada in the lead, have discarded her example. All her brilliant economists, from Adam Smith to Stuart Mill and Thorold Rogers, have not been able to keep these splendid ornaments of the Empire within the economic admonitions of the mother. Alone, England stands for free trade.

What is the presumption? Evidently there must be some reason that differentiates her from other nations. The reason is plain. Only 12 per cent of her people are engaged in agriculture, against 35 per cent in the United States and Germany and 40 per cent in France. Like no other nation, England has shriveled her agriculture to conquer the markets of the world for her manufactures. She can live only by exchanging her manufactures for food. Thirty days of blockade would starve her people and destroy her empire. The United States, with its happy balance between agriculture and manufactures, as established in 50 years of the Republican doctrine of protection, could stand 30 years of blockade. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And yet the Democratic majority of this House propose to lay heavy hands on this delicate economic adjustment, with no more investigation than arises from the putting of questions to a gentleman from New York City shut up in a room. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Where, then, are the great presumptions? Are they in favor of the theory of Robert J. Walker, or are they in favor of the protective theories of Hamilton, Clay, Blaine, Reed, McKinley, and Dingley? Manifestly the sentiment of the world is against the theories of Robert J. Walker.

REASON FOR GENERAL REJECTION OF THE REVENUE-TARIFF THEORY.

If all the nations of the world but one have turned against the theory to which the Ways and Means Committee proposes to subject our industrial life, there must be a reason for it.

That reason is found in the economic development of modern times—in the use of machinery and the cheapening of transportation.

SIGNIFICANCE OF TRANSPORTATION COST.

The significance of transportation cost on the tariff problems of a nation is not given the attention it should receive in our usual discussions. In 1844 in the House of Commons Richard Cobden, arguing for the removal of the corn duties, called attention to the fact that it cost 30 cents a bushel to bring wheat from the German port of Dantzig to England, and he commented on this as a "natural protection," which legislation could not remove. In those days "natural protection" was understood. The long glories of Pittsburg, with its pillar of cloud by day and its pillar of fire by night, began under that natural protection. The free-trade memorial of 1831, drawn by the hand of Albert Gallatin, minor prophet who went before Robert J. Walker, recognized this fully:

The iron works of west Pennsylvania were, and still continue to be, protected against foreign iron and that made within 100 miles of the seashore by the expense of transportation, which is still $40 a ton.

Gallatin computed the natural protection of ocean freight, insurance, and so forth, on imported articles at from 10 to 20 per cent ad valorem, and conditions were substantially the same when Walker wrote his report.

This "natural protection" was understood by all the free traders of the era of Robert J. Walker. Cobden understood it, and his faith in its advantages was not misplaced, for the price of wheat did not essentially fall on the repeal of the corn laws. It is a surprising fact, vouched for in the statistics of the British tariff commission, that the price of wheat in England did not begin to fall until the advent of cheap ocean transportation and the American self-binding reaper in the years from 1876 to 1884.

The theories of Robert J. Walker which we are invited to apply to the highly developed condition of the United States to-day were then predicated upon a condition of "natural protection," which does not exist now.

GREAT CHANGES IN TRANSPORTATION COST.

Are we fully alive to the great changes that culminated in the decade of the eighties? A British scientist and statesman, Sir Lyon Playfair, speaking before the National Liberal Club in 1888, said:

Every ton of coal now carries thirty-two times more cargo than it did a few years since. In the best compound locomotives 2 ounces of coal will move a ton of cargo a mile, and half that quantity will move in our best steamers a ton of cargo and its proportion of the ship for 2 miles. Take an instance of the effect of this on commerce. A sack of flour can be moved from Minneapolis in the United States down to the seaboard 1,400 miles away, be sent by steamer to Liverpool, at a total cost for transport of less than 9 pence (18 cents) upon the bushel of wheat. The British workingman, when he buys a 4-pound quartern loaf made of American flour, may reflect with astonishment that it has been brought four or five thousand miles at a cost for transit of one-half penny (1 cent).

In the days of Robert J. Walker it was found by Richard Cobden that the 800 miles' ocean transport from Dantzig to England was 30 cents for a bushel of wheat, and this did not include the other great cost from the wheat fields to the wharves of Dantzig.

The profound change since those days, destroying the "natural protection," was thus commented on by Sir Lyon Playfair:

The whole system of markets has been altered; to a great extent local markets have been destroyed, for the world itself has become the one market for all nations.

CONDITIONS IN THE DAYS OF ROBERT J. WALKER.

Have we measured what this world market signifies to us as compared with conditions in the days of Robert J. Walker? In 1846 the railroads were just beginning. The Pennsylvania had not reached Pittsburg; the Baltimore & Ohio was only at Cumberland, Md. Only in the North, where one might go from Portland, Me., to Buffalo, N. Y., by continuous rail route, and in the South, from Richmond through the Carolinas, could there be said to be effective railroad development. The great bulk of the transportation of the United States was by draft animals. In the world of 1846 carts and horses did nearly all the transportation by land, as from the days of antiquity. Sir Lyon Playfair estimated that if the railways of England were annihilated it would require 75,000,000 men and 12,000,000 horses to carry on the traffic. It is a fair estimate that it would require 150,000,000 men and 25,000,000 horses to carry on the present transportation of the United States under the conditions of Robert J. Walker's time.

And yet in a tariff question, where transportation is a vital condition, it is thought to be perfectly safe to bring the tariff-for-revenue principles of Robert J. Walker out of 50 years of retirement and apply them without hearing or scientific inquiry to the business of twentieth-century United States.

CHEAPNESS OF OCEAN TRANSPORT.

If land transportation has been revolutionized since 1846, ocean transportation has also experienced marvelous changes. In 1850, four years after Robert J. Walker enunciated his theory of tariff for revenue, the fine steamer Persia carried a cargo across the Atlantic at an expenditure of 14,500 pounds of coal to a ton of freight. Thirty years ago, when the great fall of ocean freight rates took place, a cube of coal that could pass through a ring the size of a quarter of a dollar would drive a ton of cargo 2 miles. To say that the improvements in ocean transportation, supplemented by the electric telegraph, have made the world one-half smaller, so far as the economics of tariffs are concerned, is to make a conservative estimate.

In the recent coronation of the English King, which the British boast was the greatest world spectacle since the days of Trajan or Aurelian, the venerable jurist and philosopher, Frederick Harrison, viewed the wonderful procession of the Empire and for the columns of the London Times contrasted it with the coronation procession of Queen Victoria, which he had also seen as a boy in 1838.

In 1838—

He writes—

the idea of bringing Indian troopers, cavalry from Canada, Australia, New Zealand, would have seemed absurd. To bring soldiers from the Punjab or from Australia would have cost a million and required a year for the double journey.

I wish there might be some man, famous enough as jurist and philosopher and venerable enough in years, to have secured admission within the locked doors of that Ways and Means room, and there to have convinced the 14 Democrats and the free-trade gentleman from New York that the United States and the world have changed since 1846. [Applause on the Republican side.]

EFFECT OF THE PANAMA CANAL.

One great change is coming within the next five years, the opening of the Panama Canal. [Applause on the Republican side.] That will, in an economic sense, move the teeming Orient up to the very doorway of the Western World. And in that sense Yokohama and Hongkong will be nearer to New York than Pittsburg was to Philadelphia in the days of Robert J. Walker. Our consular reports show that the people of the Orient are awake to this, even if we in this Hall are not awake. In an age when Asia is equipping her cheap but efficient labor with machinery it becomes us to examine approaching conditions with the greatest care, in order that the flood of great advantages which we expect from the canal may not disarrange our economic conditions to the distress and misery of many people in this generation.

LOW PRICES AND FAIR PRICES.

The free-trader will of course attack at this point, and, bringing up the brilliant argument of Bastiat, will say that from a protectionist standpoint it would be better that the canal had not been dug and that the horse and cart had not been superseded as the means of transportation. If the economic destiny of a nation of people were the mere acquisition of cheap commodities, if the first consideration for a people be that they shall purchase at a low price instead of a fair price, if the people of a nation could without suffering and loss seek new occupations continually as revolutions in transportation occur and abnormal surpluses of goods are dumped into their markets, there could be no answer to the argument of Bastiat. If the cotton spinners of Japan or China, working with the latest improved machinery and at 10 or 20 cents a day, can send cotton cloth through the Panama Canal in a subsidized Japanese steamer and land it at New York at less per yard than it can be made for in Biddeford, Lowell, or Atlanta, there is a great gain if the theory of a tariff for revenue only is correct. But there is a great loss if American cotton spinners are thereby forced to lower their standard of living to the Asiatic standard. [Applause on the Republican side.]

THE MODERN PHENOMENON OF SURPLUSES.

Under modern facilities of transportation, in the great world market an inconvenient surplus of commodities anywhere communicates the consequent disarrangements everywhere. And at the same time the possibilities of such inconvenient surpluses have been vastly increased. There was a time, and not so many years ago, when the labor of the United States could secure only the bare necessities for the mass of the people. Other nations were in the same condition. Cobden prophesied that the repeal of the corn laws would not disastrously reduce the price of wheat, because there was no great store of wheat among the nations. And the issue proved that Cobden was right. In the days of Cobden and Robert J. Walker the people of all the nations lived from hand to mouth. Wheat was reaped with the sickle, as in the days of the patriarchs, and a good reaper could do a quarter of an acre in a day. Everyone here has often read that beautiful picture of the barley field of Boaz and the labors of Ruth, the blooming maiden of 5,000 years ago. He has read of the little store of barley she carried home to her mother-in-law, Naomi, at the end of the day's labor, and he may have reflected that as labor was then and as it was in the days of Robert J. Walker no laborer in a barley field could garner a much larger store than he could carry home with him at night. In all the years from Boaz to Robert J. Walker no nation could dump an inordinate quantity of wheat upon another. So the repeal of the corn laws did not, as Cobden had foreseen, lower essentially the price of wheat in England. It was only in the decade of 1880 that the price of wheat took its great fall in the world's markets. Wonderful machinery had been invented, so that a fair-haired Ruth in North Dakota, driving a team of horses and a self-binding harvester, might reap in a day 20 acres of barley. And if she should appear before her mother with her modest gleanings, as Ruth of old appeared before Naomi, she would take to the maternal presence 300 bushels of barley. [Applause on the Republican side.]

What has happened in the production of wheat has happened in all other productions. England can clothe herself with cotton cloth and still have four times as much more to sell. Free trade was one thing then, in 1846, when markets were segregated and production limited. It is another thing to-day, when one nation has an enormous surplus of one article and the next nation as large a surplus of another, both ready to dump into the one great world market under conditions of cheap transportation. The great surpluses of commodities overwhelm the fragile enterprises of individuals as the bursting of a reservoir makes a stored-up blessing an agency of destruction. The ruin of individuals, the blighting of their hopes and aspirations, is what makes economic disarrangements terrible. The shutting down of a large cotton mill is like a great flood or a great fire in its results on human interests. And in our highly specialized modern society the refugees do not easily find comfort. It is for this reason that we plead for full inquiry, for scientific investigation, before the hand of power is raised against any industry.

THE MODERN OBJECTIVE OF GOOD GOVERNMENT.

We believe that the great economic objective of a modern nation should be so to adjust its policy as to encourage the proper distribution of wealth. Man no longer lives so close to starvation as he did. Machinery has so increased the power of his arm that he may reasonably feel that there will be enough of commodities for his support if he can only get his share. And the greatest assistance to that proper division is a fair price for both labor and commodities. For that the Republican Party has stood. And when only the other day the British board of trade investigators found that our wages, as compared to England's, were as 230 to 100, while our cost of living, as compared to England's, was as 138 to 100, I felt that the old Republican idea of a higher standard of living, a greater opportunity, and a broader outlook for all the people was something more than an idle theory.

THE PRODUCING PEOPLE AND THE NATIONAL INTEREST.

The Republican Party has always been careful not to sacrifice the producer, because it has realized that in a democratic nation, where there are no permanent and privileged class of the idle, the great mass of the people are producing, and that with their prosperity comes the prosperity of all. The Democratic Party has in times past struck at that class of producers who are most vulnerable to foreign competition, only to find that the misfortune of one class is the misfortune of all. It is not proven that the producing people get the high prices that make living dear. The cotton-cloth producers say—and what they say ought to be investigated before we smash the industry:

The recent agitation and prejudice that exists against the textile schedules is largely due to misapprehension on the part of the public. It is popularly supposed that the mills receive by far the larger part of the retail price for the goods that enter into an article of clothing or other use. There never was a greater mistake. The fact is, there are few textiles that reach the consumer without the addition of approximately 75 per cent to the price paid to the mills.

To-day the Democratic Party is again striking at the producing people, excusing their action on the plea that the efficiency of American labor is so high that it can compete with the confessedly lower paid labor of Europe. The Ways and Means Committee have made no careful examination on this point; they have waited for no Tariff Board report, but, fortified by the tales of returned travelers, they are marching on to lower duties than Robert J. Walker dreamed of in the days when there was a natural protection of from 10 to 20 per cent ad valorem.

THE EFFICIENCY OF LABOR AS RELATED TO MACHINERY.

I believe in the efficiency of American labor; but when there is a question of competition, I think of the old soldier who had fought the Indians. "A white man," he said, "can equal the Indian in warfare if he will live as the Indian lives."

The superiority of one nation over another as to efficiency is within general limits likely to be a matter of temporary organization and leadership. I once saw a picture of the capitulation of Louis Napoleon after Sedan. With humiliation and abasement written on their countenances, the French Emperor and his staff appeared in the presence of the proud and victorious soldiers of Germany. But out of a portrait on the wall a face looked down on that scene—the stern and classic face of the Great Napoleon, he who had given law to Germany from the palaces of her kings. What moral was intended by that picture I do not know, but it seemed to teach that manhood, valor, and efficiency are not the monopoly of any nation.

I notice that those who speak of the efficiency of labor as a counterpoise to lower wages of competitors are quite apt to compare the man in this country equipped with the machine with a man in another country not equipped with a machine, or poorly equipped. There is no doubt of the superior efficiency of the machine-equipped laborer. England, shielded by her insular position from the ravages of the continental wars, got a start of 50 years in machinery equipment, and that start was worth to her the markets of the world.

In 1824 Henry Clay, coming down from the Speaker's chair, told this House how Asia, in consequence of the density of her population and the lowness of her wages, had dominated the markets of Europe with many of her fabrics. But England equipped herself with machinery that gave to her 21,000,000 of people the potentiality of 200,000,000, turned the tide of commerce, and took the markets of Asia.

Twenty years later England still had the lead in machinery equipment, and Robert J. Walker, believing it to be our destiny to be an agricultural nation solely, was not inclined to disturb her. Forty years after Robert J. Walker, England still led in machinery equipment, and Sir Lyon Playfair, speaking in 1888, explained the higher wages of England as compared with the Continent of Europe by superior efficiency of labor, caused by the fact that the use of steam machinery in England was 117 per cent greater than on the Continent. The present magnificent equipment of Germany was then a development of the future.

THE AGE OF GENERAL EQUIPMENT WITH MACHINERY.

Twenty-five years more have rolled by, and as we review that period the one conspicuous economic development has been the general movement in all the nations, great and small, to equip their laborers with machinery. Every consular report tells it; every journal proclaims it; even the report of the Ways and Means Committee on this bill unconsciously proves it when it shows the great increases of spindles in the cotton mills of Japan, China, India, Brazil, and the uttermost parts of the earth. In the first six months of this year English firms sold $17,000,000 worth of textile machinery for this world equipment. England finds her peculiar advantages slipping away, especially as in many lines she has not kept her machinery up to the times. The machine-equipped laborers of Germany are able to improve their own wages while they press their wares in England's markets. American shoe machinery sold abroad is raising up competitors for us all over the world at the very moment when the Democratic Party is proceeding to take all tariff off shoes.

MODERN DEVELOPMENT AND OLD THEORY.

With these developments in that great world market, where all people have been made constructive neighbors by low transportation, we are to-day proposing to return to the political theories that prevailed when the oxcart was a conspicuous feature of our economic system. We are taking this great backward move on the strength of the lucubrations of 14 men locked up with a free-trade gentleman from the city of New York. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Can not gentlemen on the Democratic side of this House see how, with all the diversity of life on this globe, diversity of habits, tastes, burdens, wants, and conditions, the moving up of all humanity into one field of effort and one market will tear down our high standard of living and work unending friction and hardships unless by wise laws we equalize conditions? I speak of the world as it is. And our doctrine of just protection for all must last as long as these inequalities exist. When they cease, those who shall succeed us on this side may meet the successors of gentlemen on the other side, and together they may realize the dream of theorists and humanitarians—free trade for the world. But it may be that day will come only when human selfishness shall have melted, when contention shall have ceased in this Hall, when "the wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them." [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HARRISON of New York having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PENROSE, Mr. CULLOM, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. BAILEY, and Mr. SIMMONS as the said conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE COTTON SCHEDULE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I have been requested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to assume control of the time on this side temporarily. I will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] if he is in control of the time on his side?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman desire to occupy some of it now?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON].

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Mr. Chairman, the provisions of the pending bill reduce the rate of tariff duties on cotton goods from 50 per cent, as fixed by the present law, to an average of 25 per cent, and on account of this large reduction I shall vote for it. If the bill had proposed a greater reduction I would more gladly vote for it, and if it had put all cotton goods and all other products on the free list my support of it would be still more cordial.

The power of taxation was surrendered by the people to the Government solely to enable it to collect the revenues necessary to defray the public expenses, and not to enable the Government to distribute the wealth of the country among the people, or to transfer by the taxing power any part of the wealth produced by one citizen, class, or section to another citizen, class, or section, and therefore, in my judgment, a tariff levied on foreign goods when the same kind of goods is produced at home is, even when the rate is 1 per cent, not only unfair and unjust, but is positively dishonest, unconstitutional, and since it is collected by the force of legislative power it falls within the definition of legal robbery. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Entertaining this view of a protective tariff, I support the pending bill only because it is in the nature of a repeal, in part, of the existing law and largely removes an intolerable injustice and wrong.

In supporting the bill I do not propose to discuss the reasons which impel me to vote for it. I fully realize that the long-continued practice of this iniquitous system of taxation has so dulled and deadened the moral perceptions with which it is viewed that it is now futile to discuss the question whether a tax which the citizen is forced to pay, not into the Treasury of the Government, but into the pockets of the Republican pets, is right or wrong, just or unjust, honest or dishonest; for all the moral qualities of the law were long since buried in the grave of Republican partisanship, and the only question now open for practical argument is whether the tariff is a financial benefit or injury? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Much learning and great ability have been displayed in the discussion of this subject on both sides of the aisle, and if any feature of the tariff has escaped the thorough investigation and exhaustive research which has made the debate at this session so brilliant, it is the subject which I propose to make the basis of my remarks, and which is the economic effect of the tariff on the protected cotton mill. While Democratic orators have described with accuracy the evil effects of protection on the consumer, the laborer, and the country in general, yet little, if anything, has been said to show how its operation affects the protected industry, and there has seemed to be silent acquiesence in the claim that the tariff benefits the factory. On the other hand, the Republicans have asserted over and over again that the removal or reduction of the tariff duties would ruin the protected industry and would compel our manufacturers to locate in other lands and our people to buy their goods from foreigners.

These assertions are founded in the false assumption that nothing can be profitably produced in our country, and that being naturally unprofitable, every American industry must depend for its existence upon the exercise of the taxing power in its favor, and the issue formed between this position and the proposition in the bill to reduce the tariff on cotton goods is whether such reduction will destroy or even injure the cotton-mill industry.

If, as alleged by Republicans, this reduction will put the cotton mills of America out of business, then the people of the South and of my own State will be by far the greatest sufferers. We have in the South 550 cotton mills, more than half of all the cotton mills in America. In these mills is invested capital to the amount of $288,000,000, and the laborers who operate them number many thousands. This is the capital and labor whose interests are involved in this reduction. But this is not all. A million farmers are engaged in the South in the production of cotton, and the price of that great staple is wholly dependent on the success and prosperity of the cotton mills. These factories in which cotton is manufactured into cloth and other articles of use are the only real purchasers of cotton, and the competition among them fixes the demand and controls the price. If the capacity of all the cotton mills of the world is greater than the annual crop, then the demand exceeds the supply and the price of cotton goes up, but if all the cotton mills of the world can not consume all the cotton produced, then there is a surplus for which there is no demand and the price is depressed. The reason why cotton is now selling at such a high price is that the annual supply is 2,000,000 bales less than the capacity of the mills. With this view of the relation of cotton mills to the price of the great product of the southern farmer, I believe that any injury which a reduction of the tariff on cotton goods would bring to the cotton mills would be shared by the southern cotton farmer.

And I may be pardoned for referring to the fact that about one-third of all I possess, which is not much except to me, is invested in cotton-mill stock, and therefore when I vote for the reduction proposed by the bill, it will be a vote to injure the great cotton industry of the South, the cotton farmers, who compose 80 per cent of the people of my district, and my own private interests, if the reduction causes any injury. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The economic effect of the tariff system upon the cotton mills is therefore a matter of deep concern to me and my people and is the subject which I desire to discuss.

According to my understanding of the so-called protection, its effect upon the cotton-mill industry is entirely harmful, and it is wholly responsible for the deplorable condition in which we find the manufacturer of cotton goods to-day. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

To me it seems self-evident that the success of a cotton mill depends upon the cost of producing the cotton cloth and the price at which it sells. The difference between the cost of production and the selling price is the profit of the mill. If the mill can produce a yard of cloth at a cost of 5 cents and sell it for 10 cents, its profit is, of course, 5 cents. Whatever lowers the cost of production or increases the selling price benefits the industry, and whatever increases the cost of production or lowers the price injures it.

And I affirm, in the first place, that the tariff injures the cotton mills because it increases the cost of production. It does this in two ways.

First, it at least doubles the amount of capital necessary to produce a given amount of cloth. In the construction of a cotton factory the amount of capital required is twice as great as it would be if we had no tariff. On every foot of lumber and every brick that goes into the building of the factory there is wrapped in the price of it an enormous tariff tax. Every pane of glass embraces in its price the amount of the tariff tax. Every rubber band conceals in its value the amount of this iniquitous tax. Every piece of machinery has an artificial value legislated into it by the tariff law. The tools with which the laborers build it are all highly taxed, and the food, clothing, and shelter of every man engaged in the construction increase its cost on account of the tariff. If the owner of the factory has bought his materials from foreigners, he pays these taxes into the Treasury of the Government and adds them to the cost of construction. If he buys them in the home market he pays the same tax in the price of the materials to the domestic producer, and in both cases his outlay of capital is largely increased by the legislation which injects an artificial value into every constituent of his mill.

The enhanced cost of a cotton mill fixed upon it by the tariff is the burden of its existence, and constitutes the chief obstacle to its success. If the cotton mill, without the innumerable tariff taxes embraced in the cost of its construction, could be built for $200,000, then its success depends upon selling its product for enough to defray the expenses of its operation and a reasonable interest upon the sum invested, but when the tariff increases the cost from $200,000 to $400,000, then its success depends upon the sale of its product for a sum twice as great.

If the sale of its product is a sum sufficient to pay 8 per cent on a cost of $200,000, the same sum would, of course, pay only 4 per cent on a cost of $400,000. This artificial cost of the mill becomes in the outset the sum on which the owner must struggle to earn his profits, and the artificial part of it continues to burden the industry throughout its existence. The factory to be successful must earn a profit on all the tariff taxes embraced in the cost of its construction in periods of depression as well as in times of prosperity, and this unnatural burden, fastened upon the mill in its very infancy, which protection hypocritically professes to love, must be borne through all the vicissitudes and difficulties of its life.

But this obstacle is only the beginning of the difficulties which the protective tariff makes it necessary for the cotton mill to overcome in order to achieve success. A large part of the cost of the operation of a mill is the purchase of coal, oil, fuel, chemicals, dyes, and other mill supplies, and on all of these it must not only pay the real value, but the tariff tax of 40 to 50 per cent of its value. If the mill buys a bill of these supplies worth $1,000 the tariff forces it to pay $1,500, and this great burden is a daily expenditure, adding, of course, to the cost of production. But the success of every cotton mill depends upon the almost constant replacement of its machinery with new and better inventions. It can not compete with other mills unless it has the latest improvements in spindles, looms, and all other machinery. It is compelled to consign vast quantities of machinery to the scrap pile long before it is worn out, and every time it buys new machinery to take the place of the old, this ever-present tariff is there compelling the expenditure of twice as much money as would otherwise be necessary. In 1905 the total capital of American mills, invested in lands, buildings, machinery, and so forth, was in round numbers, $605,000,000, and of this sum the machinery amounted to $245,000,000, or nearly one-half.

The average life of cotton-mill machinery on account of breakage, wear and tear, and the necessity of replacement with the latest improvements is, I believe, about 10 years, and therefore the reinvestment of this vast amount of capital is a matter of periodical repetition. It follows, therefore, that with every renewal of the machinery in whose prices are wrapped up the enormous taxes of the tariff there is a constantly increasing addition to the original outlay of capital, and an artificial cost to the cotton mill for which there is no corresponding actual value in its property. To escape failure it must struggle to sell its product for prices that will bear an income on this mythical artificial value, which the tariff has injected into the construction and operation of the plant. These expenditures on account of the tariff ever increases the cost of every yard of cloth, and makes it impossible for the mill to compete with other factories which are not burdened by such hostile legislation.

How much the tariff laws add to the requirements of capital, and the consequent increase in the cost of cotton cloth, no imagination can picture, and no bookkeeper or expert can figure out with accuracy, but the best and highest evidence on this point is found in the testimony of Republican protectionists, who are undoubtedly the most learned and skillful experts in all the iniquities of the tariff. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The first of these witnesses I call is David A. Wells, the special commissioner of the revenue from 1865 to 1870, a Republican and a protectionist. He spent four years in the investigation of the industrial conditions of the country, including every phase of the public revenues, the cost, failures, and success of manufactures, the relation of taxation to the development of factories, and the comparison of the effects of free trade and protection upon the prosperity of the country. His annual reports to the Secretary of the Treasury embodies the results of a personal examination in every manufacturing center of this country, and in many parts of Europe, and displays a wealth of learning, an accurate statement of economic truth, and a number of irresistible conclusions sufficient to destroy the Republican Party, if the American people knew all that these reports contain. [Applause on the Democratic side.] On the point under discussion, after portraying the folly of taxing the life out of manufactures, he says on page 53 of his report of January, 1869:

> But vicious as this system is upon its face, its effect, especially in a national point of view, can not be realized until we take into consideration the fact that the capital required in the United States to build a cotton mill is about double the amount required for a similar purpose in Great Britain.

Here is the conclusion of a Republican protectionist who had spent four years in the investigation of the subject, and, notwithstanding his protection prejudices, the facts forced him to the conclusion that this tariff system instead of fostering and benefiting the factory, required it to expend twice as much capital as an English cotton mill is required to spend under their laws. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

How much the multiplication and increase of tariff taxes into every constituent of our cotton mills has added to the cost I again permit Republican protectionists to tell. On page 4541 of Tariff Hearings before the Ways and Means Committee of the Sixty-first Congress I find this testimony given by Mr. Ross, from the very center of cotton manufacturing in Massachusetts:

> Mr. POU. Senator, are you acquainted with the price of cotton-mill machinery abroad as compared with the price in this country?
> Mr. ROSS. I am not, sir. I understand our mills have cost about three or four times more than they do in England. Of course lots of our machinery is English make.
> Mr. POU. Your understanding is that it cost, did you say, three or four times as much?
> Mr. ROSS. Yes; three or four times as much.
> Mr. POU. To build a mill in America as it would to build the same mill in England?
> Mr. ROSS. Yes, sir; that is my understanding.

That is the testimony of a Republican witness who was before the Ways and Means Committee in order to tell the committee how much it should tax the American people to enrich him and his kind. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Again, on page 4596 of the same hearings, Mr. William L. Waring and many others, in their brief to the committee, made this statement:

> The cost of equipment of an American hosiery mill is double that of a German hosiery mill.

If this policy of levying enormous taxes on everything that goes into the construction and operation of the cotton mill and thereby doubling, tripling, and quadrupling the capital necessary to produce a given amount of cotton cloth is good for the industry, and if it fosters and builds up the cotton mills, as Republicans allege, then the policy of a great many State governments, which exempt the factories from all State, county, and city taxes, is a mistake. In Mississippi there are constitutional and statutory provisions exempting for a period of years factories from all kinds of taxes, and these laws are based on the idea that the exemption from taxation will lessen the cost of production and thereby encourage, foster, and build up the industry. But this is a great mistake, if the Republican contention that to burden with intolerable taxes everything that the cotton mill buys is the way to build it up and that to remove these burdens of taxation will ruin the business. But if the way to help an infant industry, if the way to foster it and build it up and put it upon its feet, is to levy such enormous taxes that you double and treble and quadruple the capital necessary for it to acquire, then this policy of the States is all wrong, and they ought to join the Federal Government in burdening the factories with every sort of taxation that they can devise. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And if the policy of protection which doubles and quadruples the amount of capital required to manufacture cotton cloth fosters and benefits the business, then the statesmen of Great Britain are utterly mistaken, because they pursue the opposite course. They not only do not compel the cotton mills in their construction, maintenance, and operation to pay any sort of tax to the pets and favorites of the Government, as we do, but, like many of the American State governments, Great Britain does not require them to aid but a little in the support of the Government.

A small tax is levied on the rental value of the buildings of the mill, but all the capital, machinery, and so forth, are exempted from taxation. The laws of Great Britain are such that in 1869, after eight years of Republican protection, it required in England just half as much capital, according to Mr. Wells, and in 1909, after 49 years of Republican protection, just one-third or one-fourth as much capital to erect, maintain, and operate a cotton mill as in the United States. The laws of Great Britain are such that the cost of producing cotton cloth is so much less than the costs in our country that we can not compete with her in any other market of the world. The result of the two policies is that Great Britain manufactures the cotton goods with which her own people are supplied and exports and sells in the markets of the world nearly a half billion dollars worth of cotton goods, while we, with all the advantages in our favor, with the free raw material at the doors of our mills, with superior machinery, with the superior genius of our manufacturers, with the much greater productive capacity of our laborers, manage to export and sell in foreign markets the pitiful sum of $33,000,000, or about one-fifteenth as much as Great Britain. The probative force of these facts must convince any fair mind which is not afflicted with the insane delusion that a government can tax prosperity into the people and foster an industry by increasing the cost of production.

And if anyone thinks that the conditions in England and the United States are so different that the comparison is unfair, then I ask them to compare our exports under free trade and protection. In 1860, the end of our free-trade period, our cotton-goods exports were more than twice as great as they were in 1875, after 15 years of protection, and were greater than they were in 1890, after 30 years of protection, and in 1910 our exports of cotton goods were $19,546,936 less than they were in 1906. This is true because the hostile hand of the Government has been laid with crushing effect upon the industry, and so increased the cost of production that our cotton mills are rapidly being driven out of every foreign market.

The effect of the artificial or legislative increase of the cost of production upon a cotton mill finds a striking illustration in Daily Consular Reports of November 10, 1908, which the Ways and Means Committee incorporated in its hearings on page 4597. In this report the consul general at Calcutta, Mr. William H. Michael, states that from 1902 to 1907 the exports of cotton goods from Japan to India increased from thirty-six thousand to more than a million, showing that Japan can import her cotton from India and America, manufacture it into cotton goods, and crush out competition among the cotton mills of the country where the cotton is grown, and the reason given is the effective economy in the equipment of the Japanese cotton mill, which costs one-fourth as much as that of the Indian mill. On this account a large mill at Bombay was compelled to close its business and confess its inability to compete with Japanese prices. If American statesmen do not possess as much intelligence a those of England and Japan they should not be criticized on that account, for no one should be blamed because he has not as much sense as other people; but when English and Japanese statesmen have pointed out the way of success and we behold the results of their superior intelligence, the want of common sense is a very poor excuse for repudiating their example.

SECOND—THE INCREASED COST OF LABOR TO THE COTTON MILLS.

The second way in which the tariff increases the cost of production is that it compels the cotton mill to spend a great deal more for its labor than would otherwise be necessary. It not only, as I have shown, requires twice as much capital, but it also necessitates a large increase in the cost of labor. It must be manifest to one who thinks that the minimum of wages which every cotton mill must pay its laborers is the sum of money necessary to purchase sufficient food, clothing, and shelter to maintain the laborers in strength and health.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I would ask unanimous consent that his time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. That can not be done, as the time is under the control of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama has notified me that he has no more time, and I will ask the privilege of extending my remarks in the RECORD. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If the money wages received will not purchase this subsistence, then physical weakness and incapacity to do the work will follow. Now, when the tariff system fastens upon all that the laborer eats and wears, upon all his kitchen, table, and household goods, and the very shelter in which he lays down his weary body to sleep, an enormous tax which doubles the cost of living, it becomes a necessity to the existence of the cotton mill that it should pay in wages twice as much money as it would be necessary to pay if the tariff had not doubled the cost of living. In other words, if without any tariff the subsistence of a laborer for a week cost $10, then that is the minimum of wages which the mill must pay; but if by taxing everything the laborer uses the cost of his subsistence for a week is increased to $20, then the cost of his labor to the mill has been doubled.

It is also manifest that this increased cost of labor to the cotton mill does not mean that the laborer receives any increase in his real wages, though his money wages may become much larger; but whether he receives the minimum of wages, which is a bare subsistence, or something over and above, it is plain that the burden of the cotton mill increases in proportion as the taxes on all he uses increases the cost of his living. The failure to distinguish between the money wages and the real wages, between the cost of labor to the mill and the real compensation which the laborer receives for his services, grows out of the confusion of confounding the number of dollars paid to the laborer, which is the mere medium of exchanging his labor for his subsistence, for his real wages, which is the living purchasable with the money he receives. That the wages of laborers may be greatly increased in dollars and yet the real wages, on account of the higher cost of living, may at the same time be reduced, becomes apparent by comparison of American wages at different periods of our country. The money wages of American laborers in 1867, under the necessities of the first seven years of protection and increased cost of living, was about 33 per cent higher than in 1860, when the cost of subsistence was not artificially increased to any great extent by the tariff, but the real wages of laborers were much lower in 1867 than in 1860. This fact is clearly demonstrated by the learned and able report of David A. Wells, under date of January, 1869, to the Secretary of the Treasury; and here I wish to incorporate in my remarks the result of his researches as it appears on pages 16 and 17:

Table showing the average weekly expenditure of families of varying numbers in the manufacturing towns of the United States for the years 1860 and 1867.

Size of families.	Average weekly wages—		Average weekly expenditures—		Surplus in 1860.
	In 1867.	In 1860.	In 1867.	In 1860.
Parents and 1 child	$17.00	$12.17	$17.00	$9.96	$2.21
Three adults	17.52	12.00	17.52	10.31	1.69
Parents and 2 children	18.75	11.50	18.75	10.79	.71
Parents and 3 children	19.50	12.41	19.50	11.33	1.08
Parents and 4 children	23.33	14.15	23.33	13.18	.97
Parents and 5 children	17.11	10.37	17.11	9.46	.91
Parents and 6 children	13.50	9.50	13.50	7.67	1.83
Parents and 7 children	25.00	15.17	25.00	14.09	1.08
General average of the above	18.96	12.16	18.96	10.85	1.31

In constructing the above table it has been assumed for purposes of comparison (and so expressed in the third column of the table) that the total average weekly wages obtained in 1867, viz: $18.96 were entirely expended, and in the following proportions: $14.29 for provisions, rent, fuel, and so forth, and the balance, $4.67, for clothing, domestic dry goods, housekeeping articles, luxuries, and so forth. Now the same quantities and qualities of provisions, groceries, clothing, rent, fuel, and housekeeping articles could have been obtained in 1860 and 1861 for the respective sums indicated in the fourth column, showing an average weekly cost of $10.85 in 1860, as compared with $18.96 in 1867; and leaving a balance in the former years of $1.31 (gold) per week in favor of the operative, as against no accruing surplus whatever in 1867–8; or, in other words, supposing the requirements for food, clothing, and shelter to have been the same in 1867 as in 1860, the operatives referred to in the table, who received in 1867 an average of $18.96 per week, obtained in that year only sufficient to give them the actual necessities and comforts of life; while the same men, whose average weekly wages in 1860–1 were only $12.16, obtained with such earnings at that time the same articles of comfort or necessity, and had in addition a surplus of $1.31 (gold) per week, or $68.12 (gold) per annum.

As has already been stated, it has been assumed in this comparison that the wages received by the operatives in question during the year 1867 were wholly consumed in their living. To a very considerable extent it has been found that this assumption is justified by facts, but if, in view of the constant increase of deposits in savings banks and other evidences of accumulation, it should appear that a margin on an average has been saved, the figures presented show with equal certainty that on the same scale of living, the margin in 1860 must have exceeded that of 1867 in the proportions indicated. The fact, therefore, is established by incontrovertible evidence that the condition of working men and women in a majority of the manufacturing towns of the United States is not as good at the present time as it was previous to the war, notwithstanding that their wages are greater, measured in gold, in 1867–68 than they were in 1860–61.

Here is the demonstration made by a learned expert, a Republican and a protectionist, that while seven years of protection forced the manufacturers to increase the money wages of laborers from $12.16 in 1860 to $18.96 in 1867, yet that its increase of the cost of living was such that the real wages of the laborer were reduced to the extent of $1.31 per week, or $68.12 per annum. If, in addition to the fact that while protection increases the cost of labor to the manufacturer, it reduces the real wages of the laborers, we add the consideration that the productive capacity of the American laborer is so much greater than that of any other in the world, it becomes apparent that he is the poorest-paid laborer on earth. In 1900, 546,000 English cotton-mill operatives produced cotton goods to the amount of $472,000,000, or $864 to each laborer, while at the same time 661,451 American cotton-mill operatives produced cotton goods to the amount of $931,494,566, or $1,408 per laborer. In other words, the American laborer produced $544 more per annum than the English laborer, and therefore if the American cotton-mill operatives were paid according to what they produce there would be not only a great increase in his money wages but also in his real wages.

The fact, as I have shown from Republican testimony, that he is not so paid is not because the American manufacturer is not as liberal and considerate of his employees as foreigners, but it is because, after he has paid the enormous taxes which Republican legislation has forced into the price of all he buys, there is not enough left to pay dividends and full compensation to the American laborer. To exculpate the American manufacturer from the charge of dealing unfairly with his laborers it becomes necessary to admit, what I have attempted to prove, that Republican legislation has placed upon the industry such intolerable burdens that it is impossible for the cotton-mill employer to do justice to his employees.

And this impossibility is the cause and origin of the strife between capital and labor. As is so well explained and emphasized in the learned and able speech of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS], the very object and aim of corporate existence is dividends for the stockholders, and to this all other considerations are subordinate. When out of the sale of the mill's product it has paid 80 per cent of the price of its product for material, its operating expenses, and highly taxed machinery and supplies, and the other 20 per cent of the price becomes necessary to purchase enormously taxed subsistence of its laborers, it is then reduced to the necessity of a surrender of dividends or a reduction of wages below the minimum limit of a bare subsistence, and the struggle between capital and labor is on. This struggle is the direct and inevitable result of the enormous taxes which have been levied by the protective tariff on all that the mill buys and on all that the laborers consume.

There are two methods for the settlement of the controversy. If the mill undertakes to settle the question by reserving enough of the 20 per cent to pay dividends and the laborers refuse to yield to the necessary reduction in wages, then the method of settlement is a lockout; but if the laborers demand a maintenance or increase of wages and the mill will not consent, then the method of settlement is a strike. And whether we have the lockout or the strike, the cessation of the production while it continues and the millions of dollars expended in its conduct measure the amount of the damage which protection inflicts upon the industry. As the accumulating and ever-increasing burdens of protection, both upon the capital and labor of the industry, have from year to year resulted in a more desperate struggle, the number and extent of strikes and lockouts have multiplied with frightful rapidity. In 1881 the number of strikes in which the laborers of the United States attempted to enforce the payment a second time of what their employers had already paid out in tariff taxes were only 471, but as the burdens of protection, both on capital and labor, became each year more intolerable, the number of strikes multiplied, until in 1905 there were 2,077, aggregating for the 24 years 36,757 strikes. The number of manufacturing establishments in which the strikes occurred was in 1881 only 2,928, but the number involved increased yearly until they exceeded 20,000 in one year and aggregated in 24 years 181,407. The number of strikers in 1881 was only 129,521, but they increased until one year saw more than half a million of men on strike, and the period of 24 years shows 8,703,824 who ceased to work and went on a strike because protection had made it impossible for the factories to pay them more and for them to purchase a subsistence at the prices fixed by the tariff.

While the laborers of the country were engaged in this gigantic effort to get enough wages to pay the protected prices of what they consume, the factories were not idle in their efforts to take from their laborers a larger share of the output in order to pay dividends, and so the lockouts, which in 1881 were only 6 in number and involved only 9 establishments and 655 employees, had increased in the year 1905 to 109 lockouts, involving 1,255 establishments and 80,748 employees thrown out of employment, and during the 24 years there were 1,546 lockouts, involving 18,547 establishments and 825,610 employees. These lockouts are the unintentional but eloquent protests of the protected industries against their own inability to pay dividends to the stockholders after the output of the factory has been exhausted in paying the protected prices of the subsistence of labor and the protected prices of the capital necessary to the business. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS] has described this condition when the corporation shuts down and closes its doors because it can not pay dividends as "waiting for better times to come," but he did not define those "better times" to mean when the sale of the output would be sufficient to pay the high tariff cost of the living of the laborers and the protected prices of all the factory buys.

What the cost of all these lockouts and strikes were, how much the production of wealth was reduced while all these mills were idle and all their laborers were unemployed, and what the magnitude of the damage to the cotton-mill industry was, it is impossible to describe and difficult to imagine. But when we remember that the British tariff commission estimates the cost of one strike at $27,000,000 in the loss of wages alone, when we remember that the great strike in the cotton mills of Fall River lasted, I believe, nearly a year, and when we remember that the expense of maintaining the multitude of labor unions, and the immense sums of money that these unions have to keep on hand in order to be ready for a strike, it becomes manifest that the cost of these lockouts and strikes extends into the hundreds of millions of dollars, and coming, as it does, out of the product of the industry, constitutes an intolerable burden which protection has entailed upon it.

The evil and injurious effect of the great increase in the cost of the capital and labor required in the cotton industry imposed by the tariff, and the inevitable disturbances incident to the levy of these enormous taxes and manifested in all these lockouts and strikes, will be made plain by a comparison of the industry during the period of free trade and that of protection.

Under the comparatively low tariffs in force up to 1860, tariffs, too, whose practical effects were nullified by the auction system, and other devices resorted to to overcome the evils of protection, the number of establishments for the manufacture of cotton goods increased to 1,094 in 1850, and was practically the same in 1860. In 1870, under the burden of 10 years of a protective tariff, these establishments had decreased in number to 956. In other words, 135 of these establishments had gone down in failure and disappeared from the records of the census in the first decade of a Republican tariff. In 1880 the number of these establishments had decreased in number from 956, in 1870, to 756 in 1880. In other words, during the second decade of a Republican tariff 200 more cotton mills, under the increased strain of doubling the cost of capital and labor, were buried in the graves of failure and bankruptcy. In other words, it only took a protective tariff 20 years to destroy 335 of the 1,094 cotton manufacturing establishments which free trade had built up in 30 years.

By 1880 the difficulty of manufacturing cotton cloth at a profit had become so great and so many mills had gone down in failure that some of the mills, to overcome the evils of protection, were removed to the South, where cheaper labor could be procured and where freights on the raw cotton could be saved, and in the meantime protection, having legislated the profits out of the culture of cotton, an immense amount of southern capital and labor was forced from cotton farming into the manufacture of cotton goods. The consequence was that southern cotton mills, which were very few in 1880, became in number 550 in 1905. With this great addition of southern cotton mills, the total number of these establishments in the United States in 1905 was 14 less than in 1860. And if we exclude the cotton mills of the South, then the 1,091 cotton mills existing, mostly in New England, in 1860 had been reduced, under the benign influence of protection, to 527. It is against this flagrant and criminal destruction of American industries that free trade enters her indignant protest, and while with the instinct of a mother she grieves and mourns and laments the death of her cruelly treated children, protection, mad with greed, has never once paused to cast a look of pity on the ruin he has wrought or to lay a flower of regret on the graves he has dug.

The great damage of the protective tariff in increasing the cost of production was clearly seen and forcibly pointed out in the reports of David A. Wells, a Republican protectionist, who, as I have said, spent four years, from 1865 to 1870, in the investigation of the subject, and on pages 108 to 114, inclusive, of his report of December 17, 1869, we find seven pages in which Mr. Wells, in order to relieve manufacturers from the burdens of protection, recommends the total removal of all duties on a vast number of articles and a radical reduction of the duties on many others. Mr. Wells and his assistants were the first tariff board the Republican Party ever had, and he is by far the best one they ever will have. He was wise enough to discover that the great increase in the cost of production which protection imposes upon manufactures renders success impossible, and he was brave enough to recommend the abolition and reduction of the tariff. He told the truth in his reports, and hence what he said was ignored and repudiated in the same way that the report of the present Tariff Board will be ignored and repudiated, if it should happen to discover and report the truth about the tariff.

THE EFFECT OF THE TARIFF ON THE PRICE OF COTTON GOODS.

Having shown that the tariff greatly increases the cost of production, then it must be an injury to the cotton mills, unless it enables them to sell their goods at such prices as to make the difference between the cost and the selling price the same or greater than it would be without the tariff. If the natural cost of producing a yard of cloth is 5 cents, and the tariff doubles the cost of the capital and labor so that the cost of the cloth is 10 cents a yard, then the mill is injured unless the selling price of the goods is also increased 5 cents per yard. In other words, the theory of protection, as it is called, is to increase the cost of production by levying enormous taxes on all that the cotton mills buy and on all that its operatives consume, and then, as a compensation to the overburdened mill, it proposes to rob the American farmer, laborer, professional, and other classes of the consuming public to the extent of making its profits as large or larger.

The Republican platform declares that the tariff should be high enough to cover the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad. It thus recognizes the existence of that very difference in the cost of production which I have discussed, and also recognizes it as an economic evil which legislation should overcome. But the Republican platform is very careful to conceal from the American people the cause of that increased cost of production. It nowhere states that the protective tariff itself is what has created this difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, which it proposes to counteract by enormous taxes upon the American people. Tariff creates a confessed evil and then seeks to counteract its effect by perpetrating a still greater outrage upon the people by increasing the prices of what they have to buy.

If the tariff system of taxation increases the cost of production, as I have shown, and as the Republican platform virtually admits, then the only sensible, logical deduction is that all the taxes on what the mills buy and on what its laborers consume should be abolished if the purpose is to foster and benefit the cotton mills; but, assuming for the sake of argument that it is equitable and just to impose these burdens upon the mills and then to tax the American people enough to compensate the mills for the wrongs heaped upon them, I ask how and to what extent does the tariff accomplish this purpose?

That the levy of duties upon imported goods does enable the mills to make profits at times, I admit; and that it does at other times, I deny. There are periods in the history of the industry when its profits, as the effect of the tariff, are enormous, and other periods when the mills have made no profits, but sustained losses. The tariff, with the folly of a glutton, sometimes gives the cotton mills more than they need, and at other times leaves them to starve. The process by which this is accomplished I wish to explain.

The prices of goods are at all times determined by the law of supply and demand. If the supply and demand are both increased and decreased in the same proportion, the price is not affected. If the supply is decreased and the demand is increased, the price is raised; and if the supply remains the same and the demand is decreased, the price is lessened. The tariff does not nullify or change this law, but its effects are produced by decreasing the supply and the demand.

When duties on foreign goods are levied so high as to prohibit in whole or part their importation, the consumer is limited in his purchases to the home market, and thus the supply, which had consisted of both the home and foreign market, is decreased, and the price of the goods is increased. If in this case the demand is equal to the supply of the domestic mills the increase of price will be equal to the full amount of the tariff, and will so remain as long as the demand equals the supply. And it is under these conditions that the tariff produces abnormal profits for the mills. As long as the economic demand for the goods is equal to or greater than the supply the mills can levy the full amount of the tribute fixed by the tariff upon the consumer. During such periods American manufacturers make a profit of 20 per cent, and in their tariff bulletin No. 2, presented to the Ways and Means Committee on June 6, 1911, they call these periods, on page 40, extra good years. This profit of 20 per cent means that much clear, after paying out of the prices paid by the consumer all the tariff taxes embraced in the prices of the machinery and supplies which the mill has bought, and of all the subsistence which the operatives have consumed. It is a profit of 20 per cent on the artificial capital of American cotton mills, amounting to $613,000,000, but as I have shown that the tariff doubles the cost of that capital, and that one-half of it is an artificial value legislated into the prices of it, it follows that the American consumer pays to the cotton mills in these extra good years prices sufficient to make their profits 40 per cent on the real value of their capital.

However, the total amount of their profits in these periods, whether we calculate it at 20 per cent on the tariff-fixed values of the capital, or 40 per cent on the real value, is, in round numbers, $122,000,000 annually, and here is the explanation of the great fortunes accumulated by the stockholders of protected industries. What these fortunes amount to I do not know. One of the witnesses before the Ways and Means Committee in 1909 testified that these fortunes were not large, but he explained that he did not consider a fortune large until it became three-quarters of a billion dollars. This testimony reminds me of the last will and testament of a great millionaire, who left the principal part of the estate to one son and a very insignificant portion to the youngest boy. This led some newspapers to exclaim, in pity: "Think of this poor fatherless boy wandering around the streets of New York with only $3,000,000 in the bank to his credit." But it does seem that these fortunes are so big that the stockholders of the protected industries can in automobiles traverse the highways of the land at a speed unknown before the days of protection; that they can rush through the billows of the sea in palatial yachts, and that they could even cleave the vaults of heaven in flying machines made of gold and studded with diamonds if the problem of perfect safety could be solved. These fortunes do seem to be so big that the wearied limbs of the millionaire can rest during the night and according to taste in a mansion on some silk-stocking street, or in a palace by the sea, or in the mountains, either at home or in foreign lands. They do seem to be so big that they can not be spent, and therefore many millions have to be spent in a benevolent effort to buy international peace, to establish a library in every town as a monument of gratitude to the protective tariff, and to secure the services of medical experts commissioned to discover and capture the invisible hookworm in every corner of our country.

To one who considers this period of excessive profits from an economic standpoint, from the standpoint of benefit to the cotton mills, it is impossible to perceive any good in it, for whether the dividends of the stockholder enables him to live in the palace or the hut, to spend his days in the peaceful enjoyment of the necessities and comforts of life, or in the worry and anxiety of devising schemes to get rid of his surplus millions, the hum of the loom and spindle, the industry and skill of the operative, and the product of the mill are just the same.

But, in addition to the splendid and luxurious life of the stockholder, we find from the records of the census that from 1860 to 1905, the period of high protection, the capital of American cotton mills increased, in round numbers, five hundred and seven millions, and, if Mr. Wells and other Republican witnesses are to be believed, the same lands, buildings, machinery, and supplies constituting this increase could have been purchased with half the money if it had not been for the protective tariff. If in 45 years a protective tariff has, as I have shown, doubled the amount of capital needed to enlarge and extend the manufacture of cotton, increasing it from $253,000,000 to $507,000,000, and has enabled the cotton mills to sell their goods for prices sufficient to acquire the whole amount of $507,000,000, then the protective tariff has not done the industry any good, unless you will assume that under free trade the cotton mills could not have sold their goods for sufficient prices to increase their capital to the amount of $253,000,000.

But if the tariff could give to the cotton mills the power to continue these excessive profits and make the period of high profits permanent, I would admit that it is a benefit to the industry; but the whole history of the business shows that these periods of prosperity do not continue under the burdens of protection. The difference between these periods of high profits and the periods of smaller profits, no profits, and losses, is so marked that the manufacturers themselves distinguish them by the title of "extra good years." When these high profits begin to disappear and are reduced to 15 per cent, then the title of the period loses the word "extra," and on page 40 of the bulletin already referred to the manufacturers call the period "good years," and when the profits are reduced to 10 per cent they call the period "fair years," and when the profits dwindle to 5 per cent they call it "poor years," and when the profits entirely disappear they call the period "extra poor years," and when the burdens of protection have substituted immense losses for profits, as it did from 1860 to 1880, and 335 cotton mills go down in bankruptcy and failure, then the manufacturers never breathe it to a human soul.

The industrial phenomena of high profits, no profits, and losses, which characterize the various periods of the cotton-mill business, are matters whose explanation will illustrate how the tariff affects the industry. These changing conditions can not result from any effect which the tariff has on the supply, for it precludes the purchaser from the foreign market and limits him to the home market in one period as well as in the others, and, therefore, they must result from its influence on the demand. When the supply remains the same the demand must be decreased in order to lower the prices of goods, and this is what the tariff does. The economic demand which affects prices is not only the desire and need for goods which can vary only with the increase or decrease of population, but also includes the ability to pay for them. The purchasing power of the people is the chief element of the demand for goods, and this the tariff continually reduces. The concentration of the wealth of the country in the hands of a few, which is the inevitable effect of the tariff, lessens every day the number of those who are able to pay for the goods they need and thereby decreases the economic demand for them.

The statement made on the floor of the House that one-half of all the people of the United States own no property may not be accurate but it is certainly true that millions of them are unable to pay for goods at present prices, and this fact, which is the result largely of the protective tariff, is what changes the period of high profits into a period of no profits and losses. This self-destructive process, by which the tariff abstracts the wealth of the country from those who produce it and concentrates it in the hands of a few millionaires is what causes the present deplorable condition of the American cotton mills. They can not sell their products at prices that will pay dividends because the tariff has doubled the cost of the production, and exhausted the purchasing power of the people, thus destroying the demand, and forcing the mills to run on short time, and to limit the production to the consumption of the wealthier classes of the people. This is the condition that confronts us to-day. The manufacturers themselves describe it as deplorable.

From much information and some personal knowledge, I state that the American cotton mills are making no profits, and many of them are sustaining heavy losses. This condition has continued for four years and it is growing worse. We are passing through a period far worse for the manufacturers of cotton than the first two decades of Republican tariff, and if the present destructive, criminal policy is not abandoned there will be more than 335 cotton mills go down in failure and bankruptcy. Many of them have already failed. A leading manufacturer of the South writes me that nine cotton mills in the State of Georgia have lately failed, and many others are in a failing condition. The continuance of the present policy means the destruction of every cotton mill which is financially weak, and the survival of those only which are rich enough to wait for better times to come. A protective tariff, whether high or low, can not save them. It can not decrease the cost of production, because it has the opposite effect. It can not increase the demand, because it constantly reduces the purchasing power of the people. The only salvation for cotton mills is absolute free trade.

If we could repeal every tariff which forces the cotton mills to pay twice as much for what it buys as the real value thereof; if we could repeal every tariff which forces the cotton mills to pay such wages as will enable the operatives to pay twice as much for their subsistence as it is worth and thereby lessen the cost of producing cotton cloth; if we could in some way gather up the $253,000,000 which the present tariff has forced the mills to pay for their present capital more than it was worth, the untold millions which has been paid for the subsistence of their operatives in excess of what it was worth, the billions which constitute the present fortunes of its stockholders, the vast sums which have been wasted in the lockouts and strikes brought about by the protective tariff, the huge losses to the production of wealth, while ten millions were wandering through the streets unemployed and hungry, the great values represented in the 335 mills which went down in 20 years under the burden of protection; if we could not only reduce one-half the cost of cotton-cloth production, but in some way gather up all this wealth and redistribute it among the people who produced it, every cotton mill in America would be able to run on full time, to pay its laborers living wages, and to sell its product at such prices as would produce fair profits.

The two great productive industries of the country are manufactures and agriculture. The men engaged in one are the consumers and purchasers of the products of the other, and therefore the prosperity of the one is dependent on the prosperity of the other. When, by legislative power, the wealth produced by one is abstracted and transferred to the other the economic equilibrium between the two is destroyed and both are injured. For many years the protective tariff has forced the farmer to pay enormous tax in the price of all he buys to the manufacturers. It has forced the American farmer to pay such prices for cotton goods that the manufacturer could pay enormous dividends on twice as much capital as was necessary and twice as much for the subsistence of the operatives as was necessary. The farmer has been compelled to pay such prices for his cotton goods as to create in the cotton-mill stockholders fortunes somewhat less than three-quarters of a billion dollars. The farmer has been compelled to pay such prices for his goods as to make up to the manufacturer the immense losses involved in all the lockouts and strikes which have marked the history of the protective system.

On the shoulders of the poor farmer has been placed the burden of replacing the great loss in the production of wealth while 10,000,000 laborers were unemployed and idle. The inevitable result of all this has been the legislation of profits out of agriculture and this result is manifest to anyone who knows anything about agriculture in the South. For five decades the southern cotton farmer has been accustomed to sell his cotton crops for sums which did not equal the artificially fixed prices of what he used in the production of his crop; and his losses have been represented in the mortgages on his home, by which he pledged the future earnings of his toil to enrich the favored pets of the Government. In the days when he could buy his supplies in the cheapest markets of the world, he prospered and continually bettered his condition. Up to 1860, when almost the entire capital and labor of the South was devoted to the culture of cotton, the section grew rich year by year, although the annual production did not exceed 3,000,000 bales, because the amount of its sales so far exceeded the cost of production as to leave handsome profits. Southern cotton farmers not only made many large fortunes, but even in the least fertile sections of the South could be seen the evidences of comfort and luxury. The southern planter was the synonym for financial standing and credit. His home was never invaded by hardships and want. His wife and daughters moved in a style which was the envy of those who lived in town.

But all this is changed now. The mention of a southern farmer now suggests to the mind the idea of debts and mortgages. He now produces four times as much as he did before the war, but his condition does not improve because the Government has legislated the profits out of his business. The production of 12,000,000 bales of cotton does not improve his condition, though the production of 3,000,000 bales made him rich. A common wagon drawn by mules has been substituted for the carriage and horses which once conveyed him to the house of religious worship. The cheapest cotton cloth now takes the place of the silks that once rustled on his wife and daughter. Her tender hands have been hardened by the touch of toil, but the beauty of her face has never faded, and the still greater beauty of her soul we worship with an idolatrous love.

The farmer has been oppressed. He has been impoverished. He has been robbed. And our iniquitous system of taxation has promised that this would make cotton mills and other protected industries prosper. The result of this criminal folly, tested for a half century, is that all the manufacturers tell us that the cotton mills are in a deplorable condition. Many of them have failed and hundreds more will fail. This is the poor, pitful, senseless excuse for the ruin of agriculture.

But, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, if it will not be regarded as presumption, I would like to make one short appeal to the Republican side of the House. I know full well that my weak logic can never shake the convictions of a lifetime. No argument of mine can ever change the well-fixed delusions that the Government can tax prosperity into the people, and by taking the wealth of one to give to another make them all richer. I have within the framework of my mind no intellectual battleships with which to assault and take the Gibraltar of your bias and prejudice against the South. The unkind feelings which have so often found expression in the debates of this session toward my people preclude any appeal to either your reason or the sympathies of your hearts.

But even when human minds are so separated by the clouds of ill will and the dark fogs of prejudice that neither the sunlight of reason nor the softer moonlight of human sympathy can penetrate through the gloom from one to the other, there is a power divine whose influence knows no limit. It is the still, small voice whose musical echo is always sweet to the human soul. Charles Dickens says that in the music of the wild waves can be heard the voice of the Great Creator, which speaks to the heart alone; and it was one of your own great poets—I do not venture to say our—once wrote:

> To him who in the love of Nature holds
> Communion with her visible forms, she speaks
> A various language.

It is the divine voice coming from the lips of nature upon which I depend for my appeal. Go with me in thought to the cotton farm. As we pass the humble unpainted home, you will find the doors closed and the windows down. There is no laughter or prattle of children in the yard, and the footfalls of the mother do not break the silence within. Passing on down to the cotton field you will see the farmer with his cotton sack swung to his shoulder, bending over the row. By his side works the ever-faithful wife, under whose sunbonnet you will see a face whose charm no adversity can destroy. And still next there is a blue-eyed rose-lipped girl whose tender fingers with the beauty of a flower and the grace of a queen gather that wonderful fiber in which the human race is clad. And all through that cotton field among the bending limbs and green leaves of the cotton stalk you will see a great multitude of cotton blossoms as white and spotless as your own snowflakes on the way from heaven. These are the tongues of nature, and they murmur with a mute but more than mortal eloquence how the manhood, the womanhood, and even the sweet childhood of the South is consecrated to the service of humanity.

And go with me again next day and you will find these same white blossoms have changed to red. They are about to fall. They are now the bleeding tongues of nature, and they mutter its last dying declaration that the lifeblood of the great cotton industry of the South is being shed to satiate the thirst of protected greed.

If argument has lost its power, if logic is no longer potent, if human sympathy and pity are forever dead, still listen to the sweet voice of truth as it finds its expression divine in the living and the dying flowers of the cotton field.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chiarman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS].

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, before taking up the matters to which I especially wish to refer I would like to call attention to two or three statements which have been made by speakers on the other side during the debate of yesterday and to-day. First,

I will call the attention of those present to an example of the careless statement which is frequently made in general debate by speakers when they deal in generalities rather than in facts. The gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. WITHERSPOON], as he was closing his remarks, stated that owing to certain conditions which he had been describing our cotton-manufacturing industry was rapidly losing its foreign markets. This statement would indicate that the gentleman had not even taken the trouble to examine census reports or the statements issued by the Bureau of Statistics. If he had done so, he would have found that our exports of cotton goods in the past year were the largest in our history, with the exception of two years, and this notwithstanding the comparative depression in all industries—certainly a complete and conclusive answer to his statement.

I wish also to call attention to some of the statements made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] during his discussion of this subject yesterday. He called our attention to some very well-known facts. First, that this is an age for developing scientific management, and with much that he said along those lines I am fully in accord. We have not kept pace with some European countries, especially Germany, in this respect, and we must continue to develop scientific management if we are going to increase our manufacturing industries at the same rate we have been in the past. With the conclusions which the gentleman from New York drew from this statement, however, I am not in accord.

I am not quite sure whether he contended that labor in this country is more efficient or less efficient than that abroad. He gave instances which would sustain both contentions. My opinion is that, generally speaking, labor in this country is more efficient than it is abroad, but in some industries, like the woolen industry, where generation after generation has been employed in it, there has been developed a deftness and aptness which can not be found elsewhere, so that the labor connected with that industry, especially in England, is perhaps more efficient than in this country.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] also complains that we have not developed our textile machinery, and especially the machinery connected with the woolen or worsted industry, and implies that the tariff is responsible for this. I think he will agree with me that the cotton machinery produced in this country is as efficient as the cotton machinery built anywhere in the world; that the machinery which is used in our woolen mills, as woolen mills are differentiated from worsted mills, is also made in this country, and is equally efficient, but that the machinery used in our worsted mills very largely comes from the other side.

I do not agree with him in his conclusion as to the reason for this condition. The tariff, in my opinion, has nothing to do with it. The reason is that the worsted industry in this country is comparatively new. It is not more than 15 years old—practically speaking, not more than 10 years old. The people who first took up the worsted industry in this country came from the other side, Englishmen and Frenchmen largely, who were wedded to the machinery with which they had been brought up, with which they were familiar, and which they believed was better than any other; therefore, naturally they brought foreign machinery here and installed it in the factories which they built and put in operation. We are rapidly developing the worsted industry in this country, and, as a result, the manufacture of worsted machinery. We are now making good looms, perhaps as efficient as those which come from abroad. We are making practically as good cards as can be bought abroad, but I am informed that our spinning machinery up to this time has not been equal to the spinning machinery which we could purchase on the other side. In my opinion, that part of the industry is coming rapidly; the Lowell Machine Co. is probably turning out to-day spinning machinery which is as efficient, if not better, than that obtainable elsewhere. [Applause on the Republican side.]

In fact, one of the main reasons why we have succeeded so marvelously in our manufacturing industries in this country is because we have, through the operation of our patent laws and the protective tariff, developed machinery far beyond the capacity of that which has been developed by our friends on the other side, and we are getting more efficiency from labor because labor is connected with the machinery in such a way that it produces better results than labor in Europe. Therefore I do not agree with the gentlemen to whom I have been referring, either as to the relative efficiency of our textile manufactures or to the reasons therefor in cases where our machinery is less effective than that made abroad.

Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] also calls to our attention the well-known fact that we exported more manufactured goods last year than ever before, and he draws from that the conclusion that we do not need protection. That our exports are increasing is true, and it is one of the results of our system in which a Republican takes great pride. We have always contended that if we could build up our industries in this country so that they might be run at their full capacity, we not only could supply our own needs, but we could supply the needs of the world; and the authors of the Payne-Aldrich bill must find great satisfaction in the fact that as a result of that legislation our export trade has reached a point beyond anything known before. I certainly believe that this is the direct result of the protective policy.

Now, what are the elements which enter into a manufacturing industry? I refer to this question because the gentleman from New York discussed it as being evidence why cotton manufacturers or managers in this country were not able to compete more effectively in the world's cotton-goods trade, contending that they were not up to date and they did not know their costs. There are four elements which go to make up a manufacturing industry—one is the stockholder; another is the management; another is labor; another is the efficiency of the mill and its equipment. With all of these things every management has to deal. The stockholder wants suitable returns on his investment. Generally speaking, the management of the mill is not a controlling stockholder and in many cases not a large stockholder. The continuance of the management or any particular manager depends on the returns which he is able to make. The result of inefficiency is that when the manager wishes to extend his operations he can not raise the capital to do it. If he is efficient, is producing dividends for his stockholders, and he wishes to extend his plant, he can always get capital to do it. Therefore it is of prime importance to every management to be efficient, to install the most efficient machinery, to have the most efficient labor which the market affords, and to pay the high price he must pay in order to get that labor. To charge that those who are directing the cotton industry are not doing this is simply charging a degree of inefficiency which must mean a short business life.

And I further want to call to the attention of the gentleman from New York, because I understand he is familiar with matters relating to manufacturing, this fact—and this applies to what I have said about the results of the protective policy—that mills in small localities, where labor is not easily obtained, are to-day not the mills that are paying large returns on the investment, unless there is some particular or peculiar quality relating to that locality or their product. The mills that are making the larger returns are in the big centers, where labor is easily obtained, and where labor is skilled to such a degree that it receives high wages. The largest wages paid to any employee in any manufacturing industry are in those centers where the industry is developed to a high degree both in labor and efficiency. And I call especially to the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], who referred to the wages paid by New England factories yesterday, that the wages in the cotton mills of New England are the largest per capita paid in any cotton-manufacturing center in the world, and the hours of labor are shorter in New England than in any other part of the world. Further, I believe, that in Massachusetts they are shorter than in any other place in this country. And this is especially true of the limitations placed on the hours of employment of women and children.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Is it not true that in the last few years the New England States have been put on a 56-hour basis?

Mr. WEEKS. Most of the New England States are on that basis, and Massachusetts has just passed a law putting women and children on a 54-hour basis.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. In the figures which I gave yesterday it is shown that Massachusetts does not pay the highest wages in the cotton manufacturing industry in New England, but that New Hampshire does.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I am referring to New England as a whole when I refer to the highest wages, and ask the gentleman from New York to turn to the wage scale published in the report which he has signed as to the pay of labor for different periods in this country and the wages paid to labor in Great Britain, also published in that report, page 488. If he does this, he will find that the wages paid in Great Britain are not 60 per cent as high as those paid in this country.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, in response to that I will say I gave yesterday figures bearing on the wages paid to operatives in the cotton mills in Maine, as compared to those of Great Britain. Those in Great Britain were higher than those in the State of Maine.

Mr. WEEKS. I will put in the RECORD the figures, which I will take from the report signed by the gentleman himself and which will show that the wage paid in Great Britain is not over 60 per cent of the wage paid in this country, and that the wage paid in New England is higher than in any other section of this country, at least 60 per cent higher than in the southern section, which is the other great cotton manufacturing section in the United States.

I also want to call to the attention of those present what the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee stated the other day as to labor not receiving its proper recompense because the per cent which is paid to labor in the cotton manufacturing business is lower than it was 5, 10, 15, or 20 years ago. This per cent is lower, and it is lower in every other industry, than in former years. I know of industries where the per cent of labor cost in manufacturing is not more than one-third what it was 20 years ago, and I have no doubt the gentleman from New York can recall similar instances. The cost, by using labor-saving devices, has been reduced to such an extent that it has no relation to the wage paid to the individual laborer. I am surprised that the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee should advance an argument that the ratio of proportional cost of labor in manufacturing has anything to do with the rate which is paid to the individual laborer.

Now, I wish to particularly address myself to two questions——

Mr. REDFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. REDFIELD. I simply want to express my pleasure at so fair, so courteous, and so accurate a statement of facts presented from the other side of the House. I would be glad at another time to discuss further the inferences to be drawn from the facts upon which we largely agree, and I call especial attention, in the industry of which the gentleman has spoken, to a case which I mentioned briefly, I think, yesterday, where the introduction of a different type of machine reduced the labor cost instantly by 90 per cent, or from $1.15 a cut to 15 cents a cut—a very striking example of how the labor cost is varied and can not be predicated as the basis for anything.

Mr. WEEKS. I doubt, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from New York and I would agree as to the inferences to be drawn from the general statement which I have made as to which we do agree pretty generally. But, in my judgment, no more definite and conclusive argument has been made in favor of a protective tariff than the statement made by the gentleman that we made last year the largest exportation of manufactured goods in our history. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman knows, just as does every other man who knows anything about this question, that when you run a mill at full capacity the cost is reduced, so that we are able to enter the markets of the world. On the other hand, when a mill is run at a lower proportion of its capacity, we can not either get into the markets of other people or continue to hold our own market, for the good reason that the relative cost of production is increased. If we can run our industries at their full capacity, we can hold our own markets and get other markets; but if we are going to have this kind of legislation sprung upon us, proposed as it is for political purposes, the kind we are now threatened with, we not only will not be able to secure other markets, but we will lose our own. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, we can sometimes reason as to what we ought to do ourselves when we consider what our rivals have accomplished on the same subject. My idea is that there never has been, and never will be, a bill introduced into this Congress which may do greater damage to an industry than this cotton bill which we are now considering. I believe it will bring about the closing down—temporarily at least—of most of the cotton mills of this country. Eventually many of them will adjust themselves to the new conditions as they find them; but this must mean that labor rates will be readjusted, and the readjustment will mean a lower wage scale.

Now, I wish to call attention to what has happened in Canada since 1897, as an indication of what may happen here. On August 1, 1897, the Canadians granted to Great Britain and the colonies of Great Britain a 12½ per cent preferential duty. On August 1, 1898, they increased it to 25 per cent. On July 1, 1900, they further increased it to 33⅓ per cent. So that, if the duty charged against other countries is 15 per cent, the duties charged on the ordinary goods imported into Canada from Great Britain is 10 per cent. Before this preferential went into effect Canada had developed some very good manufacturing textile industries, considering the newness of the country and its generally undeveloped condition. They were not large, to be sure, as compared with ours, but they were vigorous and prosperous.

Now, let us see what has happened since that time, and let us see whether there is any other reason for its having happened than the fact of the granting of this preferential duty. I can honestly say that I have not been able to find any such reasons. When the preferential was granted, in 1897, the imports of cotton goods from all countries into Canada—and "cotton goods" includes cotton—were $7,609,000. In the year 1910 the imports from all countries were $28,080,654, an increase in 13 years of nearly 400 per cent in importations.

I am taking the figures which I give from the Canadian Textile Directory, which is the only source of information I could find on this subject. In the year 1900 the production of Canadian cotton mills was $12,033,000. The value of the product in 1905 was $14,223,000. In 1910 an estimate made by our consul general at Montreal—there being no official figures published—gives the production at about $15,000,000, showing an increase in the production of Canadian cotton mills in 10 years of about 20 per cent. During that time our cotton mills increased their production more than 80 per cent; and, as I have pointed out to you, in the 13 years including 3 years before 1900 the importations of cotton goods into Canada increased about 400 per cent. During the same time the exportation of Canadian cotton goods decreased from $960,000 a year to $517,000 a year, a decrease of about 55 per cent. Let me recapitulate: Increase in production, about 20 per cent; increase in importations, about 400 per cent; decrease in exports, about 55 per cent.

The woolen industry has been more seriously affected even than the cotton industry. Since the preferential tariff went into effect the number of mills of all kinds has decreased from 270 to 217. Many of these are small affairs. The number of looms has decreased from 2,645 to 2,034; the number of spindles from 194,000 to 188,000.

There were 59 mills idle on the last date that I can find in the Canadian Textile Record, which refers to this subject on October 8, 1908.

The woolen goods manufactured by Canadian mills in 1900, the nearest date I can get to the beginning of the preferential, amounted to $7,359,541. In 1905, or five years later, the product had decreased to $5,764,000, a decrease of more than 20 per cent.

The capital employed in this industry had decreased from $10,486,000 to $6,938,000, while the wages and salaries paid had decreased from $2,000,000 to $1,500,000, in round numbers.

Let us see where they have been getting their goods. Of course they have been buying them from foreign countries. The importations from all other countries than the United Kingdom and the United States have increased in that time—that is, from 1897 to 1910—from $258,000 to $2,030,000.

In 1897 the total importations from all countries were $8,056,000. In 1900 the importations from the United States and the United Kingdom alone had increased to $9,353,000. In 1910 the importations from all countries had increased to $24,624,000, an increase of 300 per cent in the importations, while the industry itself in Canada had declined more than 30 per cent, both in the capital employed, in wages, and in salaries paid to employees, as well as in the value of the product.

Now, if these figures are any criterion as to what our course should be—and I submit to you that it is the best possible one we can have, because their conditions are nearer ours than are the conditions in other countries—then any such drastic cut as has been made in this cotton schedule is liable to produce similar results in this country. I will put other figures connected with this matter in my printed remarks, so that they may be at the disposal of the House.

The growth of the industry in this country during the last three decades is shown by the statistics of the following table:

Items.	Census—
	1879	1889	1899	1909
Capital	$208,280,346	$354,020,843	$460,842,772	$808,287,938
Wages	$42,040,510	$66,024,538	$85,126,310	$129,768,088
Average number of wage earners	174,659	218,876	297,929	371,120
Value of product	$192,090,110	$267,981,724	$332,806,156	$616,297,000
Active spindles	10,653,435	14,188,103	19,008,352	27,383,912
Cotton consumed ....lbs..	750,343,981	1,117,945,776	1,814,002,512	2,332,569,000

One other matter I wish to consider and that I find in the report made by the majority members of the Committee on Ways and Means, which states substantially that the burden placed on the American people as a result of the duties on cotton goods is something like $200,000,000 a year.

I have not had time to investigate all of this voluminous report, but if all the statements contained in it are as carelessly prepared as this and as incorrect in their conclusions, then I submit that the report itself is not one which is entitled to any consideration whatever from a reasoning man.

The total consumption of cotton goods in this country is $839,000,000. I take these figures from the report of the Committee on Ways and Means. The labor and cost of the material used amounts to $630,000,000. I am taking the actual costs from the committee's report for other goods than knit goods and hosiery, and the same proportional figures for those industries. So that a balance of about $209,000,000 after paying for labor and material will remain, which is about the amount which the report charges is the burden borne by the American people as a result of the protective policy in this industry.

You can not regulate the price of material, because supply and demand takes care of that. The question of labor is dependent on the conditions as they exist in various localities. No saving can be made in these items unless we cut wages. We therefore have left $209,000,000 in the value of the goods consumed after paying for the material used and paying for the labor employed. Labor does not include salaries, and taking the average ratio between labor and salaries would require $45,000,000 to pay salaries. That would leave $163,000,000 to go and come on.

Nothing has been charged for depreciation.

The capital employed is something like $1,000,000,000. Six-tenths of this is a fair proportion in mills and fixtures, and a 5 per cent charge for depreciation I do not think is too much. That would require $30,000,000 more to be charged off each year, which would reduce the balance to $133,000,000. It costs about 5 per cent to sell goods, even when the market is established and the goods are sold in this country. I think the average manufacturer pays more than that. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] shakes his head, because he knows it costs more than that to sell goods, especially where you have to go to a foreign field. But for this purpose I am only charging 5 per cent. Taking that out, $42,000,000 brings the balance down to $91,000,000. We have not taken anything yet for power, for the normal overhead charges, which everybody knows about, such as insurance, and so forth, and all other incidentals. Nobody would think of investing capital in a manufacturing industry if he was not sure of getting 6 per cent. Six per cent on the capital invested will leave $43,000,000 to pay for power and all overhead charges.

How does that correspond with the statement of the committee that the people are paying to the protected interests $200,000,000 for the sake of protection? Gentlemen, there is absolutely nothing in it.

On the whole, year in and year out, this industry is only earning a fair return on the actual capital invested. It is possible that changes should be made in the cotton schedules. My own impression is there are items in the cotton schedule on which the duty is prohibitive.

I do not believe in prohibitive duties. In the first place such duties do not produce the desired results from protection which I believe in, and they do not produce results in revenue which we must have. If there is a prohibitive duty anywhere, I would eliminate it, but the reduction of some item in the cotton schedule does not mean to cut a whole schedule in half.

Mr. Chairman, I will vote for any well-digested change in the tariff which demonstrates to me that duties are prohibitive. I will vote for any change in any schedule in the tariff, whether the industry is in Massachusetts or in the South, where such a condition exists, but I submit to you that as a reasonable man I should have some evidence that a duty is prohibitive, that somebody has made an investigation based on the conditions as they exist, not an investigation made by 14 men behind closed doors, advised by a theorist who has had no manufacturing experience, especially at a time when the majority of the Ways and Means Committee had only recently refused to give the manufacturers of the country a hearing.

The estimate made by the committee that the increase of importations under this proposed bill will be $10,600,000 is in my opinion far from the facts. My judgment is that the importations will be $100,000,000 at least, and they may reach $200,000,000. If only the former figure is reached it will mean that $125,000,000 of capital now employed in this industry will be idle and that 50,000 people now employed in this industry will be obliged to seek some other employment if they can find it.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Platt, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 29588) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for publicity on contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected," disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. GAMBLE, and Mr. JOHNSON of Maine as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE COTTON SCHEDULE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I shall do so not because I am convinced that it can be sustained from a protective standpoint in all of its items, for I do not know whether it can or not. I shall support it upon two grounds:

1. That even though it should not prove to be fully protective in all particulars, as between the excessive duties in the cotton schedule of the present law and the duties proposed in this bill, I believe that this bill will work less injustice upon the American people as a whole than does the present law.

2. That so long as a Republican President and a large number of Republican Senators and Representatives insist upon free trade in the products of the farm regardless of differences in costs of production, I shall not inquire too closely into the question of whether proposed duties upon manufactured articles which the farmer must buy are amply protective or not.

Briefly discussing this last proposition, first, I wish to say that those of us who take this position are not actuated by any spirit of revenge as is so often charged, but are only applying the principle of equal justice to all. Upon a former occasion I said upon this floor that the farmers of this country would insist, and rightly so, upon a uniform application of whatever tariff policy shall be adopted. If the protective principle is not broad enough to cover agricultural products upon the same basis as manufactured products, then it will be discarded entirely in the near future. The farmers of this country are not ignorant; they are not easily fooled; they are the best read and most widely informed of any class of our population; they will not stand for any policy which compels them to sell their entire product in a free-trade market and buy their necessities in a highly protected market. By the passage of the Canadian reciprocity bill, assuming that it will be approved by Canada, that is exactly the state of affairs which now exists. Under present conditions there is no possibility of restoring to them their protective market in the immediate future, and their only opportunity of obtaining some measure of justice is to insist upon a sharp reduction in the duties upon manufactured articles, enabling them to better meet their competitors in the free-trade market which has been created for them. They are none the less Republicans for doing this, for when the time shall come when a spirit of justice shall again prevail and a willingness to apply the same principle to farmers as to manufacturers, then and not until then will the farmer be found fighting for protective duties upon manufactured articles.

So far as I am concerned, so long as we have a Republican President and a Democratic House both violating the platform promises of their respective parties and enacting legislation discriminating against our agricultural population, I shall do what I can to afford them some compensation by voting for lower duties upon manufactured products, thus lessening the cost to them of the things they must buy.

I believe the pending bill is a fairly protective measure, though it may be possible that as to certain items the protection afforded may not be sufficient to prevent excessive competition from abroad.

Some Republicans have seized upon a statement made by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee to the effect that this was purely a revenue measure, containing no protective features, as a reason why this bill should not receive the support of any Republican.

Mr. Chairman, nothing that the gentleman from Alabama may say about this bill, and nothing that any other gentleman may say about it, can change its character. Whether it is protective or not depends upon the bill itself, and not upon what any man may say of it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman knows I am always glad to yield when I have the time at my disposal, but I have only 30 minutes, and I must decline at this time.

This bill is protective to American manufacturers to exactly the extent of the duties found in it. No tariff duties can be laid upon any competitive product without protecting the American product to the amount of the duties imposed.

True, duties may not be sufficient to give the American manufacturer the home market, or, possibly, any considerable portion of it, but that only goes to the extent of the protection afforded and not the principle.

Whenever we levy a duty of 10 per cent or any other percentage upon a competitive product, call it a revenue duty or what you will, we thereby raise a tariff wall which the foreigner must climb over before he can enter our markets.

Therefore every tariff rate found in this bill is a protective rate to the extent of the duty, although it may have been prepared solely for the purpose of revenue. Whether this bill contains protective rates by accident or protective rates by design is absolutely immaterial so far as the results are concerned.

Taking the bill as a whole, I assert that it is not only protective in principle, but affords that measure of protection pledged by the platform of the Republican Party.

The price of raw cotton ranges a little higher in England and Germany than in the United States, so that the raw material costs the foreign manufacturer a little more than it does our own manufacturers.

The average annual wage paid those engaged in the cotton industry in this country in 1909, according to the Census Bureau, was $349.67. The percentage of wages to value of products was 21.

In 1906, according to the report of the English board of trade upon the textile trades of the United Kingdom, the average annual wage paid in the cotton industry in Great Britain was $231.

And, Mr. Chairman, let me say, in passing, that I was glad to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] state this afternoon that, in his opinion, generally speaking, labor was at least as efficient in this country, if not more so, and I want to remind the committee that the day before yesterday the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN], in giving us some of his personal observations abroad, painted a very vivid picture of the wretched condition of the laboring men of England and Scotland. You remember how he painted that picture of the ill-clothed and half-starved laboring man of Great Britain. I am not going to take the time to argue that the well-clothed and well-fed laboring man of the United States is more efficient than the ill-clothed and half-starved laboring man of Great Britain. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Assuming that the wages there were the same in 1909 as in 1906, although the fact is, I believe, that they were a little higher in 1909, we have wages in this country in the cotton industry 51 per cent higher than in Great Britain. Upon $100 worth of cotton manufactured in this country, applying the average of 21 per cent found by the Census Bureau, the labor cost would be $21. In England upon the same production, assuming there is no difference in efficiency, the labor cost would be $13.91, a difference of $7.09. So that, upon the average, a tariff rate of 8 per cent ad valorem will more than cover the difference in labor cost of production between this country and Great Britain.

The lowest rate in this bill is 10 per cent ad valorem (except as to cotton waste, which is 5 per cent), the highest 40 per cent. The average is 27.06 per cent ad valorem.

This average of 27.06 per cent will not only cover the difference in labor cost at home and abroad but will cover the entire labor cost in the cotton industry. I feel satisfied that taking the bill as a whole the rates imposed will fully cover the difference in cost of production at home and abroad, and even that reasonable profit to the manufacturer spoken of in the Republican platform.

Corroborative evidence of this is found in the fact that in 1910 our exports of manufactures of cotton amounted to over $33,000,000—that is to say, we sold abroad over $33,000,000 worth of cotton manufactures in competition with all the world. Of this amount, $2,800,000 worth went to Great Britain and nearly $900,000 to Germany, the two great cotton manufacturing countries of the world besides our own. In view of these facts I am convinced that an average rate of 27.06 per cent ad valorem is ample protection to the cotton manufacturers, and if there be any injustice in this bill it is not that the average rate is not sufficiently high, but in the relation of rates in the different classes.

I therefore assert that no Republican need withhold his vote in favor of this measure upon the ground that it is not protective. Indeed, the only defense that can be made of this measure is that it is protective.

If I were a Democrat, and believed that all protection was wrong, I would be a free trader. The policy of a tariff upon imports for revenue only, so far as competitive products are concerned, if the theory of protection to American producers is to be discarded, is unjust oppression of the American people. With protection discarded, a tariff for revenue only, upon competitive products, is the most burdensome form of taxation upon the American people that can be devised. As I have already stated, such duties do afford protection to the American manufacturer, whether by design or accident, and it can not be said to be by accident when that is the inevitable effect. Now, if that protection be wrong, as our Democratic friends claim, for every dollar collected at the customhouses upon competitive products under this bill, if it becomes a law, they give the American manufacturer, without any consideration, a license to collect an equal percentage upon his product from the consumer at the gate of his factory.

It is claimed by the Democratic majority of the Committee on Ways and Means in their report upon this bill that the American people pay annually about $200,000,000 more for their cotton goods by reason of the present tariff rates, although only $38,000,000 of this amount found its way into the United States Treasury, the balance of it going to the cotton manufacturers. I am inclined to agree with that statement, but let us see what this bill does upon the Democratic theory of a tariff for revenue only. The rates are a reduction of 43.8 per cent from the present law, the average rate imposed being 27.06 in the pending bill, as against 48.12 per cent in the present law. The committee estimates the revenue to be derived under this bill at $10,599,000, as against $13,673,801 under the present law, a reduction of about $3,000,000.

Now, applying the same method of computation to this bill as the Democratic majority have applied to the present law, although this bill in fact affects less than one-half of the present cotton importations, the balance coming in under paragraph 349 of Schedule J, we find that the rates imposed will reduce the burdens of the American people in their purchases of cotton manufactures $87,600,000. That is 43.8 per cent, which is the reduction in this bill of tariff rates. The American people will still be compelled to pay $112,400,000 more for their cotton goods by reason of the rates imposed in the bill, although of this $112,400,000 only $35,077,844 will find its way into the United States Treasury, the balance of the tax, viz, $77,322,156, the people will pay to the cotton manufacturers of this country.

What statesmanship is this if the protective system is to be wholly discarded? They propose to take from the people $112,000,000, but $77,000,000 of that amount will go into the pockets of private individuals and corporations and only $35,000,000 in the Public Treasury. Republicans believing in a protective system can defend this, but for Democrats, who condemn the principle of a protective tariff, it can not be defended for a moment. If the protective tariff system is wrong in principle, then the revenue of the country should be raised wholly by duties upon luxuries, noncompetitive products, and other forms of taxation, but never upon competitive products necessary to the masses of the American people.

Upon some future occasion when my time is not so limited I hope to more fully discuss this question.

Having devoted some time to the report of the Democratic majority upon this bill, I wish to make a few observations upon the report of the Republican minority.

First, as to the criticism of ad valorem rates: They object to ad valorem rates upon the ground that they furnish a method for cheating and defrauding the Government of its revenue.

I have not the time to go into a discussion of the merits of this question, but will only say that if this be a just criticism it is equally applicable to the rates in the present law, which law has been so often and so eloquently defended by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and his Republican colleagues upon the committee. Turning to the cotton schedule of the present law, we find in every paragraph but one either straight ad valorem rates or specific rates based upon value. Specific rates based upon value are certainly subject to greater criticism than straight ad valorem rates, for the temptation to under value is greater. In the cotton schedule of the present law I find 21 straight ad valorem rates, and nearly all of the others are specific rates based upon value which, as I have said, is at least equally objectionable if ad valorem rates are an evil, which I deny.

I can not refrain, in passing, from calling attention to the outrageous and unwarranted increase in the rates in the cotton schedule in the Payne-Aldrich law over those contained in the Dingley law. No greater injustice has been perpetrated upon the American people since Schedule K was first framed in its present form. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It will be remembered that it was at first denied by those responsible for it that there were any increases. Driven from that position, they then took the ground that the increases were only upon luxuries, and they prepared a table attempting to demonstrate the correctness of their position. I hold a copy in my hand. It is issued from the Government Printing Office and is entitled "Estimated revenues. Prepared under direction of Finance Committee, Sixty-first Congress, first session." It is no doubt familiar to most of you, but I wish to call attention to a few items in it. In this table, whenever the committee deemed an article a luxury, and therefore justifying an increase in rate, they placed preceding the name of the article a capital "L," in black-faced type, signifying luxury. Turning to Schedule I—the cotton schedule—we find these "luxuries" on page 74: Cotton cloth valued at over 7 cents per square yard—not a running yard, such as our wives buy in the retail stores, but a square yard. Had it occurred to you that cotton cloth valued at 7½ cents per square yard was a luxury in the United States? [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] On page 78 we find sleeve linings composed of cotton or other vegetable fiber and silk, although valued at less than 30 cents per square yard, termed a luxury. On page 84 we find stockings valued at from 12½ to 16⅔ cents per pair a luxury, and upon the same page we find underwear valued at from 41⅔ cents to 58⅓ cents per garment denominated a luxury. When we consider some of these things and the leadership responsible for them, it is not surprising that there is a majority on the other side of the aisle at this session. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But to return to the minority report of the Republican members upon this bill. Their chief argument is that no action should be taken at this time; that this schedule should not be revised until the Tariff Board shall have made its report upon the subject.

Mr. Chairman, I have been an earnest advocate of the creation of an independent, nonpartisan Tariff Commission, with ample powers of investigation. I believe that tariff duties should be imposed with more knowledge of costs of production than we have heretofore possessed, and that facts as to costs of production should be taken into consideration, whether the tariff be laid from a Republican or a Democratic standpoint. I believe that we will never have a law that will be absolutely fair until that is done. I have not changed my position in the least in this regard, and I now have a Tariff Commission bill pending before the Committee on Ways and Means.

But, Mr. Chairman, I can not be unmindful of the actual condition which confronts us at the present time.

In the first place, before the findings of a Tariff Board can be applied to any bill we must have a uniform policy to which we can apply the facts found by the Tariff Board. That we have not to-day. Our Republican President and a large number of Republican Senators and Representatives stand for a policy of free trade in agricultural products, without regard to facts concerning costs of production, but for a high tariff upon manufactured products.

The Democratic majority stand for free trade in agricultural products and a tariff for revenue only upon manufactured products. So long as this condition prevails no facts found by any Tariff Board will be of great value in framing tariff bills, for the preliminary battle that must be fought—and it will be fought—is to fix upon a policy that will apply to all interests alike, and I assert here and now that when that battle is fought to a conclusion we will have one uniform tariff policy and it will be one of these three. Either—

1. A protective system, the principle of which shall apply to all classes.
2. A tariff for revenue only, applying to all classes.
3. Free trade.

If the last shall be the policy adopted, we shall have no occasion for a Tariff Board. If either of the other two be adopted, a Tariff Board is necessary, and the facts found by it should be applied to tariff bills.

But aside from the fact that there is no settled tariff policy in either of the parties we have confronting us another state of facts, and that is that most of those who are now pleading that action upon this bill await the report of the Tariff Board have themselves been the first to ignore the findings of that board and discredit it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In the Canadian reciprocity bill we received the President's message transmitting it to Congress last January, and in that message he stated, in substance, that there was no substantial difference in the cost of production of agricultural products between Canada and the United States. Early in March the Tariff Board transmitted its report to Congress, and that report shows conclusively that the board found that the cost of production of agricultural products was very much less in Canada than the United States. We had not simply the conclusions of the board upon the subject, but they discussed in detail every element that enters into costs of production, and every one of those elements upon practically all agricultural products showed a less cost of production in Canada than in the United States.

On April 5 the President transmitted the Canadian agreement to this Congress with a message. You will search in vain in that document for any reference to these findings of his own Tariff Board. He not only ignores the findings of his own board, but has in a number of speeches since its report was made, repeated that there was no substantial difference in costs of production of agricultural products between this country and Canada, thereby becoming the first to discredit the findings of his own Tariff Board. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But how is it as to the Members of this body making this minority report, pleading for postponement of action until the Tariff Board shall report?

We find that the distinguished ranking Member of the minority [Mr. PAYNE] and Mr. MCCALL, Mr. HILL, Mr. NEEDHAM, and Mr. LONGWORTH, five members out of seven composing the minority, have ignored the findings of the Tariff Board on the Canadian reciprocity bill and voted for a bill which, according to Republican doctrine, should not have passed if the findings of that board were correct. So, Mr. Chairman, we have a Republican President ignoring and discrediting this Tariff Board, we have five out of the seven Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee ignoring and repudiating it; we have the distinguished leader of the minority [Mr. MANN] ignoring it; we have practically the solid Democratic majority ignoring and repudiating it.

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

Mr. LENROOT. If I have the time; I will be through in a moment.

For the reasons I have given, I can see no good to be accomplished by postponing action and I am ready to vote for the bill now.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall be very glad to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts if I have the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I think in the closing days of this extra session some one ought to say a few words in defense of the President. It seems that in his own party he can find no defender in either House of Congress, and as a Democrat I feel that he has done many things worthy of praise from our party, and, in fact from the people of the whole country. The most important of these is he has made the success of the Democratic Party in the next election a certainty. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This statement I should make with some modification. There were other lesser lights that played an important part in bringing about the success of our party last fall and in assuring a repetition of that success in the election to come next year. Among these were the late lamented Speaker, and the gentleman from New York, whose name shares the odium of the bill which is perhaps the most execrated legislation ever enacted by the American Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In the campaign of 1908 the President assured the people that the revision of the tariff meant revision downward. He knew that no man could be elected who did not make that promise. I am one who believes that the President meant what he said when he proclaimed this policy from every platform on which he spoke. He was a great lawyer and had been an upright judge and had the confidence of the American people. As soon as he was elected he was besieged by wicked counselors, and in an evil hour he listened to their siren tongues and fell. He was master of the situation and could have made his party invincible, but those who made him believe that he owed his election to the "system" whispered in his ear that the former Speaker must continue his despotic sway, and he dallied and was doomed.

During his campaign speeches he realized that Cannonism was a millstone about his party's neck, and mentioned the Speaker's name with bated breath. But as a guileless judge on the bench, he was unskilled in fencing with the forces of greed, and their decoy ducks led him unwittingly into "ways that were dark" and to "tricks that were vain." [Applause on the Democratic side.] This was his first step to ruin. Along with this was another. These same emissaries of evil urged upon him the names of some whom they needed in the President's political family. Again he listened, and again he fell. Perhaps no honest man, as I believe Mr. Taft to be, was ever afflicted with such miserable comforters since the days of righteous Job. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The difference is that Job was able to throw off his wicked advisers, while the President's, with the exception of Ballinger, still hang like barnacles about him. I have no doubt that his daily prayer now is that Wickersham and Hitchcock, and probably some of the others, would go and do as Ballinger did, even if he has to give them a certificate of good character, as he did Ballinger. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But go they do not. This is another thing for which the Democrats, and in fact all the people, have the President to thank. "When the wicked rule, the people mourn," and sometimes the very wickedness of the rulers turns mourning into joy, because it causes the scales to fall from the eyes of the people, and they drive the money changers from their temples and thus regain their power. [Applause on the Democratic side.] So the Democratic Party and the whole people, in contemplation of the revolution being wrought by the advisers with whom he has surrounded himself, have occasion for thankfulness to the President for the very blunders he has made. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Like Job, he can say to these miserable comforters, "Thou hast filled me with wrinkles which is a witness against me, and my leanness rising up in me beareth witness to my face." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is a sad plight, indeed, to see a man whom we believe to be honest pulled down by bad advisers whom he can not shake off. Of one of these a Republican Senator who, next to President Taft, is perhaps in the limelight more than any other living American, recently said:

> The congressional investigation of the Alaskan coal scandal resulted in many startling revelations. It confirmed the public opinion, which had early reached the stage of conviction, that Ballinger was using his official power to aid the Morgan-Guggenheim interests in wrongfully acquiring control of the Alaskan coal fields.
> For weeks before the close of the investigation it was manifest that important disclosures would be forthcoming, but no one was quite prepared for the shocking discoveries finally made.
> THE CHEATING LETTERS.
> It was proved that the President's letter exonerating Ballinger and dismissing Glavis was not, in fact, written by the President, but was prepared under the direction of and approved by Ballinger himself, and then signed by the President. It was proved further that the letter of Attorney General Wickersham, upon which the President stated he had based his decision, was not written by Wickersham until two months after the President's decision had been rendered and given to the public, and that it was then prepared and dated back in order that it might be made to appear as the opinion of the Attorney General upon which the President had based his decision in the matter.
> These facts were established beyond contradiction, and finally admitted in the closing days of the congressional investigation. No act of any President ever caused the American people greater regret and mortification for the unfortunate position in which their Chief Executive had placed himself.

What a terrific arraignment is this by a distinguished Republican of the President who was elected by the party of the accuser and even supported by the accuser himself!

Mr. Chairman, does it not seem strange that not a Republican in this House—and, so far as I know, not one in the Senate—has risen to defend the President against such attacks by leaders of his own party, and that I, a Democrat, am forced to the duty of repelling the assaults of a Republican Senator on his party chief? I do not challenge the charge of corruption made by this great Republican against Ballinger and Wickersham, nor do I question the truthfulness of the charges, so far as these Cabinet officers are concerned; but I do not believe that the President was an intentional party to this conspiracy. I think he confided too much in wicked counselors, and allowed them to lead him into a trap set by the "malefactors of great wealth."

One trouble with the President is that, being honest himself, he is too credulous of the honesty of others, and easily falls a prey to men who, like Ballinger, Hitchcock, and Wickersham, are—

With smooth dissimulation skilled to grace
A devil's nature with an angel's face.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Only within the last few days we have had another illustration of the credulity of the good-hearted President when the Remsen Board and the Attorney General and the food poisoners almost compassed the destruction of Dr. Wiley, a man who has so often stood between the murderer and his innocent, unsuspecting victim. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Even the Secretary of Agriculture, another good man, has fallen a victim to the wiles of those who do not regard human life when balanced against gold, and through the Remsen Board and McCabe have to a great extent nullified the beneficent effects of our pure-food laws. I have often had occasion to laud the Secretary of Agriculture and his good work for the farmer, and the fact that the poisoners of food and the adulterators of whisky and conspirators in his own household have enmeshed him in their toils shows that even the very elect are sometimes deceived.

In the beginning of his administration the President showed that he desired to fulfill the pledges made during his campaign for election, and at once called an extra session of Congress. He had heard the cries of starving women and children; he had seen the long lines of human beings, gaunt and hungry, during the Roosevelt panic marching to the soup stands; he had heard the clanking of the chains forged by soulless trusts, and he knew that these barbarities were the natural offspring of the Dingley bill. In regard to these monstrous combinations, a distinguished Republican Senator, in the speech from which I have just quoted, said:

Within three years following the enactment of the Dingley law 149 trusts were organized, with a total stock and bond capitalization of $3,784,000,000. Four years later trust control had extended to 8,864 plants, with a total capitalization of $20,379,000,000. By January 1, 1908, the increase in trust consolidation embraced 10,220 plants, with outstanding stocks and bonds aggregating $31,672,000,000 of paper capitalization.

COST OF LIVING INCREASED.

The Dingley law excluded foreign competition. The trusts strangled home competition. The American consumer was completely at the mercy of the overprotected manufacturers of the country. Prices were advanced. The cost of living increased from 40 to 60, 70, and 80 per cent.

The mutterings of discontent had increased until they threatened a revolution against the Republican Party. Roosevelt had been so busy writing to "Dear Harriman," carrying placards on his forehead with the device "I am honest," and recruiting his Ananias Club that he had failed to hear the rumblings that grew louder all through his administration.

Roosevelt had been tried and found wanting, and the malefactors knew that they could not elect him, but must hunt a man whom the people believed to be really and not merely self-confessedly honest, and they found Mr. Taft. He went before them with the promise of real tariff revision downward. The people demanded this, and he, no doubt in good faith, promised them that they should have it.

The same Republican that I have just quoted said, in regard to this demand, in the speech I have referred to:

The demand for tariff revision was inevitable. It came from almost every home in the land. It increased in volume year by year preceding 1908. Congress was flooded with petitions. Republican county and State conventions adopted resolutions demanding tariff revision. Session after session these appeals were pigeonholed. In Congress after Congress the Committee on Ways and Means was organized to suppress every effort for a revision of the Dingley law. The people demanded a reduction of duty. The trusts resisted, and the answer of Congress to all appeals was: "We stand pat on the present tariff."

But by the year 1908 standpat Republicans well understood and openly admitted that tariff revision could no longer be resisted. Upon this subject the political situation was acute. Political managers realized that no obscure generalization regarding tariff revision would be safe. If the Republican Party was to succeed in 1908 it was imperative that its platform should declare for tariff revision that would meet the demand in clear and specific terms.

Did the people get what Mr. Taft promised them? Their answer is found in the 63 Democratic majority elected last fall. Further answer is found in an article by a distinguished Republican United States Senator in the Saturday Evening Post of July 8. Referring to the President's connection with that monstrosity, the Payne-Aldrich bill, he says:

When the tariff bill passed the House it was condemned the country over as a betrayal of platform pledges. It violated platform pledges; nevertheless it received his approval. Not only so, but in his Winona speech he lauded it as the "best ever."

This assertion I think the President had been led by his evil advisers to believe to be true. It shows how the high ideals of a good man may be destroyed by evil surroundings. In this same article in the Saturday Evening Post this Republican Senator, in explaining the President's violation of his preelection promises, says:

"Cannonism," Mr. Taft said to many progressives in the presidential campaign, was the greatest load he had to carry, and yet at the outset of his administration he gave his support to CANNON—not passively, but actively. He elected CANNON to the Speakership when he was certain of defeat; he stifled the attempt to modify the House rules.

Those are not my words, but are words of a prominent Republican Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman a question in connection with his attack on the President——

Mr. BURNETT. I am defending the President, not attacking

Mr. NORRIS. Well, defending him. I want to ask why the gentleman did not jump on some one near his size? [Laughter.] him.

Mr. BURNETT. I think, Mr. Chairman, that by the time this Congress gets through with the President he will have shriveled up to much less than my size. [Laughter and applause.]

I believe much of this criticism of the President is too harsh. While the Senator states facts, yet in almost every sentence he seems to impute personal dishonesty to the President, and does not make that allowance for the duress of environment which I believe Christian charity demands. Perhaps the Senator has never been surrounded by wicked advisers who constantly reminded him that he owed his election to protection-made trusts. Perhaps he has never had a political family foisted upon him by those who care nothing for the man who toils. Perhaps he has never been as impressionable as the President, and does not know how importunate are the heartless demands of those who grind the faces of the poor. Perhaps he has never had to listen to the Jeremiads of those who have fattened on the sweat of human beings driven by a master's lash. Perhaps he has never heard that Nabob's threat that if he withheld the lash the slaves should starve. Perhaps he has not been impressed by the petition of the slave himself wrung from his unwilling hand by the tyrant who said: "Sign it, or see your loved ones die."

All these our benign President has had thundered in his ear. Then is it a wonder that having heard, he wavered, and to his ruin fell? Again I quote from this same distinguished Republican Senator to show how harsh and uncharitable even a man's political supporters may grow toward him, and how little allowance they sometimes make for the evil surroundings that so often make him err:

Is it to be wondered at that the Republican voter in 1910 felt that he had several scores to settle? A President whom he had elected, believing him to be the custodian of the Roosevelt policies, had dismissed the Roosevelt Cabinet and appointed in their places men, in the main, of known hostility to those policies.

With the promises of Candidate Taft for downward revision still sounding in his ears, he had seen President Taft use all the power of his administration to save from defeat a stand-pat Speaker, who appointed a Committee on Ways and Means in deadly opposition to any revision of the tariff in the interest of the ultimate consumer.

And then he had witnessed that same President, on March 16, 1909, transmit his first message to Congress on this all-important subject, a message so brief and so perfunctory that it had not room for an explicit word or suggestion for downward revision of the tariff.

VOTERS BETRAYED IN TARIFF BILL.

And, finally, after having been baffled in his struggle to secure tariff revision by a stand-pat Congress, and after having at last secured the promise of tariff revision downward by a national convention, and elected a President and a Congress pledged to such revision, the voter had seen his Representatives in Congress and his President sign a tariff bill that increased his burdens and left him even more completely at the mercy of the overprotected trusts and combinations.

But, more than this. So completely had the successor of Roosevelt abandoned the progressive principles committed to his keeping that he had selected as his legislative counselor and guide and in public speech extolled in the most extravagant terms the patriotism and statesmanship of the greatest opponent of all progressive policies, and hence the greatest champion of privilege in the United States Senate, Senator Aldrich.

Following this he journeyed from coast to coast to speak in defense of stand-pat Senators and Congressmen, who were the bitterest opponents of the progressive policies of his predecessor and the very men who were chiefly responsible for revision of the tariff upward.

Then, to still further show his disregard for the great body of progressive Republicans, he proclaimed the Payne-Aldrich monstrosity to be the best tariff bill ever enacted by the Republican Party.

Here again we see how association with the great champion of trusts, Senator Aldrich, caused an honest Chief Executive to be swayed from the path of duty which he had blazed for himself. In its effects the Payne-Aldrich bill was a crime as dark and damning as the hinges of night, but in his blame of the President this eminent Republican again fails to make due allowance for the baneful influence of the company the President was forced to keep. As one example of the oppression of the tariff-made trusts on my people in the South I offer the following letter:

HOUSTON, TEX., July 28, 1911.

To United States Senators and Congressmen, Washington, D. C.

SIRS: The South will probably make 14,000,000 bales of cotton this year. It will require approximately 100,000,000 yards of bagging to cover this crop. The duty on bagging enables the trust (so called) to tax the cotton industry, say, $750,000 on this crop alone. The Government gets very little revenue from this duty, as hardly one-tenth of this amount is imported. The South needs factories. There was a bagging mill at Galveston. It was bought by the American Manufacturing Co. and dismantled, and is now used as a warehouse, and Texas farmers get their bagging from New York.

We understand no duty is paid on jute butts. The trust imports butts through the port of Galveston, which they ship to St. Louis, via one line of railway, on the ridiculously low rate of about 7½ cents, where they have another factory. These facts may interest you.

Respectfully,

STREET & GRAVES.

The moral of the whole proposition is that no Republican can be elected without the support of tariff-pampered trusts, and when elected they make him bow his neck to wear their yoke. This has ever been so since the Republican leaders became the sycophantic slaves of greed; and no matter how the yoke may gall good men like Mr. Taft, they have to wear it or quit the job. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The people last fall saw that "Ephraim is joined to his idols," and decided from that time on to "let him alone." There are thousands of honest Republican voters all over the land, and many of them are joining the multitude demanding relief from their party.

Another benefaction that the President has bestowed on the Democratic Party and on the struggling masses is the proof that even an honest President can not lead a party with corrupt leaders in a straight and narrow way. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The people at the ballot box last fall said in thunder tones, "We want reduction of the tariff, and we want it now," and I doubt not that the President in his great, good heart wanted to give it now. But again the tempter whispered wait, and a Tariff Board was made the pretext for delay. Nero fiddled while Rome burned, and temporizing leaders advise the President to a like course. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

A board to determine the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad! A board organized under the pretext of protecting American labor from the pauper labor of the Old World, and yet we have only to turn to free-trade England to find labor receiving higher wages than in tariff-ridden Italy, Germany, and France. Trusts, the friends of labor, indeed! when every year they bring a million souls from Europe to beat down the wages of men who toil.

The President will soon have another chance to show whether he can cut loose from the tyranny of those who lord it over men of high degree. He has secured the passage of the reciprocity bill, which in his Indianapolis speech he admitted would not materially reduce the cost of living. Even to get this pitiful concession, he had to secure Democratic votes. A majority of his party, both in the House and Senate, repudiated his bill, and the Democrats saved the day. He was honest and fair enough to give Democrats the credit they deserved. Such a thing has never happened before in the history of our Government, as a President elected by one party giving credit to the other party for the passage of a bill rejected by those of his own household.

Had the advisers who have led him into so many troubles known that he contemplated this gracious act, no doubt they would have forced him to desist.

In a few days he will have the opportunity to sign a bill that will help those whom fortune has visited with a scanty hand. The bill to reduce the tariff on wool and woolen goods will soon reach his desk. The shivering forms of those exposed to winter's chilly blasts will no doubt pass in review before his tender heart, but by their side will swagger the bloated forms of those bedecked with dollar marks, and they will hiss "Beware of November, 1912!" [Applause on the Democratic side.] Which voice will he heed? I believe he wants to heed the weak and feeble voice of those who remind him of the trust-priced blanket with a duty of 150 per cent. But will those who answer the call for campaign funds let him do it? We shall see. Already the voice of the slanderer is heard in the land saying that he made an unholy bargain with the minions of greed to veto any tariff bill passed at this session in return for Republican votes for reciprocity.

Surely this can not be true. Surely no such intrigue as this could ever be countenanced by a man who holds the weal or woe of 90,000,000 human beings in his hands. I stand here to defend him against such wicked imputations on his personal and official integrity, and to say that while some of his advisers would lead him to any depth of infamy, he could never be a party to such a betrayal of those who trusted him to lead them into better ways.

His traducers say that in his veto of the woolen and other tariff bills he will say, "Wait till the Tariff Board reports." This can not be true. In his message urging reciprocity he says not a word about waiting on the Tariff Board. How can he expect anyone to trust this board when, in a report that they have already made, they cast such a shadow over their conclusions as to show them crude and unworthy of belief? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Ex-Speaker CANNON showed this in his speech of April 24, when, in regard to the difference between the cost of production of wood pulp in the United States and Canada, he said:

In this connection allow me to call the attention of the House to the difference between the Tariff Board and the Mann special committee on the matter. The Mann committee reported that $2 would represent the difference, whereas the Tariff Board said that $4.14 represented the difference.

We all know that the Mann committee was composed of able, painstaking, conscientious men; that they made a long and careful investigation, and that their report was worthy the utmost respect, and yet we have the Tariff Board in positive conflict with that committee. When such a clash as this appears in the very first report they make, how can anyone believe a word they say?

Senator SMOOT has already introduced a bill to revise the woolen schedule. Did he wait for the report of the Tariff Board? Yet he is the one man whom the papers say has given out the assurance that the President will veto any tariff bill till the board reports. If it takes the Tariff Board two years to report on one or two schedules, how many thousand years before their illuminating information will shed light on the hundreds of items in the Payne-Aldrich bill? When can they tell us how much to raise the tariff on silks and diamonds and rubber and scores of other things which the Payne bill lets in free? In showing the enormity of some of these articles the Republican leader, Mr. MANN, stated on the floor of this House on the 8th of June of this year that—

Each year under the Payne-Aldrich bill india rubber to the extent of $106,000,000 comes in free; raw silk and silk to the extent of $67,000,000 come in free; chemicals to the extent of $50,000,000 come in free; copper to the extent of $45,000,000 comes in free; oils (mainly vegetable) to the extent of $16,000,000 come in free; cabinet woods, and so forth, to the extent of $15,000,000 come in free; diamonds and other precious stones to the extent of $10,000,000 come in free; all of which could be properly taxed as a revenue proposition.

How long will it take the Tariff Board to determine how much more it will take to make corset covers in this than in other countries? When they strike hosiery, how long will they linger before they decide that stockings are too high and must come down? [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The Payne bill puts acorns on the free list. How long will it take your Tariff Board to decide how much more it costs to grow acorns in this country than in the Old World? You have apatite on your Payne free list. In looking up the derivation of the word I find it meant, in the original, "deceit; to deceive," being a mineral often mistaken for other minerals. Your board need waste no time in determining how much more it costs to produce this article here than abroad, for your party has the full monopoly of deceit and need never fear competition in this product. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Divi-divi is on the Payne free list, and in that commodity you have a monopoly also, for in every campaign you have forced the trusts to "divi" up their loot, and in return you pledge them that no trust magnate shall ever wear stripes. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This promise your Attorney General is observing with perfect loyalty, and your board need waste no time with divi-divi. You let in ipecac and leeches free, and, commenting on that part of the Payne bill in a speech on this floor while the Payne-Aldrich steal was being debated, I said:

You put ipecac on the free list. This you need not have done, for when the poor man sees his child's bare feet, made bare because of your iniquitous tax on shoes, it will require no ipecac to cause him to spew you out from the very nauseau your tainted schedules bring. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Besides, after two years' trial of this bill, should it become a law in its present form, the sight of any man who supports it will act as an emetic more powerful than all the ipecac in the land.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

You let leeches in free. This again was "love's labor lost;" for no leeches were needed to help Republicans and their bloated favorites suck the lifeblood of an outraged people.

Mr. Chairman, how near a prophet did I prove to be then? And now I venture another. I have stood here defending your Republican President as best I could. During my speech I have felt that some of you gentlemen on the Republican side have not appreciated my efforts as I think you should, but I have not been aggrieved, for I believe that it was because you are conscience-stung that you had not gone to his defense as I have. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I felt that my party owed him this defense, as your leaders have said that his reciprocity bill was playing into the hands of the Democracy. If so, the people owe him much, and I believe in paying what we owe.

I have done what I could to defend him and angels could do no more. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, Mr. Chairman, permit another prophecy, as my reputation in that line is well assured. When the long line of American voters, Democrats and Republicans, march to the polls in November, 1912, they will say, as I have said, "Mr. Taft is an honest man and we like him. But he is at the head of a party whose leaders are bound hand and foot to the chariot wheels of dishonest greed. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He is surrounded by the emissaries of corrupt monopoly and can not free himself from their gilded chains. Therefore the only hope for us and our loved ones is to put a Democrat in his seat."

Democracy has the leaders, the people have the votes. Our leaders who are spoken of for President are all great and good men. As the peer of the best, Alabama names her favorite son, bigger to-day than ever before, and, like that of Abou Ben Adhem, North and South and East and West, the name of UNDERWOOD leads all the rest. [Loud applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the revision of the wool schedule and the cotton schedule and the metal schedule and all the other important schedules in the existing tariff in accordance with the standard fixed by the platform of the last Republican national convention, but I am opposed to the pending bill and all the tariff-revision bills that have been introduced at the present session of Congress, because it is an absolute impossibility to adjust the schedules according to that standard at this time. I will not vote for the cotton bill even if the President did initiate and Congress did enact the Canadian reciprocity measure. I do not believe the Canadian bill in any sense violated the letter or spirit of the last Republican platform in relation to tariff revision. The purpose of tariff revision is not simply to change the schedules for the sake of change, but it is to put the tariff upon an equitable business basis. The people of the country understand the situation.

Any effort on the part of our friends across the main aisle to take advantage of the fact that Congress is called together in special session for a special purpose and put through tariff bills before the Tariff Board has had time to properly investigate and report to Congress and the country trustworthy facts showing the difference in the cost of production of competitive articles here and abroad, will not deceive anybody. The country expects Congress to put the tariff on a business basis and keep it there, and this can only be done through the aid of an able expert nonpartisan tariff commission or board. The Tariff Board investigated conditions in this country and Canada, and Congress had the assistance of the report thereon before enacting the reciprocity law. If we shall pass the tariff bills now pending, at this session of Congress, it will amount to a practical abandonment of the commission method of revising the tariff. It will destroy the hope of the country to establish the tariff upon a scientific business basis, and the periodical agitations and business disturbances will continue to be a feature of our revenue system.

If the tariff is once established on the right basis, schedules can be corrected and amended from time to time to conform to changes that may occur respecting the cost of production of commodities, without exciting any fear or fury among producers or consumers. I believe in the policy of protection, and I feel confident that three out of four of the voters of the United States are believers in that policy. But if the policy shall become permanent the tariff must be modernized and rationalized. It must be adjusted with the view of promoting the common good and not be employed as a means of bestowing favors upon special interests. No industry has a vested or even a moral right to be protected against competition from abroad. The question in every instance should be considered solely from the standpoint of the general welfare. Wherever the interests of the country, considered as a whole, will be advanced by protective duties they should be imposed, and wherever the common interests will be retarded by protective duties they should be withheld or withdrawn.

A wise protective policy will foster industrial growth and promote economic independence. Duties that do not tend to promote those aims should not be levied, except for purposes of revenue. If protective duties were justified as special favors to particular industries, then, by the rule of equality, every industry in the land could justly claim equal treatment, regardless of the effect it might have upon the social welfare. But the policy of protection can not be defended upon that principle. It can only be defended from the standpoint of the general public interest, and only to the extent that it advances that interest. If the protection of a given industry will greatly increase the opportunities for capital and labor, and thereby advance the common welfare, it affords no reason for the protection of another industry when the only result will be to increase the profits of those engaged in it at the expense of the public. These suggestions may seem somewhat idealistic in view of the selfishness and the spirit of jealousy among sections and industries, but they embody the true philosophy of protection, which should always be kept in mind in its consideration and application. In times past our tariff has been applied altogether too often under the rule of favor and upon the principle that if protection of one class of industries will operate beneficently, every other industry must receive the same consideration, regardless of what its effect might be upon the general welfare.

The Democratic Party need not congratulate itself upon the fact that it was successful at the polls in 1910, because that result was not a Democratic victory; it was a Republican reprimand. The vote does not signify that the people of the country have confidence in the Democratic Party or in its policies, but the voters used that party as a sort of cat-o-nine-tails with which to chastise the Republican Party because they were not satisfied with what it did in the revision of the tariff in 1909.

Here we have a bill proposing to reduce the duty upon cotton manufactures substantially 50 per cent. The cotton mills in the United States employ capital aggregating over $800,000,000. Their annual output is over $600,000,000, mill value, and they employ 375,000 laborers annually and pay them an annual wage aggregating $130,000,000. The elaborate historical and somewhat technical report submitted by the Committee on Ways and Means in support of the bill, refers to the remarkable growth of the cotton industry in the United States since 1879 with commendable pride. And the report refers particularly to the magnificent and the unparalleled development of this industry in the Southern States.

It is asserted in the report that cotton manufacturing in the South during these years has increased over 1,900 per cent. The author of the report says it is almost incredible and is unparalleled in the industrial history of this or any other country. Mr. Chairman, it must be borne in mind that during all these years the cotton industry in the South as well as in the North has been fostered by a substantial protective tariff. Under the influence and operation of the policy of protection it has made this magnificent growth, and now by the rule of guess, without knowing what its effect will be upon the cotton mills, it is proposed to reduce the duties on cotton fabrics substantially 50 per cent. It occurs to me that this great industry is too important, that it involves too many interests, to justify Congress in making such a radical reduction as a mere matter of experiment or hazard. Suppose the guess should be wrong? Suppose the rate shall be 5 or 10 per cent too low to afford reasonable protection to our cotton mills? At one stroke of the pen, if I may use that figure, the legislative branch of the Government will have paralyzed, nay, destroyed one of the most important industries in the land. We can not afford to do it.

We should wait, Mr. Chairman, until we are in possession of reliable facts, until we are furnished with evidence showing with practical certainty the difference in the cost of production here and in foreign countries, so we may adjust the duties accordingly. I am speaking from the Republican standpoint. Our Democratic friends boast of the fact that the element of protection is entirely eliminated and is altogether absent from this bill. What does that mean? The withdrawing of protection altogether from the cotton manufactures of the United States under existing conditions, if gentlemen are correct in their analysis and interpretation of their own measure, can not mean anything less than the absolute destruction of this great industry.

They boast of the fact that in imposing duties under this bill no discrimination is made with a view of industrial development, with a view of encouraging capital to further engage in cotton manufacturing; they give no regard whatever to the 375,000 men and women who are employed in the cotton mills of the country. It was said by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] this afternoon in his very excellent speech that any duty upon a competitive article is, pro tanto, protective. I do agree with him at all. A tariff for revenue only may be levied upon competitive commodities in such a manner as to entirely destroy the protective element of the measure and yet bring the largest possible revenue.

Suppose there is an average difference in the cost of producing cotton fabrics in this country and in foreign countries of 30 per cent in favor of the foreigners. A tariff for revenue might be levied of 20 or 25 per cent, not enough to cover the difference in cost of production, and immediately there would be disastrous—yes, destructive—competition. Every cotton mill in America would close down, and foreign cotton mills would have a monopoly of our markets, notwithstanding the 25 per cent duty. Would that be protection? It would not. Any rate that falls short of putting the producers in this country on an equal footing, at least, with the producers in foreign countries is not protective; but from the standpoint of revenue only it would be a decided success. If the duty is 5 per cent below the difference in cost of production, the effect will be to close every cotton mill in the United States and to deprive of work the 375,000 laborers employed in them. Our people would be compelled to import all the cotton fabrics they used, and the revenue receipts from the cotton tariff would be greatly augmented, provided, of course, the people had the means with which to buy. That would be the very highest type of a tariff for revenue only, a tariff with the principle of protection entirely eliminated, a virtue which Democrats are claiming for the pending measure.

Will this bill accomplish that result? Is it the purpose and intention of the Democratic majority in the House that it shall do so? They say to us that it contains no protection; that it is designed entirely for revenue. It is true the report asserts and the leader of the Democratic side declares that the reductions are only moderate.

The report accompanying the bill states that under the Payne tariff, averaging about 50 per cent on cotton fabrics, only 25 per cent is effectively protective, that only half of the present tariff is operative; and it is claimed that the reduction proposed in the pending bill will save to the people the enormous sum of $200,000,000 a year, which they are now compelled to pay to the cotton manufacturers as a bonus on account of the duty. This bill fixes the average duties on cotton fabrics at about 27 per cent. The bill is so framed that it will repeal only the 25 per cent of effective duty, as my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] so well said yesterday in his very able speech, and will leave the nonprotective part, amounting to 27 per cent, for revenue purposes only. It required genius to originate that idea. It is predicated on the theory that the effective part of the tariff, by the law of gravity, will settle to the bottom, and it is proposed to take the 25 per cent of effective duty off the bottom and leave the 27 per cent of ineffective duty on stilts, so high above the heads of the "robber tariff barons" that they can not reach it. The beneficence of this proposition is only equaled by the brilliance of the thought it embodies.

On the other hand, we are told that only a duty of 25 per cent on cotton can be effective for protection to our cotton mills, and the bill proposes to leave a duty of over 27 per cent on cotton fabrics. I would not accuse the distinguished leader of the majority of the House of having been bitten by that malignant nocturnal creature which the "peerless leader" labels "protection," but I can not but wonder why he takes so much pains to assure the country that the reduction is very moderate, and that the cotton mills under the proposed tariff will flourish like a green bay tree and will prosper fully as well as they have prospered under the existing tariff. Does it really make any difference, then, whether the reduction is taken from the top or from the bottom? A Democrat, in making a campaign speech in an industrial center, where there are cotton mills, can say, "We reduced the tariff on cotton fabrics from 50 per cent down to 27 per cent, and that is 2 per cent more than is effective under the Payne law. We simply blew the foam off the top and left all that is substantial in the present tariff." When he speaks in the country where there are no cotton mills, and where the question of stockings and other cotton fabrics has only one aspect, the same orator could and doubtless would show to the voters that since only 25 per cent under the Payne tariff is effective for protective purposes, and that the proposed bill makes a reduction of 25 per cent, so arranged as to abolish every vestige of protection, it will save cotton consumers the snug sum of $200,000,000 a year, which has been going into the coffers of the Cotton Trust.

I confess I am afraid of such a double-barreled scheme. I fear the duty that is left by the bill might in some way settle down to the bottom and become effective. But I am a Republican, and I believe in duties high enough to cover the difference in the cost of production of competitive commodities here and abroad, and no higher, plus a reasonable profit to American producers. I am not going to run away from the "reasonable profit" provision. If American producers are put on an absolute equality with foreign producers in our own market, it is safe to assume that at least one-half of the commodities we consume and that might be made at home will be made abroad by foreign capital and foreign labor, and the opportunities for American capital and American labor will be correspondingly lessened. I believe in giving the American producer a sufficient advantage in our own markets to enable him to supply the home demand chiefly, limited, however, by adequate safeguards so he can not monopolize the home market and impose unjust prices upon consumers. This is the philosophy of the Republican protective policy.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield for a question.

Mr. FOWLER. The question I want to ask is, What per cent does the gentleman regard as a reasonable profit for the manufacturer?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We will settle that when we take up tariff revision under the report of the commission and do it in an intelligent way. I do not care to go into the "reasonable-profit" question further just now than to defend the principle. And another thing bearing upon the reasonable-profit provision is the well-known custom of every great industrial country in the world of making prices for export below domestic prices; the practice of dumping surplus goods into other markets, of selling them abroad even without any direct profit at all, and doing it advantageously. We must have some safeguards against practices of that kind, practices that are within the knowledge of every intelligent man in this country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

So the "reasonable-profit" provision of our platform is one of its beneficent features, and one that can not be lost sight of from the standpoint of protection. We proposed in 1908 to make a scientific business tariff. In 1909 we undertook to do it, and we discovered that we did not have the necessary tools to accomplish the task.

The Payne tariff contains a great many good provisions, and is a much better tariff than we have had in recent years. There are schedules in that law that individually I did not approve.

I had the honor of being a member of the Ways and Means Committee that prepared the Payne bill, and I think I am betraying no secret when I say that I did what I could to bring about reductions and changes in some of the schedules that were left practically untouched, notably wool. But it was absolutely impossible for the Sixty-first Congress, under existing conditions, to have made a tariff that would have been satisfactory to the country. Why? Because Congress did not have facts at hand to enable it to adjust the duties according to the standard the party fixed. It had no satisfactory evidence showing the differences in cost of production here and abroad. There was a great amount of evidence taken, but it was mainly furnished by manufacturers and importers, and it was discredited by the country without knowing what it was. We must not overlook the important fact, in determining matters of legislation, that the country looks upon Congress—I will not say with discredit, but with a little bit of allowance. Congress is regarded as an aggregation of statesmen with a tendency to operate politics on the side. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, there is so much politics in the tariff question that any measure worked out through committees of the House and Senate will be more or less discredited, even if it is as nearly perfect and just as it is possible to make it. Therefore whatever the virtues and faults of the Payne tariff, it did demonstrate to Congress and to the country the absolute necessity of a Tariff Commission, an expert Tariff Commission divorced from politics, a commission so constituted and organized that the people will have faith in it and its work. Commissions exist in the Government service at the present time.

We have the Civil Service Commission. We never hear its work criticized because of politics, although it is criticized sometimes by politicians. We have the Interstate Commerce Commission, a magnificent tribunal, which deals with some of the most vital problems involved in the social and the economic life of the country. Who ever heard that great commission criticized on account of politics? Why can we not have a tariff commission? We can have one, and we will. We already have a commission, which we call the "Tariff Board," that is made up of able, honest, scientific men, who place country welfare and social good above party politics, a commission that will seek and find the honest truth as nearly as it is possible, and one that has the respect and confidence of the country.

Gentlemen have asked why we did not create a tariff commission before undertaking a revision of the schedules. It was an impossibility to do it. There was very little sentiment for a tariff commission in this country until after we had entered upon the consideration of the Payne bill. The proposition could not have secured any considerable support in either House of Congress. Democrats were practically solid against it, and perhaps four-fifths of the Republicans thought it was unnecessary.

The method by which we undertook to revise the tariff in 1909 was one that had been employed for tariff revision ever since the organization of the Government. Mr. Chairman, it requires time and endeavor; it requires a campaign of education to bring about the abandonment of a method that has the sanction of a century of experience, with practically no criticism.

The Republican Party in 1908, by necessary implication, declared for a Tariff Commission, because it is an absolute impossibility to put the tariff of the country on a business basis, to so adjust the schedules as to nicely cover the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, without the agency of an expert commission. Congress can not secure the necessary information; but even if it could and did do so, its work would be discredited by the people, for many of them are educated to believe that politics enters more or less in all tariff legislation. By the aid of a commission Congress can adjust the schedules so as to cover the difference in cost here and in foreign countries, and thus afford proper protection to our industries and prevent the evils of monopolization. The people will be content with such a tariff and all honest manufacturers will be satisfied with it. It will avoid the periodical agitation and industrial disturbance that comes under the old method of tariff making.

There is some psychology even in manufacturing. The producers in the United States know that in the absence of trustworthy information Congress may do what the Democratic majority is seeking to do now—that is, revise the tariff by a hap-hazard method in the hope that some of its work may be right. It is impossible to demonstrate that a single item in any schedule made by the guesswork method is right until after it has been put in operation, and then great injury may ensue before mistakes can be corrected.

Let me ask, where is there, in connection with this bill, any evidence showing with reasonable certainty the difference in cost of manufacturing cotton here and in foreign countries? There is none. The bill is a random proposition, a shot in the thicket in hope of hitting the game if it is a deer, and missing it if it is a calf. How can there be intelligent and wise tariff legislation under such a plan?

Is it any wonder that legitimate industries are more or less anxious every time there is serious agitation for tariff revision under the guess rule? But when the country comes to know that Congress will always maintain a tariff high enough to cover the legitimate difference in the cost of production here and abroad, there will be no concern on the part of manufacturers, no mills will close down, no stocks or bonds will be discredited in the markets, the consumers will feel an abiding contentment, and there will be industrial peace and stability such as is impossible under the menace of the kind of legislation that is proposed in this session of Congress. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We have a Tariff Board or commission already in operation, created by the Payne tariff law, but its powers were greatly enlarged by the laws appropriating money for its maintenance. It is composed of three thoroughly competent members, authorized to employ industrial experts to investigate every factor entering into the cost of production in all civilized countries. Its experts are now engaged in making the investigation and in ascertaining the difference in the cost of production of competitive commodities, here and elsewhere. It will be ready to make a full and complete report upon the wool schedule and upon the cotton schedule by the 1st of next December, only four months away, and probably upon other important schedules by the 1st of next January.

We will then know, Mr. Chairman, the relative conditions of production here and in foreign countries. We will be able to levy duties sufficiently high to protect American industries and not so high as to permit combinations to impose upon American consumers. That policy carries protection both ways, protection not only to legitimate industries, but protection to consumers as well. Practically all of the people of the United States believe in a tariff high enough to foster and protect legitimate industries, provided that the duties are not so high as to permit trusts and monopolies to extort unjust prices from the people.

When that report is made Congress will be able to put the tariff upon a business basis, and not until then. We have appropriated upward of $400,000 to pay the expenses of the investigation, and it seems most unwise, indeed, to rush through important legislation of this kind in advance of the report. The impression seems to prevail that the people desire an early tariff revision, and politicians seem to vie with each other to see who will get to it first, with little regard to the character of legislation they would enact. Such methods of handling the public business tend to discredit the character and capacity of Congress.

It is my judgment that while the people desire a revision of the tariff, they want that revision to be intelligent and wise. I am earnestly in favor once for all of establishing the commission method of revising the tariff for the future. It is of infinitely greater importance that we establish the method of correct and righteous revision, though we may have to wait a few months to do so, than that we change the schedules by the haphazard method, one at this time, another one next week, and another one the week after. If we pass the pending bills and others that are to be proposed, shall we do the work all over next winter in conformity with the facts reported by the Tariff Board?

This is not a bill to reduce the tariff in the interest of the people. It is a generator of campaign thunder for 1912. [Applause on the Republican side.] Some see in it a move to foster the waning political fortunes of certain ambitious statesmen who may aspire to the Presidency in 1912. President Taft has clearly outlined the policy of the Republican Party upon the subject of tariff revision. He is an earnest advocate of the commission method, and he appreciates the importance of firmly establishing it. While I have no authority to speak for him upon this subject, I have no doubt that he regards it of much greater wisdom to await the report of the Tariff Board and then make a wise and intelligent revision, than to make what can only be a slipshod revision at this time. By all means wait until the facts are laid before Congress and the country. When the Tariff Board furnishes the country with reliable information respecting conditions of production in the great industrial countries, our work can and will be intelligent and defensible. It is true that Congress will not be bound by the facts reported by the board. They will doubtless be summarized in the form of tables easily interpreted and understood. Those tables will be published in every newspaper and magazine and carried to every fireside in the country.

The plain citizens will be able to know whether the schedules conform to the facts, and if they do not Congress will be in greater haste to make them conform than some Members seem to be at this time to do some revising before the winter snow flies. One of the chief virtues of a tariff commission is to furnish the people trustworthy information, to enlighten public sentiment until it comes to be a directing factor in tariff legislation. That is impossible under the old method of revision. It is a mere matter of speculation, of conjecture, of inference, and prejudice now. I repeat, if these tariff bills shall go through now it means the repudiation of the commission method, the abandonment of the purpose to put our tariff on a business basis. It will destroy the hope of industrial peace and stability for the future.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. Is there any requirement in the law that the report of the Tariff Board shall be given to the newspapers and made public?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No.

Mr. SIMS. What assurance have we that it will be made public?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am discussing the general tariff-commission policy. The House passed a tariff-commission bill last Congress and the Senate agreed to it with an amendment, and the gentleman knows it was defeated by artifice at the last moment. That is the kind of commission I favor; but this board will report the facts soon, and those facts of necessity must be given to the public. I am not satisfied with the board, because it has no permanent statutory status. It is not permanent. It lives only while it has food—lives upon appropriations. But while it does exist its work will be thorough and reliable. I want to say now with all of the emphasis I can command that we can never have a business tariff, a scientific tariff, under the present method of making tariffs. We must modernize our methods and frame our tariff upon a broad, just, and enlightened industrial and economic foundation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill proposes to materially reduce the tariff tax on cotton clothing, one of the prime necessities of life. It is in line with Democratic policies and the promises made to the people by the Democratic Party to revise and lower the tariff tax upon the necessaries of life, thereby reducing their cost to the American people. I shall give the bill my hearty and cordial support. It is not my purpose, however, to attempt to add anything to what has been said on this great economic question. I rise rather for the purpose of taking advantage of the latitude allowed under general debate to call attention to a resolution which I introduced in this House and which is pending before the Committee on the Judiciary, which greatly concerns a great portion of the people I have the honor to represent and thousands of tobacco growers in 20 different States of this Union, and also, in my judgment, millions of consumers, who have for so many years been paying tribute not only to the Tobacco Trust but to the other great trusts and combinations of the country in the increased price of practically everything they use. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, on May 29, 1911, the Supreme Court of the United States adjudicated and declared that the American Tobacco Co. and 64 codefendant accessory and subsidiary corporations and 29 individual defendants had entered into a conspiracy and formed and were maintaining a combination in restraint of trade in tobacco and the products of tobacco and were attempting to monopolize, and were monopolizing, such trade in violation of the provisions of what is known as the Sherman antitrust law, approved July 2, 1890. That act not only authorizes a civil suit for the dissolution of the combination, but also contains a provision making those responsible for the formation and maintenance of the combination subject to criminal prosecution and punishable by a fine or imprisonment. On the very next day, therefore, after the decision was rendered I introduced the following resolution of inquiry:

Resolved, That the Attorney General of the United States be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the House of Representatives whether or not any criminal prosecutions have been begun, and whether any are now pending against the American Tobacco Co. and its constituent companies and all or any one of the 29 individual defendants in the case of the American Tobacco Co. against The United States, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States on May 29, 1911, to wit, James B. Duke, Caleb C. Dule, Percival S. Hill, George Arents, Paul Brown, Robert B. Dule, George A. Helme, Robert D. Lewis, Thomas J. Maloney, Oliver H. Payne, Thomas F. Ryan, Robert K. Smith, George W. Watts, George G. Allen, John B. Cobb, William R. Harris, William H. McAllister, Anthony M. Brady, Benjamin N. Duke, H. M. Hannah, Herbert D. Kingsbury, Pierre Lorillard, Rufus L. Patterson, Frank H. Ray, Grant B. Schley, Charles Strotz, Peter A. B. Widener, Welford C. Reed, and Williamson W. Fuller, for violations of sections 1 or 2 of the Sherman antitrust law, and if not, whether any such criminal prosecutions will be begun at an early date.

This resolution, which was privileged, under the rules, was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and that committee promptly reported a resolution calling for the information, and the House unanimously adopted it. The Attorney General in his answer stated in substance that in 1906 criminal prosecutions were entered in the Federal court in the State of New York against the MacAndrews & Forbes Co. and the J. S. Young Co., known as the Licorice Trust, resulting in fines of $10,000 and $8,000, respectively, both of which were paid, and that no other criminal prosecutions had been commenced at any time against any of the other companies or individuals composing what is commonly called the Tobacco Trust. He further stated that, in his opinion, it was not compatible with the public interests to state whether or not any further criminal prosecutions were contemplated. It is a matter of some significance, Mr. Chairman, that at the time the prosecutions just mentioned were commenced those two companies were not a part of what is called the Tobacco Trust. As a matter of fact, they did not become a part of it until 1902. They controlled more than 95 per cent of the manufacture of licorice paste in this country. Licorice paste is largely used in the manufacture of plug tobacco, and it can be readily seen, therefore, that its monopolization at that time was hurtful to the Tobacco Trust as well as to the independent manufacturer of tobacco.

The Attorney General did not vouchsafe any explanation as to why the Department of Justice under this and the preceding administration had contented itself with these two criminal prosecutions, or why the main corporation, the chief and dominant factor of the trust, and the individuals whose brains and whose money wrung from the pockets of the producers and consumers of tobacco had given the combination life and power, had been allowed to escape the penalty expressly provided for in said statute. And let me call your attention just here to the fact that the resolution did not ask the Attorney General to give away his case or disclose any evidence upon which a criminal prosecution might be founded, but simply to inform Congress and the country as to whether or not it was his intention to proceed, under his oath of office, to enforce the statute in all of its provisions. Under such circumstances I can not understand how an expression of his intention could in any way militate against or prove incompatible with the public interests. Certainly the people, whose servant and law officer he is supposed to be, have a right to know whether he intends to proceed under the law and enforce its penalties, or whether he is to assume the right to decide when and where the law shall be applied. I can construe his answer in no other way than as an intimation, to say the least, that the Department of Justice intends to permit those who have built up this gigantic trust, and in doing so have flagrantly violated the law, to escape the just consequences of their acts. I immediately, therefore, introduced the following resolution:

Whereas the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of The United States of America against The American Tobacco Co. and others, and in the case of The American Tobacco Co. and others against The United States of America, adjudged and decreed in effect that the said the American Tobacco Co. and 64 other corporation codefendants, commonly called the Tobacco Trust, and 29 individual defendants have formed and maintained a combination in restraint of trade, and have conspired to monopolize, have monopolized, and are continuing to monopolize a part of the commerce among the States and Territories and with foreign nations in restraint of interstate trade and commerce, in violations of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890; and

Whereas under the provisions of said act if the said parties or persons, or any of them, or anyone for them, or anyone aiding or abetting them, have entered into or continued any contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, in the Territories, or with foreign nations, or have monopolized, or attempted to monopolize or combine or conspire with any person or persons to monopolize, any part of the trade or commerce as aforesaid, they are amenable to criminal prosecution; and

Whereas no criminal prosecutions have been begun against the said parties or persons: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), First. That it is the sense of the House of Representatives and the Senate that criminal prosecutions should be begun against any or all of said parties or persons who shall have violated the criminal provisions of said statute.

Second. That the Attorney General of the United States be, and he is hereby, instructed to institute criminal prosecutions against said parties or persons for said violations, if any, where the evidence, in the opinion of the Attorney General, shall justify such proceedings.

This resolution is now pending before the Judiciary Committee, and I believe it will be favorably reported out, and I trust that it will be adopted by this House.

HOLDING OF SUPREME COURT AND EFFECT.

The Supreme Court has declared that the Tobacco Trust must dissolve. It is true that six, and possibly eight, months was allowed it in order to work out its dissolution—a time much too long in the opinion of those of us who are familiar with the manner in which it has used its power to oppress both the producer and the consumer, and who do not believe that it was either worthy or deserving of such extraordinary consideration at the hands of the court which adjudged it to be a violator of the law. It is also true that everyone believes that the time allowed will be consumed by highly paid and skillful attorneys, not so much in an effort to evolve a plan whereby there may be a complete and honest dissolution of the trust, but rather in devising a scheme whereby the trust may be continued in some other form or manner, thus evading the plain mandate of the court. It is not to be believed that these men, who years ago set about to form this great combination in defiance of the law, and who, by virtue of such action, have built up colossal fortunes, will be suddenly seized with such a respect and reverence for the law which they have heretofore trampled upon that they will bow in humble submission to the court's decree, so long as they understand that the legal department will make no effort to hold them personally responsible for their acts. What matters it if eventually, and after a period of investigation, another civil suit shall be brought to dissolve the new concern? It must drag its weary way through the courts for possibly another four years before it will reach the court of last resort.

The most that can be then expected from such a proceeding will be another order of dissolution, and in the meantime the fortunes of those interested will have become even more enormous, while the producer, by the reduction of a few cents per pound in the selling price of his tobacco, and the consumer, by the increase of price in the tobacco products, are made to bear the expense of the attorneys employed to protect the trust in its business and all other costs involved in its effort to perpetuate itself at the expense of the people. Such a proceeding has no terror for the trust magnate, for he knows that nothing is more certain than the fact that he has it in his power to make the people foot the bills. But let him once understand that his "guilt is personal" and that our Government proposes to so regard and treat it; let him understand that our Government will inexorably hold to as rigid an account the man of wealth and of power who breaks the law as it will the petty offender; let him understand that the Government's law officer will no more think of assuming a power which neither exists in him or in his office and waive criminal prosecution in the one case than he would think of doing so in the other, and, Mr. Chairman, you will quickly see the end of the monopolistic combines of this country. That, sir, in my judgment, is the only real and effective way to deal with the trusts, which have used their power to destroy competition and monopolize trade. One real, honest, and earnest criminal prosecution against those responsible for the trusts of this country will do more to cause their disintegration and prevent the formation of new ones than all the civil suits which have been instituted by the Department of Justice.

And, Mr. Chairman, if the administration is as sincere as it professes to be in its purpose to destroy the trusts and relieve the great masses of the people from their exactions, I can not understand why it has not sought to apply the criminal portion of the statute to those responsible for them, but has contented itself, when forced by public sentiment, with bringing civil suits for dissolution, knowing full well that, after all, the trusts will make the people pay the cost to which they are subjected by reason of such suits.

Mr. Chairman, just here I want to call attention to an article which appeared in a daily paper in this city only a day or two ago in the form of a dispatch from the city of New York concerning the proposed reorganization plans of the Tobacco Trust, as follows:

TOBACCO TRUST STARTS REORGANIZATION PLAN.

NEW YORK, July 28.

Highly pleased over the discovery that two, at least, of the judges of the United States circuit court favor the application of the "rule of reason," the officials of the Tobacco Trust and the big bankers who represent the bondholders got busy with the reorganization plan to-day.

The financial interests, who want to continue the Tobacco Trust on lines as close as possible to those now used, but still within the law, wondered just how far they could go.

They are satisfied since yesterday's decision, and it is likely that when the reorganization plan is announced soon it will provide for "competition" that will not particularly curtail the earning powers of the component parts of the trust.

Mr. Chairman, if it be true as reported that the reorganization of this trust is to be effected according to the letter but not according to the spirit of the decision of the Supreme Court, if it be true that it is to be effected so as to maintain competition in form and not in reality, then I submit that the money which the Government has expended in prosecuting the civil suit just decided in the Supreme Court has been a waste of public money. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If it be true, as it has been charged, that this reorganization is to be brought about by breaking up the dominant company, the American Tobacco Co., into four companies—one to control the cigarette business, another to control the plug-tobacco and smoking-tobacco business, another to control the snuff-manufacturing business, and still another to control the cigar-manufacturing business—all presumably to be conducted under one master mind, maintaining their high profits for the benefit of the individuals who now control the trust and will hereafter control these different companies, then I submit that the suit just decided in the Supreme Court might as well have not been brought. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

HISTORY OF THE TRUST.

In order that we may see whether or not the interest of the people has been neglected by a failure to proceed at an earlier date and in a more forcible manner against the Tobacco Trust, let us, for a moment, inquire concerning the history of its formation. In the limited time at my disposal only the most essential facts can be stated. Tobacco is grown in many sections of the country, having diversity of soil and climate and producing, therefore, tobacco of various kinds and quality. As evidencing this fact, I call attention to the following tables which, at my request, were furnished me by Dr. W. W. Garner, of the Agricultural Department, showing the production of tobacco by States in 1909 and 1910, and also the average annual production of tobacco in the United States by types. I shall not read them, but ask permission to insert them in the RECORD.

Production of tobacco by States, 1909 and 1910.

The demand for raw tobacco of all qualities prior to 1890, when the American Tobacco Co. first came into existence, was widespread not only in this country, but also in foreign countries, and the producers were therefore enabled to sell their products in a large competitive market and under the most advantageous conditions. Many factories scattered over the country were engaged in the manufacture of tobacco in all of its forms. In the language of the Supreme Court—

There is no doubt that these factories were competitors in the purchase of the raw products which they manufactured and in the distribution and sale of the manufactured products. Indeed, it is shown that prior to 1890 not only had the normal and ordinary competition existed between the factories in question, but that the competition had been fierce and abnormal.

Such was the condition of the industry when, in 1890, the American Tobacco Co. was organized under the laws of New Jersey with a capital stock of $25,000,000. According to the report on the prices of tobacco submitted to the Senate June 5, 1909, it quickly took in all the principal cigarette manufacturers, and from the outset controlled substantially 90 per cent of the cigarette business in this country. The same report shows that while it issued $25,000,000 of capital stock its tangible assets amounted to only $3,545,108.02, and the balance of $21,454,891.98, while called "good will," really represented overcapitalization or watered stock. This company branched out and soon built up a considerable business in plug tobacco and smoking tobacco, which was transferred to the Continental Tobacco Co., organized in December, 1898, with a capital stock ultimately increased to $100,000,000. No one has ever denied that at least the entire amount of its common stock, amounting to $48,846,100, represented overcapitalization or watered stock. In the year 1899 and thereafter the American Tobacco Co. and the Continental Tobacco Co., acting in concert, bought and closed up 30 competing corporations and partnerships.

In March, 1900, the American Snuff Co. was organized. It took over the snuff business of the American and Continental companies, and also bought up and closed down other leading snuff-manufacturing concerns. In January, 1901, the American Cigar Co. was formed, and it took over the cigar business of the American and Continental companies. In June following the Consolidated Tobacco Co. was organized as a holding company, and in 1904 this company merged with the American and Continental Tobacco companies into one corporation under the name of the American Tobacco Co., with a capitalization of $180,000,000. By buying out and closing down the independent manufacturers this great combination soon acquired a monopoly of all the manufactured products of tobacco, and curtailed, if not entirely destroyed, competition in the buying of raw tobacco and the sale of the manufactured product. Governed by the law of selfishness and greed, rather than by the just law of supply and demand, its annual profit rapidly increased until it was able to pay more than 30 per cent annually on a capital stock, the greater part of which was watered and represented no tangible assets. The profits of the American Tobacco Co. in 1890 were $2,511,180.12. In 1899 the profits of the combination were $7,204,550.92, and in 1907 they had increased to the enormous amount of $36,000,155.75. Can there be any doubt but what this great and steadily increasing profit is the result of stifling competition in the purchase of raw tobacco from the producer and the sale of the manufactured product to the consumer? It is not necessary to relate how this trust, having monopolized our home markets, entered foreign lands and by a combination with the Imperial Tobacco Co. parceled out and divided the foreign markets between the two companies. I have stated sufficient facts to show how this trust has operated at the expense of the many thousands of producers and consumers of tobacco in this country.

PROOF BEFORE THE COURT.

Proof was taken in the civil suit referred to showing the methods resorted to by the trusts to force independent manufacturers of tobacco to sell their plants and quit business. Discussing this feature, the Supreme Court says:

The record indisputably discloses that after this merger the same methods which were used from the beginning continued to be employed. Thus, it is beyond dispute: First, that since the organization of the new American Tobacco Co. that company has acquired four large tobacco concerns; that restrictive covenants against engaging in the tobacco business were taken from the sellers, and that the plants were not continued in operation, but were at once abandoned. Second, that the new company has, besides, acquired control of eight additional concerns, the business of such concerns being now carried on by four separate corporations, all absolutely controlled by the American Tobacco Co., although the connection as to two of these companies with that corporation was long and persistently denied.

* * * That situation and the vast power which the principal and accessory corporate defendants and the small number of individuals who own a majority of the common stock of the new American Tobacco Co. exert over the marketing of tobacco as a raw product, its manufacture, its marketing when manufactured, and its consequent movement in the channels of interstate commerce, indeed relatively over foreign commerce, and the commerce of the whole world in the raw and manufactured products stand out in such bold relief from the undisputed facts which have been stated as to lead us to pass at once to the second fundamental proposition which we are required to consider.

Mr. Chairman, no effort was made in that case to show the manner in which the trust had manipulated and reduced the price of tobacco in the hands of the producer. I do not refer to this as a criticism of the manner in which said case was conducted by the Attorney General and, more particularly, the very able special counsel employed in the case, who was formerly a resident of the splendid city where I reside, and upon whom the burden of the Government's case really rested. He has added luster to what was already an enviable career as an able, painstaking, and successful lawyer. But, sir, if it had been thought necessary, proof could have been taken showing that the trust from its inception used every device and resorted to every possible method to lower the price of tobacco to the producer. I have the honor to represent a district where tobacco is one of the chief farm products, and I know how the tobacco producer in my country suffered during many of these years. The trust went down into my country, where dark tobacco is produced, and it actually fixed the price at which the farmer must sell his tobacco. It monopolized and organized the competitive buyers and divided the country among them. It said to one buyer, "You must buy on this side of the road, but you must not go on that side of the road." To another it said, "You can go this road, but you must not go that." And so it destroyed competitive buying and reduced the price of tobacco from $10 and $12 per hundred to $3 and $4 per hundred. The people were oppressed and children were made to go ragged by its operations, while the profits of their honest toil went to swell the immense dividends and build up the enormous fortunes of those who organized and controlled it.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is not at this time necessary to pursue that subject further. Let us see what the Supreme Court, in its calm and sober judgment, has had to say concerning the object and the intent of the combination and the individuals composing it. The court said:

Considering, then, the undisputed facts which we have previously stated, it remains only to determine whether they establish that the acts, contracts, agreements, combinations, etc., which were assailed were of such an unusual and wrongful character as to bring them within the prohibitions of the law. That they were, in our opinion, so overwhelmingly results from the undisputed facts that it seems only necessary to refer to the facts as we have stated them to demonstrate the correctness of this conclusion. Indeed, the history of the combination is so replete with the doing of acts which it was the obvious purpose of the statute to forbid, so demonstrative of the existence from the beginning of a purpose to acquire dominion and control of the tobacco trade, not by the mere exertion of the ordinary right to contract and to trade, but by methods devised in order to monopolize the trade by driving competitors out of business, which were ruthlessly carried out upon the assumption that to work upon the fears or play upon the cupidity of competitors would make success possible. We say these conclusions are inevitable, not because of the vast amount of property aggregated by the combination, not because alone of the many corporations which the proof shows were united by resort to one device or another. Again, not alone because of the dominion and control over the tobacco trade which actually exists, but because we think the conclusion of wrongful purpose and illegal combination is overwhelmingly established by the following considerations:

(a) By the fact that the very first organization or combination was impelled by a previously existing fierce trade war, evidently inspired by one or more of the minds which brought about and became parties to that combination.

(b) Because, immediately after that combination and the increase of capital which followed, the acts which ensued justify the inference that the intention existed to use the power of the combination as a vantage ground to further monopolize the trade in tobacco by means of trade conflicts designed to injure others, either by driving competitors out of the business or compelling them to become parties to a combination—a purpose whose execution was illustrated by the plug war which ensued and its results, by the snuff war which followed and its results, and by the conflict which immediately followed the entry of the combination in England and the division of the world's business by the two foreign contracts which ensued.

(c) By the ever-present manifestation which is exhibited of a conscious wrongdoing by the form in which the various transactions were embodied from the beginning, ever changing but ever in substance the same. Now the organization of a new company, now the control exerted by the taking of stock in one or another or in several, so as to obscure the result actually attained, nevertheless uniform, in their manifestations of the purpose to restrain others and to monopolize and retain power in the hands of the few who, it would seem, from the beginning contemplated the mastery of the trade which practically followed.

(d) By the gradual absorption of control over all the elements essential to the successful manufacture of tobacco products, and placing such control in the hands of seemingly independent corporations serving as perpetual barriers to the entry of others into the tobacco trade.

(e) By persistent expenditure of millions upon millions of dollars in buying out plants, not for the purpose of utilizing them, but in order to close them up and render them useless for the purposes of trade.

(f) By the constantly recurring stipulations, whose legality, isolatedly viewed, we are not considering, by which numbers of persons, whether manufacturers, stockholders, or employees, were required to bind themselves, generally for long periods, not to compete in the future. Indeed, when the results of the undisputed proof which we have stated are fully apprehended and the wrongful acts which they exhibit are considered there comes inevitably to the mind the conviction that it was the danger which it was deemed would arise to individual liberty and the public well-being from acts like those which this record exhibits, which led the legislative mind to conceive and to enact the antitrust act, considerations which also serve to clearly demonstrate that the combination here assailed is within the law as to leave no doubt that it is our plain duty to apply its prohibitions.

THE CRIMINAL PROVISIONS OF STATUTE SHOULD BE ENFORCED.

It then becomes pertinent to inquire why the statute should not be enforced against those whom the Supreme Court has held to have been guilty of "a wrongful purpose and an illegal combination." Why should the Attorney General stop the fight in the very moment of victory, in the first skirmish, and before the victory is made complete by an enforcement of all the penalties of the statute? A good general, intent upon following up a victory and preventing his opposition from regaining its advantage, does not call off his forces at the very moment when he has won a great battle. In the eyes of the law, one man stands no higher than another. The moonshiner who, yielding to his environments, distills the "mountain dew" in violation of the law, is made to feel its heavy hand—and that is right. The smuggler who smuggles the smallest trifle of merchandise into this country is justly and properly punished. The petty thief who rifles the mails is sent to jail, as he should be. This is done not so much to visit revenge upon or punish the offender as it is to serve as a warning to others who might be so inclined. Is it, therefore, unreasonable to ask why those who have illegally extorted millions of dollars from the pockets of thousands of citizens in this land should not also be brought before the bar of an impartial court? [Applause on the Democratic side.] The law is plain. There can be no doubt as to its meaning, or as to the intent of those who framed and passed it. I am aware that unlawful intent is the gist of all criminal actions. If there ever was any doubt in the mind of any person as to the unlawful intent, that question has been finally and forever settled by the Supreme Court. The Attorney General recognized this fact in a speech which he delivered at Battle Creek, Mich., on July 6, 1911, where, in discussing the decision of the Supreme Court in this very case, he is reported to have used the following language:

The area of uncertainty in the law has been greatly narrowed, and its scope and effect have been pretty clearly defined. The school of literal interpretation has been repudiated and the application of a rule of reasonable construction declared. There will always be a field of uncertainty in so far as an investigation of facts is required, particularly when intent becomes a necessary consideration; but this surely may now be said to be beyond controversy.

If the officials of the trust have been guilty of violating the law—and no one can deny that fact since the Supreme Court has so found; if the intent necessary in all criminal cases has been and can be shown—and the Attorney General concedes as much in the speech referred to—then what just reason can be given for a failure to proceed criminally under the statute? Certainly no official should show any distinction among persons in the performance of his duty. Our Government should be fair and honest in the administration of its laws. They are not to be administered in the interest of the rich man or in favor of the poor man. Above all things, they should be administered honestly and justly, uninfluenced by wealth, power, or position. [Applause on the Democratic side.] No immunity should be given the willful violator, be he rich or be he poor. The absolute impartiality of the law is its chief strength and bulwark. Every public servant is under an obligation to see that its impartiality is strictly maintained. No public servant should arrogate to himself the power to suspend its enforcement in favor of any particular individual or set of individuals.

Congress believed when the Sherman antitrust law was passed that its greatest potentiality was in the provision for a criminal prosecution of those who violated it. In the debate prior to its passage Senator Turpie, of Indiana, who advocated it, said:

> The moment we denounce these trusts penally, the moment we declare these fraudulent trust combinations to be conspiracies, to be felonies or misdemeanors, that moment, under their own maxim, the courts are bound to carry out the intention and purpose of the legislation, and even to favor that purpose and intention, that the will of the people may prevail and not perish.

I need not repeat that one personal criminal prosecution is more feared by those who have formed these trust combinations than any number of civil suits to dissolve them. In the one case the individual offender must pay the penalty, while in the other the people are made to foot the bills.

RECORD OF DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

The preceding, as well as the present, administration boasted much of what was being accomplished toward breaking up the trusts. The words "malefactors of great wealth" and "predatory interests" became common terms during the administration of Theodore Roosevelt, and we heard much from him concerning a fair, honest, and impartial enforcement of our criminal laws. But, Mr. Chairman, it is a truth worthy of a maxim that a man's sincerity can be best tested by his actions, rather than by his words. During the more than seven years of the administration of Roosevelt 25 indictments were found under the antitrust law. But it is a singular fact that none of the larger trusts were made to feel the heavy hand of the criminal law. The Standard Oil, the Sugar Trust, the Tobacco Trust, the Harvester Trust, and other trusts of like size and character are strangely missing from the list of those against which criminal prosecutions were sought. Of those indicted, six were given small fines on a plea of guilty, six were dismissed, two were acquitted, only three convicted after a trial, while eight are now pending, notwithstanding the fact that some of the indictments were returned as long ago as 1906 and 1907.

I submit that this record does not measure up to the fanfaronade and the magniloquence with which we became so familiar during the administration of Roosevelt. It is not a record to which the legal department of his administration or of the present can point with pride. During the present administration there have been 16 indictments returned for a violation of the Sherman antitrust law. The only one of these that has been pushed to a trial and conviction was an indictment returned last year against 12 farmers in the State of Kentucky. These farmers had seen the price of their tobacco, the product of their toil and the support of their families, reduced until it would not even pay for the labor employed in its cultivation. Finding that the Government did not intend to put forth a staying hand to protect them from the greed and avarice of the trust, they joined an association which had for its sole purpose the holding of their raw product until such time as the trust would be forced to pay a fair and honest price for it, and they were alleged to have been engaged in an effort to secure the cooperation of a neighbor to that end. The Department of Justice lost no time in securing indictments against them, after having sent Government detectives into the territory. Neither did it lose any time in vigorously pushing the case to a speedy trial and conviction. I do not refer to this case for the purpose of offering the slightest criticism of the vigorous and speedy manner in which it was disposed of. I wish simply to contrast the action of the Department of Justice against these farmers, who were only trying to secure an honest price for the product of their own toil and not to unfairly take that which belonged to others, with its action in delaying to even seek an indictment against the Tobacco Trust and the individuals controlling the same, who, not content with a fair and honest profit, have for 21 years been throttling competition in defiance of the law in order to take as profit that which neither justly or morally belonged to them. It is in strong contrast with the delay in bringing to trial the Sugar Refining Co. and the individuals composing it under the indictment returned against them more than two years ago.

It would, indeed, be interesting to know why it was that the Attorney General selected the 12 farmers of Kentucky, organized in opposition to the trust, for prosecution under the criminal provisions of the statute, while the trusts are permitted to go unwhipped of justice. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why, Mr. Chairman, it has been disclosed by one of the Democratic investigating committees that the administration from March 5, 1909, to May 31, 1911, paid out to special attorneys employed to proceed against the trusts the sum of $845,184.56, in addition to the sum of possibly $300,000 annually paid the United States district attorneys and the regular force of Assistant Attorneys General, whose duty it was to prosecute these cases. This vast sum was paid to only 19 attorneys, who were the happy recipients of the Attorney General's favor. The efforts of these overpaid special attorneys were heralded over the country as an evidence that the administration was earnestly engaged in a Titanic effort to destroy and break up the trusts. And yet the Department of Justice seems to have shut its eyes to the fact that the antitrust law is a criminal statute providing for a criminal prosecution as well as for a civil suit for dissolution and damages. A crusade against these combinations predicated solely on a basis of dissolution and civil damages would appear to be a mere waste of the people's money, for, as I have said, the hapless consumer is made to bear the burden by the merest fractional increase in the market price of the commodity involved. The Attorney General is now engaged in making speeches, more or less spectacular, over the country, in which he deplores the fact that prices are no longer fixed by the law of supply and demand, but that they are being fixed by the combinations. He is reported as urging Federal control, and has suggested a possibility that it may become necessary to provide a commission with power to regulate and fix prices. It is evident that this would mean a further delay, which is in itself a most valuable asset for the trusts. The Supreme Court has declared the present antitrust law valid. Why not exhaust every remedy under that statute in the effort to correct the evils of which he complains? The people can neither be deceived nor misled. They would take more kindly to such a suggestion if they were convinced that the antitrust law was being enforced as it should be.

Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to unduly or harshly criticize the Attorney General. However much he may have neglected up to this time to enforce the provisions of this statute, it is not my purpose to declare that he does not in the future intend to perform his duty in accordance with his oath of office. The record which he shall make will speak for itself. But, sir, this law has been on the statute books for more than 20 years. It is a surprising fact that, notwithstanding it has been sustained by the Supreme Court, the trusts have increased and prospered since its passage as never before. It is evident, therefore, that either the law is deficient or that some one has been lax and inefficient in its enforcement. No one should declare that it is deficient until an earnest and sincere effort has been made to enforce all of its provisions and penalties, and the Government has exhausted every remedy provided by law for the purpose of breaking up the trusts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from New York that I may have three minutes additional?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. How much time?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have three minutes.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I yield the gentleman three minutes additional.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The law provides four methods of procedure. First, an injunctive process to restrain the formation of a combination intended to monopolize and restrain trade; second, a criminal prosecution of those responsible for the combination; third, a seizure of merchandise in transit; and, fourth, a civil suit for dissolution. In the case of the Tobacco Trust, as is also true in the case of the Standard Oil, the Department of Justice has chosen to apply only the least drastic of these four remedies. Although more than two months have elapsed since the Supreme Court has decided that both of these trusts and the individuals composing same have been guilty of a violation of the criminal provisions of the statute, no disposition is being shown, and, so far as the public knows, no effort is to be made to apply the more drastic remedy of a criminal prosecution. But these men are to be permitted to break the law and escape a punishment which would surely be meted out to a small offender. Criminal prosecutions should not be confined to the minor offenders, but these greater and more powerful offenders should be proceeded against under every provision of the law, in order to test to the fullest its effectiveness. If it should then be found to be deficient, some other method of dealing with the trusts must be devised.

THE DUTY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. Chairman, it is the right and duty of Congress to declare that the Government should exhaust every remedy and use all the powers conferred by this statute to destroy the trusts. Congress should declare that every faithful effort at enforcement will be sustained and will have its support and approval. It is for this reason that I advocate the passage of this resolution, and not because it is aimed at men of wealth. Honest wealth is to be desired by all. I would willingly place no obstacle in the way of any man to obtain it. I rejoice that our country affords such splendid opportunities to the industrious and enterprising citizen in the pursuit of an honest fortune. But, sir, it is the duty of our Government to protect the masses of the people from the man or the set of men who would plunder them for personal gain. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The perpetuity of our institutions, the success of our form of government, depends upon the broad principle of equality before the law. I pray that the time will never come when the representatives of a great and a free people shall silently acquiesce in a discrimination in favor of one class against another. [Loud applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I have read statistics until I am befogged; I have heard statistics quoted until I am lost; I have heard the people of this country apparently divided into three classes, farmers, manufacturers, and stockholders. I have always been a Republican. I have always been a protectionist, but from the habit of my life I have been accustomed to face my trials with the issues clearly defined. It has been my habit not to go to trial until I knew something about what the other side had to present and what my own case was, and now I want to say a word, first, in regard to my attitude upon this bill. I will speak upon that as plainly as my friend [Mr. LENROOT] did. I propose to vote against it. I want to state why. After reading all the literature that I could absorb and listening to all the speeches I am satisfied that the great body of this House is in the same position I am, and that is that it is not in a condition to pass at this time a just and wise measure and be sure that it is a just and wise measure. [Applause on the Republican side.] It would have been well for this country long ago if we had had a scientific board to pass upon this question of tariff revision. I welcomed the approach of such a board at the last election; I want to wait for it now so that I may act intelligently and honestly upon accurate information. We hear much about the wages in mills. We hear a denial that a man who has to pay something because of the duties on imported goods gets anything by way of consideration for that, and that is one of my protectionist ideas or rather that is an idea which I as a protectionist would oppose.

It is well enough for a man who comes from an agricultural section of the country where the Lord has been good enough to give them a great natural monopoly of cotton to say that he does not want protection and does not need it. I come from a section of the country where we have no great natural monopoly, except the brains in our head and the vigor in our hands [applause on the Republican side], and we have got to find some way to use them. It has been from other sections besides that favored section that the brains and the genius have come to use that which God gives the Southern States. The spinning machinery and the cotton machinery and the roller and the saw gin did not come from the South. They came from the men who were looking for a method to make a living and to utilize that which was grown in another section. But for every man who works in one of these mills we have got other people who are, as one of the gentlemen said yesterday, nonprotected laborers; I have alluded to that once before upon the floor of the House, and I want to insist upon it again that the man who works or who has the labor to sell is protected in the industry in which he can put his labor that was protected to encourage it that capital may seek an outlet in carrying on that industry. I have in my district two cities that are perfectly typical of my ideas of the benefits of protection. I have two communities, each one, in our homely country phrase, having its eggs in one basket. One is wholly dependent upon the production of a necessity of life, and the other is wholly interested in the production of purely frivolous luxuries of life.

And yet those two communities are absolutely dependent on those industries, which are both protected. The communities have grown up around them, and every other sort of a trade and occupation that can be carried on by men in this country, and which have no tariff, is carried on in those communities, and when those industries languish the communities languish. Both of them nearly died in 1892, and I do not want to see that happen again.

We hear about the average reductions of duty. I have learned enough in this discussion and from the reading of the tariff literature of how misleading a statement of average duties or average reductions is. It may be well enough to say to the wife of the shoemaker that you have reduced the duty on cotton goods and stockings 27 per cent, but it does not do her much good if he comes home and says, "My dear, I have lost my job in the shoe factory, because it has shut down." [Applause on the Republican side.] It does not do the wife much good by saying she can buy her calico dress a little cheaper when her husband, who works in the wool mill, says, "I have nothing to buy it with." And under the guise of a reduction of tariff, which comes in as a general average, you may work grave injustice to the best part of your whole industry. I want to wait until a scientific board can tell me what items and what subschedules in the great schedules can be reduced with safety and what can not be reduced.

Now, the cry is that all these things are taxes upon the community. What do we spend money to support foreign consular agents and consulates for except to find out the conditions of trade in the countries abroad, in order that we may know what is going on? We pay it out of taxes. Why do our communities ask that rivers and harbors be improved and paid for out of taxes? Why do States and cities spend their own money to build highways, to remove grade crossings, to build wharves, and do all things, as in my section of the country, where we may receive and discharge the surplus of the West and send it to Europe, and receive those things we may buy abroad and distribute them throughout the West? We do that by taxation. We do it with labor that does not work in mills and factories, that is not used in tariff-protected industries, and yet directly reaps the benefit of the tariff. We do it because we have faith in this country and believe that we are not going to depart from a policy which shall forever encourage men to offer opportunities for other men to labor profitably with their hands.

Now, I want to say just a word more on another thing. I hear of free trade and protection, and when I am going to the country on the issue by and by—for I take it that this session is but the opening of a trial—I want to go on a fair issue and I do not want to go on a false one, with a pseudo free trade against a genuine protection. I think I am Yankee enough to understand what trade means, and I think I am Yankee enough to understand what free trade means, and when this House can resolve itself into the parliament of man and the congress of the world, and legislate for the whole world, we may talk about free trade. But when we talk about nothing except that which is to make this the free market for the world, in which to bring its goods against our labor, when every other market but one in the world keeps its walls up, there is no free trade. [Applause on the Republican side.] Therefore, if it was not that I am convinced that the leader of the majority side is absolutely sincere in his expressions as to free trade, and so forth, I should be impelled to say that his expression was arrant humbug, because free trade is not any such thing as they are offering to this country as free trade.

We have the beautiful expression of "a tariff for revenue only," and that comes well from a section and from people who have natural monopolies of certain things, who have profitable crops of other things, but upon which so much of revenue is to be raised that incidentally they are protected. Who bears the burden of the duties on rice, tobacco, and sugar? What compensation do we get for that? We get no chance to give labor in return. And so if we are going to have a discussion on free trade and protection, let us take the true protection, which believes, by encouraging an industry, in giving men opportunity to labor for fair wage and with a high standard of living, and a free trade, on the other hand, which is the real free trade, which means no barrier anywhere, but a trade to flow as the waters of the ocean flow, untrammeled and unruffled, going whither they will, and not a false free trade and one which is a mere mockery upon the name.

Now, something also has been said, very ably, by Mr. REDFIELD as to the efficiency of labor. If I understand my protection book at all, it has always been the theory of the protectionist that with a high-paid, well-encouraged labor, who would, in return for his extra privilege among the ranks of laboring men, be more efficient, it would tend to offset the large disadvantage the employer or manufacturer has of keeping his labor up and yet reducing the cost of the unit of his product. And I contend to-day that that protection idea has been most magnificently demonstrated, and that our difficulty to-day is not that this country is tired of protection, but that protection has been successful; and some men living under the old duties have become so efficient that they are making inordinate and unreasonable profits, and that the country is asking to-day, not an abandonment of protection, but a revision of the duties where a revision may fairly be made.

Efficiency has been the cry. It will be the cry, and you can go through our manufacturing sections and find lots of instances—in my own district I know of some—where the manufacturers themselves say that they have outlived their period of protection; that their competition among themselves and with the foreigners has worked the thing down to the point where they do not care a rap whether there is a duty or not. There are others who have not said so, because they have not yet arrived to that point. I want the information of the Tariff Board, at least the information of somebody who is competent to pass upon those things, so that I may finally, as a Member charged with the duty of doing my best for the people of this whole country, vote intelligently and honestly.

Now, I believe that this cotton schedule, so far as our brethren of the South go, is uneconomical and to their own disadvantage. They have talked some on the floor of this House about the hardships of having to sell their surplus cotton in the markets of the world at the prices of the world. I would like to know at which end of a manufacturing or business season a man reckons his surplus—at the beginning, or at the close? I would like to know when you have got in this country an industry which consumes one-fifth of the cotton of the world and 45 per cent of the cotton of this country, if it is so discouraged that it ceases to become a large consumer of the domestic cotton, whether or not the adding of that amount to the surplus of the world will raise or will lower the general average of prices of cotton?

Now, this is the advance skirmish for next year. We have got, in all our States, to go to the people this fall and we have got to go again next year. I want to go with my position understood and with the position of my party understood. I take the position of a protectionist, not opposed to fair reductions, but favoring them when fair and in the interests of all the people, including those who earn their living in protected industry. I shall oppose the abandonment of a policy that has stood for so many years and going back to the one that has always brought us disaster when it has been even partially adopted. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARRIS. May I have two minutes more?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. HARRIS. Now, my brethren on the other side are opposed to the policy of waiting for the report of the Tariff Commission. I ask, Why? Are they afraid to wait until the regular session, when we shall have information? Do they desire to put through a bill now which the country shall again demand a revision of within six months or a year? Are they afraid to go to the country on the issue that is sought to be made? All I say to the gentlemen as to that is, if you are sincere in your belief as to the soundness of your doctrine and your position, then wait until you can fairly try it out. Remember the lines concerning him who—

Either fears his fate too much,
Or his deserts are small,
Who fears to put it to the touch,
To win or lose it all.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield one minute to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to print in the RECORD a letter bearing on the Oregon & California Railroad land grant, written to me recently by Hon. Thomas Fitch, who was a Member of this House at the time the grant was made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can extend by order of the House.

Following is the letter referred to:

3445 EAST SEVENTH STREET,
Los Angeles, July 26, 1911.

Hon. A. W. LAFFERTY, M. C.

DEAR SIR: I have read your able speech reported in the RECORD July 20. I was a Member of the Forty-first Congress from Nevada and a member of the Committee on Public Lands. Hon. G. W. Julian, of Indiana, the chairman of the committee, referred the act of April 10, 1869, and the act of May 4, 1870, to a subcommittee composed of Mr. Smythe, of Iowa; Mr. Townsend, of Pennsylvania; and myself. The provision that the land granted should be sold to actual settlers only in quantities not greater than one-quarter section to one purchaser and for a price not exceeding $2.50 per acre was the offspring of Mr. Julian, who insisted upon its being attached to all railroad land grants and to all revivals or renewals of grants.

The gentlemen who represented the applicants for the grant to the McMinnville road labored with the committee to have this restriction eliminated. They claimed that its effect would be to deprive the grantee of the increased value that would be imparted to the lands by the building of the road, and would make it difficult to market the bonds of the railroad company. Against this it was urged that the large number of settlers that would be secured by this clause would make traffic for the road. As a result of the discussions the applicants were told frankly that unless the committee reported the bill with the Julian restriction it would report adversely to its passage, or not report it at all. When the bill passed it was perfectly understood that a settler might, without asking permission of the railroad company, or notifying the company, go upon any quarter section of land and build upon and improve it as if he were a settler upon Government land under the preemption law then in force. It was understood by the applicants, by the committee, and by the House that the only difference between the lands granted and any other surveyed unoccupied lands on the public domain was that the settler could not homestead the land or preempt it at $1.25 per acre. He was obliged, after becoming an actual settler, to pay the company $2.50 per acre for it.

I quite agree with you that the grant was not of an estate upon condition, but a conveyance in trust. The company was made a trustee for the sale of the lands in conformity with the express terms of the trust. For its services as such trustee and to aid it in building the road it was allowed to keep the trust money.

I take the liberty of suggesting to you that it is in the power of Congress to now enact a law making a legislative construction of the acts of 1869 and 1870, defining specifically what was meant by the term "actual settler," and providing that upon proof of actual settlement and tender of the purchase money the company must execute a deed. The courts would then administer the law as interpreted by Congress, and the settler would be protected.

There are other suggestions I might make in this connection, but I have already sufficiently trespassed upon your attention.

I have no personal interest in the matter, but I was in a way the father of the law and did much to secure its passage, and I sympathize with your efforts to secure to actual settlers the benefits to which they are entitled.

Very truly, yours, THOMAS FITCH.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit, to be printed in the RECORD, a table prepared by the Department of Commerce and Labor, showing the imports, customs receipts, and average ad valorem rates of duty on imports during the fiscal years 1907 to 1911, inclusive.

The table is as follows:

Imports, customs receipts, and average ad valorem rates of duty on imports during the fiscal years 1907 to 1911, inclusive.

Year ending June 30—	Imports.			Per cent free.	Customs receipts.	Average ad valorem rate on—
	Free.	Dutiable.	Total.			Dutiable.	Total.
1907	$644,029,761	$790,391,664	$1,434,421,425	44.90	$332,233,363	42.04	23.16
1908	525,603,308	668,738,484	1,194,341,792	44.01	286,113,130	42.79	23.95
1909	599,556,639	712,363,585	1,311,920,224	45.70	300,711,934	42.22	22.92
1910	755,311,396	801,636,034	1,556,947,430	48.51	333,683,445	41.63	21.43
1911	777,972,459	749,993,646	1,527,966,105	50.92	313,841,209	41.85	20.54

NOTE.—Imports refer to general imports, and not imports for consumption, not yet available for 1911. Figures of customs receipts are from data of the Treasury Department.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. J. M. C. SMITH].

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, were I to consult my own inclinations at the present time, possibly because in my State we are not particularly engaged in the manufacture of this important American product, and were I simply trying here to cut some political figure, I might not arise at this time to explain my position and my vote upon this bill; but owing to the particular circumstances, and the shortness of the time for this debate, and knowing that there are others who desire to speak, I wish to thank the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] for yielding time to me, in order that I may say that I shall cast my vote on this question upon principle, and not for the furtherance of any political scheme.

You all remember how we stood here for days, those of us from the northern border of the United States, and contended against the reciprocity treaty. We did not believe it was right then, and we do not believe it is right now. We asked the votes of loyal, patriotic Members to protect the great agricultural interests of this country against the enactment of that unjust treaty.

Now that it has passed I bear no ill will and have no feeling of revenge. I am ready as a plain American citizen to do my duty to the people and to my party, having the welfare of the people of this great Commonwealth at heart. I shall cast my vote in favor of what I believe to be for their welfare and best interests. In the short time allowed me I shall endeavor to explain the position that I take.

I have listened with deep interest to the remarks of the various gentlemen as each expressed his opinion as to the merits or demerits of the pending measure, and I only desire time enough to explain my own position and vote.

Now, I am in favor of a revision of the tariff and of this particular cotton schedule upon proper consideration and intelligent information. But I am not in favor of entirely eliminating the element of protection in such revision, and would have it comply with the rule that the rate of duty should equal the difference in the cost of production in this country and in foreign countries. In presenting this bill to the House the eminent gentleman, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, stated that the reduction was a conservative one, equivalent to a cut from 48.12 per cent ad valorem, the present rate, to 27.06 per cent, as against 43.76 per cent under the Wilson bill of 1894, the last Democratic tariff act, and you all remember what happened then. It is estimated that under this bill imports of manufactured cotton will increase from $28,417,441 worth in 1910 to $39,163,800 in 1912. This means that $39,163,000 worth of goods that might be produced by American labor will be made by foreign pauper labor and imported into this country. Not only will these millions of dollars' worth of goods be imported, and deprive the American workingman of so much labor, but the millions of dollars in gold, or its equivalent, paying for them will be sent to other countries to enrich their treasuries. This vast sum might better be kept at home, to be spent for other American-made products, or for reinvestment. This great industry is represented by the following figures, taken from the report of the committee, which I ask to have incorporated in my remarks:

Comparative summary of cotton manufacturing in the United States, by decades, 1879 to 1909.

This bill was reported to the House last Friday afternoon, July 28, with the statement of the leader of the majority that the previous question would be moved after 10 hours' debate. Just think of it—this whole cotton schedule, containing more different classes and grades and prices than any other, and comprising 16 sections in the bill, and changing 19 sections of the law, acknowledged to be one of the most intricate of all the schedules, involving upward of 1,000 separate items, and a cash transaction of nearly $40,000,000 worth of commodities to be purchased by our people. To show the great intricacy of the subject under consideration and to note the changes from a specific to an ad valorem duty, I will incorporate the first section of the present tariff law and the first section of the bill revising it.

In all common fairness, is that an intelligent business transaction? Is there a man here who would in his own affairs employ such business methods? I ask unanimous consent to insert this single section of the present tariff law to show the items and the nature of the items to be acted upon and the large number of specific and technical items to be considered in the short space of 10 hours' debate and consideration in this House. Ten weeks would not be too long or unreasonable.

SCHEDULE I.—COTTON MANUFACTURES.

313. Cotton thread and carded yarn, warps or warp yarn, in singles, whether on beams or in bundles, skeins, or cops, or in any other form, except spool thread of cotton, crochet, darning, and embroidery cottons, hereinafter provided for, not colored, bleached, dyed, or advanced beyond the condition of singles by grouping or twisting two or more single yarns together, 2½ cents per pound on all numbers up to and including No. 15, one-sixth of a cent per number per pound on all numbers exceeding No. 15 and up to and including No. 30, and one-fifth of a cent per number per pound on all numbers exceeding No. 30: Provided, That none of the foregoing shall pay a less rate of duty than 15 per cent ad valorem; colored, bleached, dyed, combed, or advanced beyond the condition of singles by grouping or twisting two or more single yarns together, whether on beams, or in bundles, skeins, or cops, or in any other form, except spool thread of cotton, crochet, darning, and embroidery cottons, hereinafter provided for, 6 cents per pound on all numbers up to and including No. 24, and on all numbers exceeding No. 24 and up to No. 80, one-fourth of 1 cent per number per pound; on No. 80 and up to No. 200, three-tenths of 1 cent per number per pound; on No. 200 and above, 60 cents per pound, and one-tenth of 1 cent per number per pound additional for every number in excess of No. 200; cable-laid yarns or threads, made by grouping or twisting two or more grouped or twisted yarns or threads together, not colored, bleached, or dyed, four-tenths of 1 cent per number per pound; colored, bleached, or dyed, nine-twentieths of 1 cent per number per pound: Provided further, That said threads and yarns, colored, bleached, dyed, combed, advanced beyond the condition of singles, and cable-laid yarns or threads, as hereinbefore provided, except those (other than cable-laid threads and yarns) finer than No. 140 shall not pay a less rate of duty than 20 per cent ad valorem: And provided further, That all the foregoing threads and yarns as hereinbefore provided, when mercerized or subjected to any similar process, shall pay, in addition to the foregoing specific rates of duty, one-fortieth of 1 cent per number per pound; cotton card laps, roping, sliver, or roving, 35 per cent ad valorem. Cotton waste and flocks, manufactured or otherwise advanced in value, 20 per cent ad valorem.

As a substitute for the foregoing, the following is now brought in:

A bill to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton.

1. On cotton thread and carded yarn, combed yarn, warps or warp yarn, whether on beams or in bundles, skeins, or cops, or in any other form, except spool thread of cotton, crochet, darning, and embroidery cottons, hereinafter provided for, on all numbers up to and including No. 50, 10 per cent ad valorem; on all numbers above No. 50 and up to and including No. 100, 15 per cent ad valorem; on all numbers above No. 100, 20 per cent ad valorem. On cotton card laps, roping, sliver, or roving, 10 per cent ad valorem. On cotton waste and flocks, manufactured or otherwise advanced in value, 5 per cent ad valorem.

In this case no public hearings were had and we are asked to vote blindly. Are the people who have their millions invested in these great industrial plants to be deprived of a hearing? Are the rights of thousands of wage earners who are so vitally interested to be ignored? It is admitted that the price to the consumer will not be perceptibly reduced for an indefinite time and until conditions have adapted themselves to the new schedule. Then why not wait until the Tariff Board can make a report? For the purpose of showing that the people owning the factories and engaged in manufacturing cotton have not been given a hearing, I wish to publish some of the correspondence had with the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee by Mr. R. M. Miller, chairman of the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association, of Charlotte, N. C., and representing a number of factories:

CHARLOTTE, N. C., July 8, 1911.

Hon. O. W. UNDERWOOD,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I beg to own the receipt of your favor of the 6th and to express my regret, personally and on behalf of our committee, at the decision of the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee not to allow any general hearings on the cotton schedule. I shall acquaint my committee at once of your decision.

The industry we represent is of such vast importance to our country, the invested interest involved is so large, the thousands of wage earners are so dependent, that the results might prove disastrous to us, and the decision of our Representatives not to hear us in defense of our industry seems unfortunate and very much to be regretted.

Yours, very truly,

R. M. MILLER, Jr., Chairman.

Such proceedings are calculated to destroy the confidence of the manufacturers in our lawmaking bodies, if not the manufacturing establishments in this country, and deprive the workman of his labor without even a chance to be heard. One of our Democratic friends stated that the tariff had been discussed for many years by Congress. But there are many new Members in this Congress—74 of them Democrats, 43 of them Republicans, and 1 Socialist—almost one-third new Members. The Republicans wish to be guided by intelligent, independent action based upon some knowledge of the subject matter; the Democratic Members are guided by the action of their caucus and are bound to vote as a unit whenever two-thirds of the Members in caucus so decide, unless, forsooth, they can extricate themselves by some prior party pledge or platform. So it is that two-thirds of the Democratic Members of this House, merely by caucus action lasting an hour, more or less, can dictate the laws and the policy of the legislation of our country. From this caucus are reported bills and measures to this House to be enacted into law without change, even to the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i."

This may be all right, but it seems to me there is a more intelligent way to pursue.

Now, the consensus of opinion throughout the country is that action should not be taken upon the tariff schedules during the present extra session of Congress and that we ought to adjourn and go home and give the country a rest.

By a very great majority of the people of this country (and I think they are right) it is desired that we should wait until the report of the Tariff Board, which is now working upon these important schedules, can be made. The country will not agree with those who are of the opinion that these important schedules can be revised hastily by Congress, many of the Members of which have had little or no experience either in the manufacture of cotton or in dealing with this important question. For one I would not want to set my judgment hastily against that of a person who has had technical training and long experience in the manufacture of cotton. The Tariff Board, composed, admittedly, of men especially qualified for this duty, and having all the resources for making a thorough investigation, can perform a superior service as compared with those having neither opportunity nor means at their command for fixing the proper rate.

In 1909 there was passed by this House a bill making an appropriation of $75,000, available for the fiscal year 1910, "To enable the President to secure information and to assist the officers of the Government in the administration of the customs laws." For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, there was appropriated:

To enable the President to secure information to assist him in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by section 2 of the act entitled "An act to provide revenues, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, and the officers of the Government in administering the customs laws, including such investigations of the cost of production of commodities, covering cost of material, fabrication, and every other element of such cost of production, as are authorized by said act, and including the employment of such persons as may be required for those purposes; and to enable him to do any and all things in connection therewith authorized by law, $250,000.

And for a like purpose an additional sum of $225,000, together with the unexpended balance of the appropriation formerly made, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912:

To enable the President to secure information to assist him in the discharge of the duties imposed upon him by section 2 of the act entitled "An act to provide revenues, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, and the officers of the Government in administering the customs laws, including such investigations of the cost of production of commodities, covering cost of material, fabrication, and every other element of such cost of production, as are authorized by said act, and including the employment of such persons as may be required for those purposes; and to enable him to do any and all things in connection therewith authorized by law, or if a Tariff Board be established by law then for the purpose of meeting the expenditures authorized by the law, $225,000, together with the balance unexpended July 1 next of the appropriation made for these purposes for the fiscal year 1911.

Making, in all, the sum of $550,000 which the President might expend in arriving at a true knowledge for the proper administration of the customs laws of our country. It can not be said that as good customs laws can be fixed by this Congress, with inexperienced Members and with limited means, in the 10 hours' debate upon the floor of this House, as by the board of tariff experts with its help and machinery and means for investigation. Indeed, the information that such money had been appropriated was well received by the people of the country. A majority of them are now in favor of this action. This board stands in favor with the people generally. It will be of vast service in fixing the proper duty upon imports. The information it gathers and imparts will be of great value to the country. It will report in December next. This cotton schedule does not go into effect by the terms of the bill until January 1, 1912, or one month after the time the regular session of Congress convenes, when this Tariff Board will have filed its report. The President will have an opportunity to send in a message upon its finding, giving Congress time to act upon this bill intelligently even before a bill passed by this body would go into effect, should it be enacted into law. I am in favor of a highly proficient, nonpartisan Tariff Board, fully authorized to assemble information for the use of Congress in enacting these important measures and to aid it in fixing a duty that will be best for the people and the country at large, and represent a duty that will provide for the difference in the cost of production here and abroad. I was much interested in the position taken by the excellent gentleman, Mr. UNDERWOOD, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, who submitted the bill to this House for its consideration, in giving his views of the manner in which the tariff can be revised downward. He stated that it was like lowering a house and that there were two ways by which the house could be lowered—one by letting it down gradually by jackscrews and another by chopping down the supports.

If this was the way the bill was prepared, we may expect a crash, for he certainly chopped the props out from under it. I doubt if there is anyone here who will agree that chopping the props out from under a building is a proper method of lowering it. In the first place, there must be a well-laid foundation for the building to rest upon and the building must be lowered gradually. By cutting down the supports with an ax you disregard the foundation the building is to rest upon and you destroy the building. In fact, there is no attention paid to the foundation and you do not expect to save the building. If it is intended that the policy of protection is to be destroyed and the whole tariff system fall and there is to be no protection to American industries or American labor, then the quickest way would be to chop out the supports from under the whole thing, let it all go down together, and thus destroy the structure. Our independence sprang from a desire on the part of England to enact our laws and to furnish manufactured goods to this country and prohibit manufacturing by the colonists. The colonies resented this imposition, and many of them passed prohibitive acts against English imports; and manufacturing industries sprang up with such regularity that in a short time our country was able to provide its own wants without being dependent upon other countries, and general prosperity prevailed. We are still able to do our own manufacturing.

The present bill is a bill for revenue only, and is devoid of every element of protection. I am not in favor of free trade or its running mate, a tariff for revenue only. I am for having the mills of the United States open in preference to opening up the mills of foreign countries. Indeed, I can see but little difference between importing the laborers themselves and importing free of duty articles made by foreign labor. I am opposed to the importation of foreign pauper laborers, who come to this country with no conception of the rights or duties of citizenship, and who pay little respect and less regard to our laws and our customs, who live in squallor and send their earnings back to their native land. I am also opposed to the importation of foreign products made by cheap peon or pauper labor in competition with the products of the intelligent workingmen of the United States. I am in favor of protection to American labor and allowing the workingman of the United States such a sum as will permit him to live as becomes an American citizen, maintain his citizenship, educate his family, and permit him to own his home, and by his industry to accumulate enough for his declining years. Instead of giving him a pension give him an opportunity to earn his own living, and then old-age pensions will be relegated to countries paying little or nothing to their laborers in the years of their usefulness. But there is another kind of pension which will receive my hearty support.

There is some question over the passage at this extra session of a liberal pension bill to pay possibly a dollar a day to the veteran soldiers of our country. I am in favor of the payment of a liberal pension to the men who fought our battles in war, who offered their lives to their country, who saved this Union, and carried to a successful issue by their patriotism and bravery great questions of state against an enemy who was in some instances of their own flesh and blood, and always a worthy foeman. The pension to the veterans will encourage patriotism and pay a just debt that is the soldier's due. It will contribute to the welfare of those who in their early years lost an opportunity of accumulating wealth or entering into business while serving their country; and I am pleased to note in this body the favorable disposition and large sentiment in favor of a liberal pension to those who served their country in the days of peril and adversity, and I will record my vote for any pension bill, whether it be called the Sherwood, Anderson, or the Sulloway bill, carrying a liberal pension.

The country would approve such a law, and I understand the committee is ready to report out such a bill. If we are to be kept here and remain longer in session, let us enact this legislation, which is in favor with the people and the immediate necessity of which is shown by the death every day of more than 100 veterans.

Free trade has never brought prosperity, but prosperity has always been assured with factories running and plenty of employment at good wages. Let us keep the wheels turning and labor employed. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR].

Mr. FARR. Mr. Chairman, if we have learned anything during this extra session, it is that we know comparatively little about the tariff question, and that, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] stated the other night, we are making a political football of the industrial system of this, the greatest manufacturing country in the world. [Applause on the Republican side.]

We are doing that regardless of the effect on the $15,000,000,000 invested in these great industries and the more than 6,000,000 people who get their living from them. I have no thought of reflecting on the intelligence and ability of the Members of this House, but the many duties and responsibilities and the short term of service of most Members preclude the possibility of expert knowledge on a question of the great scope of the tariff, including, as it does, every phase of industry and business in the 4,000 separate items in the present Payne law. Tariff agitation and tariff tinkering have demoralized industry and business time and again because of lack of scientific treatment based on the knowledge of the facts. I am in favor of the Tariff Commission. In the platform that I submitted to the voters in the district I have the honor to represent, I stated that I was opposed to the general reopening of the tariff question, but that I favored its revision, schedule by schedule, based on knowledge of the facts showing the conditions and cost of production here and abroad as secured by a commission of nonpartisan experts.

I conceded that imperfections existed in the Payne law. How could it be otherwise? Any tariff measure considered without exact information as to each schedule will contain mistakes and be liable to selfish impositions and inequalities. As President Taft has truly said, the present method of considering the tariff is "antiquated and rife with abuse." Congress, with all its responsibilities, can not give the tariff the thorough treatment that so vital a question deserves.

We have four propositions on the wool and woolen schedule before us. First, the existing law, the Payne measure; second, the Underwood bill; third, Mr. LA FOLLETTE'S original proposition; fourth, Mr. LA FOLLETTE'S compromise, which was adopted by the Senate. Each of these measures is drawn from a different viewpoint and based on a different rate of duty, some of them differing radically. All of these can not be right. I do not think one of them is correct, because we lack the information that should be known and can only be gained through a commission of trained tariff experts, whose time and energy shall be given to the study of the industrial conditions here and abroad and to get all the facts as to cost of production, and so forth, here and there, so that we shall know what rates are necessary to protect our labor and our industries against the low-waged competition of foreign countries and at the same time not to do injury to the consumer. Mr. LA FOLLETTE, the distinguished and able Senator from Wisconsin, stated in effect that he was not certain as to results from his own figures, and if the report of the Tariff Commission in December furnished data showing mistakes changes could be made.

The wool bill, if enacted, will not go into effect until January 1 next, and we shall have the report of the Tariff Commission on this schedule at the regular session in December, preceding January 1. Why is it not the part of wisdom to wait for facts and to act more intelligently on a matter of such vital concern to every man, woman, and child in our country? Too long the tariff has been made a political football, to the great injury of the country. It is not a political question in the sense of partisanship, but a business and economic proposition that concerns everybody, regardless of political affiliations, and should be treated in a thorough, scientific, nonpolitical way, no matter what our individual views of the tariff may be. It is a crime against the best interests and welfare of the people of this country to consider the tariff question in the haphazard, give-and-take way it has been done for many years; but there will be compensation to the people for this long drawn out extra session, in which we have talked of nothing but the tariff, and that is in strengthening their convictions against a superficial and partisan treatment of the question. It will awaken a sentiment that will demand and command the expert and scientific consideration that foreign countries give it, and thus avoid the unsettling of industry and business by constant tariff agitation and threatened tariff tinkering.

Of course no one knows what the President is going to do if the bill should reach him. I believe that he will veto it. If he signed it, he might get some temporary benefit; he might possibly please a lot of people who have been angered against certain schedules in the Payne bill; he may perhaps help himself politically temporarily, but it will redound to his credit if he vetoes it and takes his stand on the proposition that we ought to wait, and must wait, until we get the right facts bearing on this great question. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It may not reelect Mr. Taft, but he will be greater in defeat in winning for the people of this country the right to a scientific consideration of the tariff question. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

It is not necessary to submit an argument in favor of the system of protection and what it has done for the development of the industries of our country. The results speak for themselves. We have become the greatest manufacturing country in the world, with investments of about $15,000,000,000 in our 550,000 factories and industries, the annual product of which is valued at $16,000,000,000 and the wages paid three and a half billions annually. More than 6,000,000 people are given employment at the highest wages paid in the world. The American workman receives nearly two and a half times more wages than the workman in free-trade England. The cost of living, based on the respective standards of living in this country and in England, is only 38 per cent more in this country than in England. I emphasize the statement as to the different standards of living because that of the American workman is higher than that in England, and if the workman in England could live as the American does, there would be slight, if any, difference in the cost of living, so the American gets not only two and one-half times more for his labor than the workingman in Great Britain gets, but that if he were content to live as does his brother across the ocean his cost of living would be but slightly, if any, greater.

Mr. Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, in his report, as published, of his trip abroad, admits that fact, and says:

> Living is cheap to the wageworker in Europe only because he does without what in America soon becomes a necessity to him. Food in good quantity and quality, presentable clothes among his aspiring fellow workmen and their families, and a comfortably furnished home in quarters responding to his awakened desires for equality with his American neighbors, and, in general, a large and freer life.
>
> I believe I may assert—

Continues Mr. Gompers—

> that whether the cost of living in Europe or America is greater to the workingman depends entirely upon the standard of living they adopt while in America. If he voluntarily lives the life of self-denial in America that he compulsorily lived in his native land, his outlay of money will remain about the same. Even then he will hardly be able to escape gaining something from the superior supply of the good things in life in America.

Speaking of the cost of meat, Mr. Gompers said:

> Meat in foreign countries is usually from 25 per cent to 100 per cent higher than in the United States.

The direct advantages of the system of a protective tariff to the American workingman and the disadvantages to the English workman is in itself an unanswerable argument in favor of the American system of protection. Neither can it be claimed that organized labor in this country is responsible for the great advantage the American enjoys in higher wages, because in England workmen are equally well organized, and in some respects occupy a more advanced position in labor matters than we do.

In both countries much benefit has resulted to the workman because of organized labor, and wages are higher in both countries for that reason. But the fact that American workingmen get nearly two and a half times more for their labor than those in England proves the great difference in material conditions in a country where its industries are protected by a tariff against foreign importations and where its workmen get the direct benefits of that system, rather than in a country like England where free trade prevails and the workmen have not the benefit of a system of protection. In this connection, I desire to read an editorial from the London Times showing the tremendous advantages the protected American has in wages over those employed in free-trade England:

> [From the London Times.]
> WAGES AND COST OF LIVING IN THE UNITED STATES.
> LONDON, Friday, April 14, 1911.
> The report issued on Tuesday by the board of trade on wages, cost of living, and other conditions of industrial life in the United States, supplements the valuable series of similar inquiries already published into the same conditions in several European countries. It supplements the previous inquiries and corrects them, or rather corrects the inferences to be drawn from them, and for the serious student of social and economic conditions that is its chief value. It corrects the previous inquiries because it tells a very different tale and thereby puts the relations of cause and effect in a truer light. The broad upshot of the reports dealing with European countries, including our own, has been to show that in regard to the conditions investigated the artisan in this country has, in a varying degree, the advantage over his fellows in Germany, France, or Belgium. He earns somewhat higher wages, works somewhat shorter hours, and pays somewhat less for the necessaries of life. Without going into qualifying details or minor distinctions we may accept that as the broad result.

But when we come to the United States the picture is turned almost completely round. From the abstract which we publish the reader will see that the workman in America enjoys an enormous advantage over his fellow in England, an advantage far greater than the latter enjoys over the German or the Frenchman. He earns more than two and a quarter times as much money and works shorter hours for it; so that his hourly rate of earnings is as 240 to 100, or pretty nearly twice and a half as much. Against that enormous difference in wages there is something to be set in the way of expenditure. Rent is twice as high and food is about one-third higher than in England, but the cost of living altogether is only as 152 to 100, or about half as much again.

Now, these facts completely dispose of two widely current misconceptions or misstatements. One is that the higher wages admittedly paid in America are all swallowed up and more by the higher cost of living, which is believed to surpass the standard of this country in regard to the necessaries of life by an enormous amount, and to constitute an intolerable burden. The present report explicitly states the contrary at the conclusion of a long, elaborate, and extremely careful comparison of the two countries. In the United States, it says, a much greater margin of earnings over cost of living is available, even when allowance has been made for the increased expenditure on food and rent. "The margin is clearly large, making possible a command of the necessaries and conveniences and minor luxuries of life that is both nominally and really greater than that enjoyed by the corresponding class in this country." It further appears from the report that the advantage enjoyed by this country in regard to the cost of food is even less than it looks in the summary comparison. A workman living on the American scale only pays 25 per cent more for his food in the United States than he would in England. Most men would cheerfully accept the condition of paying 25 or even 33 per cent more for their food in order to get 130 per cent more pay. And when the food items are scrutinized the difference is seen to be even less in regard to important articles.

British beef and mutton are actually dearer than American, and pork is much dearer. The items in which the American prices are really much higher are potatoes and bread; but that means baker's bread bought in the loaf, which is little eaten by working-class families in the United States, as the report points out. The bread on which they chiefly live is made at home, and flour only costs 3d. a stone more. That is not a ruinous difference, and therefore, so far as bread and meat are concerned, the British housewife has but small advantage. These results, we must confess, are a little surprising; but there is no doubt about the care and accuracy with which the data have been collected. It is clear that prices have not risen so much in recent years in the United States as we have been led to suppose, and that wages have risen far more rapidly.

Mr. Chairman, as a further bearing on the difference in conditions in the United States and Great Britain I submit for your consideration a research made by J. Ellis Barker, an expert, of London:

AMERICA'S PROSPERITY COMPARED WITH GREAT BRITAIN'S.

The wealth of a nation consists in the main not in cash and securities, but in wealth-creating undertakings, such as farms, factories, mines, forests, fisheries, etc., and the productivity of these has increased in the United States in the most remarkable manner. A short time ago the Census Bureau issued preliminary estimates which show the following progress:

Years.	Value of the—
	Production of farms.	Production of factories.
1880	$2,212,540,927	$5,369,579,199
1890	2,460,107,454	9,372,437,283
1900	3,764,177,706	13,014,287,498
1910	8,760,000,000	20,000,000,000

Between 1880 and 1910 the population of the United States has grown from 50,155,783 to 93,402,151, or by 86 per cent. During the same time the yearly output of factories has grown by 271 per cent and that of the yearly harvest by 296 per cent.

American production has increased three times as fast as American population, and as the bulk of the agricultural produce and manufactured articles raised in the United States is consumed in the country, it is clear that the average citizen obtains now more and infinitely better food, clothing, furniture, etc., than he did 30 or even 10 years ago. Incidentally, the foregoing table shows that the complaints about the increased cost of living are very well founded.

Of late years the economic policy of all nations has rather encouraged manufacturing than agriculture. The insufficient output of agricultural produce the world over has during the last decade raised very greatly the price of all foodstuffs and of wool, cotton, leather, etc., while the ample production of manufactured articles has kept their prices comparatively low.

The increased value of farm produce of all kinds is largely due to its scarcity. During the last 10 years the production of the farms has increased in value by no less than 133 per cent, while that of the factories has increased by only 47 per cent.

Between 1880 and 1900 the townspeople enjoyed good times, largely at the expense of the farmers, who, owing to overproduction, had to sell their produce cheaply. Now the position has been reversed. During the last decade the farmers have had the advantage over the townspeople, and a large portion of the increased earnings of the latter have gone into the pockets of the former.

Great and small are terms of comparison. The wealth and material progress of the United States can best be measured by comparing it with that of Great Britain. In 1907 the two countries compared agriculturally as follows:

	Acreage under grain crops.	Acreage under forests.
In United States	186,780,300	652,000,000
In Great Britain	8,317,413	3,030,000

	Wheat.	Cattle.
	Tons.
In United States	16,803,300	72,533,996
In Great Britain	1,518,200	11,630,142

	Sheep.	Pigs.	Horses.
In United States	53,240,282	54,794,439	19,746,583
In Great Britain	30,011,823	3,907,103	2,080,027

The acreage under grain crops is 22 times and that under forests 215 times as large in the United States as in Great Britain. In 1907 the United States produced 11 times as much wheat as did Great Britain.

They had twice as many sheep—a comparatively valueless kind of live stock—6 times as many head of cattle, 10 times as many horses, and 14 times as many pigs as the United Kingdom; and if we add to the comparable items the noncomparable ones, such as the American cotton crop, which is worth $750,000,000 a year, or twice as much as the entire British wheat crop, and the American timber crop, which is worth another $750,000,000, it appears that America's rural wealth is probably at least 10 times as great as that of Great Britain.

The amazing progress of the wealth of America, if compared with that of Great Britain, is apparent from the following extraordinary figures:

Years.	Value of mineral productions in the—
	United States.	United Kingdom.
1880	$364,928,298	$419,889,575
1890	606,476,380	504,013,285
1900	1,107,031,392	803,025,720
1907	2,071,607,964	797,743,405

In 1880 the United States produced $55,000,000 less minerals than Great Britain. In 1907 they produced $1,274,000,000 more minerals than Great Britain.

In the course of seven years, 1900–1907, British mineral production decreased by $5,000,000. During the same period American mineral production increased by the colossal sum of $965,000,000.

These figures show irresistible expansion in the one country and stagnation and slow decay in the other. As the most important mineral in both countries is coal, we may conclude from these figures that the manufacturing industries have been rapidly expanding in the United States and stagnating in Great Britain.

The fact that the unprecedented industrial progress of the United States has benefited not only the wealthy few but the broad masses of the people can clearly be seen by the surprising increase in the consumption of popular luxuries, of which the following somewhat unsatisfactory figures give merely an indication:

Consumption per head of population.

Years.	Coffee.	Sugar.	Beer.	Spirits.
	Pounds.	Pounds.	Gallons.	Gallons.
1880	8.78	42.9	8.26	1.27
1890	7.83	52.8	13.66	1.40
1900	9.81	65.2	16.01	1.28
1909	11.74	82.2	19.79	1.37

The masses of the people spend much more than they used to not only on the luxuries of the table, but also on the luxuries of the person and of the home. This is evident from the following figures, which go only to 1905, as the figures for 1910 have not yet been published:

Years.	Production of—
	Furniture.	Millinery.	Women's clothing.
1880	$77,845,725	$9,577,840	$32,004,794
1890	$111,743,080	$18,047,067	$168,164,019
1900	$125,315,986	$29,469,406	$159,339,539
1905	$170,446,825	$50,777,768	$247,661,560
Per cent increase	125	450	700

As the United States export very little furniture, millinery, and women's clothing, we may say that practically the entire increase in the production of these has been caused by increased purchases on the part of the American people. While between 1880 and 1905 the population of the United States has increased by 66 per cent, the people have spent 125 per cent more on furniture, 450 per cent more on millinery, and 700 per cent more on women's clothing in 1905 than they did in 1880. They have increased their expenditure to the largest extent on the more flimsy luxuries.

It may be argued that the foregoing figures only prove that the American people have become more lavish or more wasteful in their expenditure, but that they are not better off than they used to be; that the money which in former years was put by in the form of savings is now spent in ornament and ostentation.

This view, which is frequently expressed, is erroneous, for the statistics of the savings banks clearly show that, notwithstanding the enormous increase in their expenditure on luxuries, the American people save far more now than they used to save. This is proved by the savings banks' statistics, and the true meaning of the American savings banks' statistics can best be ascertained by comparing them with the figures relating to Great Britain. Such a comparison yields the following surprising results:

Savings-Bank Deposits.

	United States.	New York State.	Great Britain.
1880	$819,106,973	$319,258,501	$388,605,420
1890	1,550,023,956	550,066,657	556,426,795
1900	2,389,719,954	922,081,596	935,027,810
1910	4,070,486,247	1,526,935,582	1,097,618,145

In 1880 the savings-bank deposits in the United States were only twice as large as those in Great Britain, but now they are four times as large, and the savings-bank deposits in New York State alone, with 9,113,279 inhabitants, are 50 per cent larger than are those in the United Kingdom, with 45,000,000 inhabitants. Per head of population, New York State has $168 in the savings banks, while Great Britain has only $24 in the savings banks.

The foregoing figures prove clearly the wonderful prosperity of the United States and of the American people, and they have every reason to be proud of their country and of their statesmen and business men who have brought about these magnificent results.

Mr. Chairman, in view of these striking facts, showing the unparalleled development of our country, the great opportunities afforded, and the direct benefit of the protective-tariff system to the people, are we ready to put down the barriers and open our markets of $29,000,000,000 worth of products to the much lower-waged competition of foreign countries? Are we willing to stop the wheels of our industries to start the wheels of industries in foreign countries, and take from American labor the opportunity of employment at the highest wages paid in the world? [Great applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON].

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, a Washington morning paper, under the head of "Democrats and insurgents vote together in the Senate," uses the following language:

The "unholy alliance" in the United States Senate obtained its second victory yesterday. The farmers' free-list bill was passed, not exactly as agreed upon in the House, but without material amendment. The vote was 48 to 30. There is little doubt that the difference between the two Houses will be reconciled in conference and the President confronted with a free-list and a wool-revision tariff bill.

Representative UNDERWOOD, House leader, said last night that if the President vetoes these bills Congress will adjourn promptly and renew the fight at the next regular session. If the President permits either of them to become law, Congress will remain and perfect its tariff-revision program.

The same paper further says:

The President will veto both bills.

There is pressed upon the attention of the House and the country the thought that no tariff revision should be had until the Tariff Board has reported, and apparently the promise is made that the President will veto all tariff measures passed at this extra session by what is termed an unholy alliance.

I live in a section where this alliance will not be considered unholy, but will be approved, and, in my judgment, will be approved by a majority of the American people; and I hope that this alliance will help to bring about a just revision of the tariff laws.

The country is progressive in thought, and is ready and anxious for a change in many of its laws, so it can be progressive in fact. It is anxious for a change in the methods of administration of government and of its laws, but it wants in control a progressive and constructive party. It will not be satisfied with a mere change of party government. It does not insist upon the enactment of radical legislation, but desires progressive conservatism rather than radical conservatism. The country has grown not only weary but hostile to further domination of party and country by selfish interests, and demands not the destruction of healthy and legitimate business, but a change radical enough to bring relief to the unselfish masses of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The country grows less partisan, more patriotic, caring less for party and more for country, less for the effect of legislation upon party success and more for results beneficial to all the people. It matters not so much from what source legislation comes as it does that the legislation is enacted. A party that stands in the way of fair legislation and just laws will suffer and deserves to suffer at the hands of the American people. Let the best thought in the Nation on the great public questions be enacted into law by the united forces representing the whole people as against special interests. Conditions exist in the land that have become intolerable and should be remedied by the passage of laws strong and explicit enough to be made effective and by strict enforcement of such laws, to the end that these intolerable conditions may cease for all time. The country will reward those political forces that bring about substantial relief and will rebuke the party that stands in the way of remedial legislation. [Applause.]

Great wrongs have been perpetrated and extortionate prices exacted in order that great profits might be enjoyed by the few protected interests who have been shielded by unjust laws and by the nonenforcement of laws against those who have violated the laws with impunity.
